Of late the Society had done good service by the financial support which it had given their smaller churches. Some of these were doing most excellent work, and he (the speaker) felt that in the somewhat brief report which had been presented that day, half the tale of their heroic devotion to their cause had not been told. What were they as a Society going to do when the twentieth century dawned upon them? Other denominations were making laudable efforts to raise large sums for various purposes, and were giving special attention to the needs of their smaller congregations in country districts. Their Unitarian churches were making great sacrifices in the same direction in some localities, and London had set them a splendid example. Was it not time that Yorkshire should wake up to a sense of its responsibility? Although their income had increased from £26 in 1816 to something like £400 in 1900, their means were still inadequate to meet the demands on their committee. Their work was pioneer work; and pioneer efforts from the time of Jesus downwards had never been great financial successes. Some of them remembered Dr. Martineau's eloquent plea at Leeds eleven years ago for the better organisation of their churches. While admitting the impracticability of the scheme as a whole, the speaker strongly recommended the main idea which pervaded it—that the strong ought to help the weak, as the right keynote of their future policy. He urged those present to try to realise that they were not merely members of their own respective congregations, but were connected with a great brotherhood which had sympathisers all the world over. With the beginning of the twentieth century they should engage in an effort to make their great principles better known in populous centres. There were many towns and large villages in Yorkshire where their views were not represented at all. The time had come when they should proclaim their gospel of God's loving Fatherhood at all these places. The old work of clearing the ground had been done for them to a large extent, by the spread of scientific knowledge through the medium of the Press. The work which they would be called upon to do in the coming century would be of a nobler kind. It would largely consist in efforts to build up the character on the eternal foundations of truth and justice. They had a most glorious message, and if they delivered it sympathetically and with power in new districts, it would be heard gladly by many who were not yet within their fold. A great deal more might be done to strengthen their position as a body by means of the Sunday-school. One or two of their smaller churches had failed to realise their responsibility in this matter. Any forward movement which they might start in connection with their Union must embrace a revival of interest in Sunday-school work. What they stood most in need of in Yorkshire was enthusiasm for their cause. It has been said that there was enough electricity in a drop of water to produce a thunderstorm; and there was sufficient force in a grain of enthusiasm to create a new life in their churches with the beginning of the twentieth century.

The Rev. W. H. EASTLAKE (Idle) seconded the motion, which was carried.

Votes of thanks were passed to the Bradford congregation for their hospitality, and to the Chairman for presiding.

ASSOCIATION OF NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIANS.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held on June 21 in the Church of the First Presbyterian Congregation, Rosemary-street, Belfast. The outgoing President, the Rev. A. B. Hamilton, M.A., LL.B., conducted divine service at noon, and the business meeting commenced at 2 o'clock.

The Rev. James Kennedy, hon. secretary, having called the roll, the outgoing PRESIDENT delivered an address, in which he stated that during the twelve months just past they had as a Church done many wonderful things. They had endangered the existence and injured the efficiency of their Temperance Committee by raising inquisitorial questions such as no other Church would broach. They had shown themselves capable of believing that arduous and responsible duties could permanently be entrusted to an unpaid official, and no other religious body was so enlightened as to have their view in that respect. The year that was closing would be memorable in history by reason of the South African war. As servants to the "Prince of Peace," they were all averse to bloodshed and contention. As subjects of a Sovereign whose love for peace was well known, they were confident that the painful and distressing incidents of warfare had wrung her woman's heart. At the same time, they felt grateful for the proofs of God's protecting care which had been vouchsafed to them. Never had the Empire been thrilled with a consciousness of its strength as it was that day. Our officers had gained experience; the teaching of the text-books had been brought to the test of practice; the flower of our youth had been trained in the use of arms; and the Imperial instinct had been awakened. God's providence was bringing good out of evil, the area of just government had been widened, and the reign of Christ brought nearer.

The Rev. Alexander Gordon, who had been nominated by the Bangor and Armagh Presbyteries as president for the year, withdrew, and the office was filled by the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, who had been nominated by the Antrim Presbytery.

The PRESIDENT having thanked the Association for his appointment, the Rev. James Kennedy was re-elected hon. secretary, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly hon. treasurer.

On the motion of the Rev. J. KENNEDY, seconded by the Rev. W. NAPIER, it was decided to hold the next annual meeting in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast.

The report of the General Purposes Committee was moved by the SECRETARY. It contained, in addition to some suggestions regarding surplus moneys, an address of welcome which had been presented to Her Majesty the Queen in connection with her visit to Ireland. The latter gave rise to some discussion, but ultimately the Rev. F. THOMAS seconded the report, which was adopted.

The TREASURER, in moving the statement of accounts, said he was pleased to see that the treasurers of the various congregations had responded to his circular, and that he had not to report any congregation in arrears. He moved—"That the Treasurer's accounts, with the accounts and report of the trustees of the Professorships' Compensation Fund, be taken as read, and that they be adopted and printed in the minutes." The Rev. F. THOMAS seconded the motion, which was passed.

Mr. James Davidson submitted a report of a hymn-book account, which, on the motion of Rev. J. A. Kelly, was adopted. Mr. Robert M. Kennedy was reappointed hon. auditor for the year, Rev. Mr. Kelly moving a resolution thanking Mr. Kennedy for the valuable services he had rendered in the past. The Committee for the ensuing year having been appointed, the following were elected Governors of the Orphan Society:—Rev. John Miskimmin, Rev. Alfred Turner, Mr. James Davidson, and Mr. Robert H. Bailie. Rev. Alexander Ashworth moved the adoption of the report of the Sunday-school Committee, which was seconded by Rev. R. Lyttle and passed. The report of the Temperance Committee was adopted, on the motion of Rev. Dr. Mellone, seconded by Rev. R. Lyttle. Rev. T. Dunkerley moved, and Rev. Dr. Mellone seconded, the report of the Theological Library, which was agreed to.

The Rev. A. B. Hamilton made a statement with reference to the University question, and the reason why the Committee had not been called. He proposed that the Committee be reappointed, and said he would summon them when something definite was done. Rev. James Hall seconded the motion. Rev. R. Lyttle moved as an amendment that the matter be left to the General Purposes Committee. Rev. J. A. Kelly seconded the amendment, which was carried, Rev. R. J. Orr dissenting. A resolution expressing regret at the loss sustained by the Association through the removal by death of Rev. David Thompson, and Mr. W. H. Malcolm was passed in silence, on the motion of Rev. R. J. Orr, seconded by Mr. John Bennett. A resolution to the effect that various congregations connected with the Association be requested to make collections for the Indian Famine Fund was passed unanimously, on the motion of Rev. R. J. Orr, seconded by Rev. T. Dunkerley. The President closed the meeting with prayer.

In the evening a well-attended conference, which was interspersed with music, was held in the Central Hall. An excellent tea was provided at half-past six and at eight o'clock, the President (the Rev. M. S. Dunbar) took the chair, amid applause. After devotional exercises the CHAIRMAN gave a lucid account of the destiny and principles of the Non-Subscribing Association. The principle on which their forefathers acted was that of the right of private judgment. If they differed from other Churches on the fundamental principle of freedom from creeds they were at one with them in a desire to live the Christian life and to help on the coming of God's kingdom.

The Rev. R. LYTTLE delivered an earnest temperance speech, in which he pointed out the evils of strong drink, and said it was their duty to make their Church worthy of the name of a Christian Church in overcoming that widespread plague which was ruining many, and to try to stop a curse which those who were ministers would know was undoing the work they were endeavouring to do on the Sabbath Day.

The Rev. ALEXANDER ASHWORTH and the Rev. Dr. MELLONE followed with able addresses on Sunday-school work, while the Rev. W. NAPIER, in the course of a short speech, hoped they would never lose sight of the fact that their forefathers proclaimed the truth that the profession of Christianity was their first and greatest principle.

Votes of thanks, on the motion of the Rev. A. GORDON, were passed to the President and to all who had contributed to the enjoyment of the evening, and the proceedings terminated with the Benediction.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

Invalid Children's Convalescent Nursing Home.

THE annual meeting was held on Monday afternoon last at University Hall, Mrs. Henry Fawcett presiding.

A letter having been read from Mr. Hampson, expressing deep regret that again ill-health prevented his attending the meeting, Mrs. Fawcett called upon Mr. W. M. Blyth to read the financial statement.

Mr. BLYTH, the hon. treasurer, referred to the heavy expenditure during the past summer on account of reconstruction of the drainage, which had necessitated the selling out of the £250 which had been put by in Consols a few years before. The subscriptions had been less, owing to death and the many other public claims that had lately arisen, but the donations were somewhat higher than usual, the result of a generous response to a special appeal made last autumn. Thanks to a generous bequest of £90, the ordinary expenses of the Home—roughly, £660—had been met by the receipts of the year, £684; while the £210 for reconstruction of drainage and other necessary repairs had been taken out of the "nest-egg" in Consols, as already stated.

Miss M. PRITCHARD, hon. secretary, then read the annual report. It recorded a twelvemonth of some strain and stress, owing to difficulties arising from having to make special arrangements when the Home was disorganised by the workmen, and also from the invasion of illness at two or three periods of the year, more especially in the early spring when the scourge of influenza made itself felt among the "grown ups" at Winifred House. But there had been no cause for really serious anxiety for the health of the little ones in the Home, and almost every child had gained considerably in health and strength during their stay. The average number in the Home during the year (except when it was closed for the few weeks) was sixteen, but owing to the fact that most of the children required a prolonged stay, only thirty-three children had been taken in. As the Home becomes more widely known, application for the admission of spinal and hip cases—cases requiring a year's attention very often—become more and more numerous, and the ward devoted to these has not had an empty bed in it for the whole of the ten months. The Committee, however, feel very strongly that a certain proportion of "debility" cases should be mixed with these—children who can run about, and who yet need a couple of months' good air, good food, and good "mothering," in order to build up a frail constitution. Friends are cordially invited, should they be interested in any children requiring such help, to make application to Miss M. Pritchard, 11, Highbury-crescent, N., with a view of their being taken into Winifred House. The report concluded with expressing the warm thanks of the Committee to all who had helped the Home by money, gifts, or personal service.

Mrs. FAWCETT, from the chair, moved the adoption of the report, and, in the course of her speech, after referring to the pleasure she had had in visiting the Home and in seeing evidences of the good work being done there, referred to the Divine law which requires that those on whom the gifts of Providence are largely showered should be the first to sacrifice themselves for those who are weak and low, and continued "Everyone who works in connection with this Home will feel that he or she is richly rewarded in the knowledge that these little lives—trembling perhaps in the balance—have been spared and comforted. And in regard to the parents it must surely be an immense comfort to them to feel in their difficulty that they have the help of others to do for their children what they in their small homes would find it impossible to do." Mrs. Fawcett finished by laying much stress on the falling off of the subscription list, and strongly urged on all interested in the "brave little Home" to do their utmost to induce others to give regular and generous support to it, and, noting that the Saddlers' Company had given a donation, suggested that other City Companies might be asked to do the same.

Mr. T. PALLISTER YOUNG seconded the resolution, and spoke of the cheerful tone of the report, in spite of the difficulties which had had to be met. He also laid stress on what Mrs. Fawcett had said on the brightness and comfort brought into the children's lives by their stay in the Home. Were it only a matter of prolonging their lives of suffering, he could not see wherein there could be any real benefit; but when one knew how the poor little weakly children often became sturdy and well after a six months' visit, or a year, it may be, he felt that the Home might well be congratulated on its good work.

The resolution was then put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. A. B. HAMPSON moved the election of the officers and Committee, which resolution, having been seconded by Mrs. THORNHILL, was duly passed, together with the thanks of the meeting to those ladies and gentlemen who had done the work during the past year.

Miss M. PRITCHARD moved a vote of warm thanks to Mr. G. Tapley Smith, C.E., for acting as hon. surveyor during the past year, he having kindly drawn up the plans and specifications, and also overlooked the whole work of the drainage reconstruction; and she coupled with this vote the names of the two hon. medical officers of the Home, Drs. J. Langton Hewer and Hedley Visick, for the generous and kindly manner in which they were always ready to help, with valuable advice and counsel, whenever needed.

This resolution, having been seconded, was carried unanimously, and a vote of thanks to Mrs. Fawcett for presiding brought the proceedings to an end.

SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

SIR,—Now that our time-table is complete it may be of interest to many of your readers to hear how we intend to occupy ourselves during our Summer Session; so, with your permission, I will run through the journal here.

All students who can do so, will go up to Oxford next Thursday evening, July 5, in order to be ready for the next day.

FRIDAY, JULY 6.—Morning: Opening service and address, by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, President S.S. Association. Lecture on "Child Study," by W. G. Tarrant. Afternoon Cycling and boating parties. Evening: Reception by Principal and Mrs. Drummond.

SATURDAY.—Morning: Lecture I. of course of eight lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by J. Estlin Carpenter. Subject, "The Struggle for Freedom of Inquiry." Second lecture: "What Sunday-schools may learn from Day-schools," by A. J. Mockridge. Afternoon: Visits to Colleges, &c. Evening: Teachers in Council. Subject, "The Outside Activities of the Sunday-school."

SUNDAY. — Morning: Divine Service. Afternoon: Conference, to consider a proposal for a religious union among the younger members of our churches. Evening: Lecture II. of course, by Estlin Carpenter, on "The Revised Version."

MONDAY.—Morning: Lecture III. of course; subject, "The Changed Views of the Old Testament, (a) The Law." Second Lecture, "Wanted, Men and Women," by J. L. Haigh. Afternoon: Cycling and boating parties.

TUESDAY. — Morning: Lecture IV., "Changed Views of the Old Testament, (b) The Prophets." Afternoon: Excursion to Blenheim Palace.

WEDNESDAY. — Morning: Lecture V., "The Origin of Christianity." Second Lecture, "Nature's Lessons for the Sunday-schools," by Thomas Robinson. Afternoon: "At Homes," arranged by some of our Oxford friends. Evening: Teachers in Council; subject, "Five Minutes Sunday-school Addresses for Opening and Closing Services."

THURSDAY.—Morning: Lecture VI., "The Synoptic Gospels." Second Lecture, "Hints gathered from a few American Sunday-schools," by Marian Pritchard. Afternoon: Visits to Colleges, Botanical-gardens, &c.

FRIDAY.—Morning: Lecture VII., "The Fourth Gospel." Second Lecture, "What the average teacher may do," by J. J. Wright. Afternoon: Nuneham; excursion by river. Evening: Informal gathering.

SATURDAY.—Morning: Lecture VIII., "The Bible and the Church." To be followed by Teachers in Council, subjects that have been actually taken in Sunday-school classes.

The session will close after the usual midday common meal.

I hope you will agree with me in thinking that the above list sounds very inviting. I am not sending it entirely with a view of exciting bitter feelings of envy in the hearts of those who are unable to join our happy party—for it will be a happy one—but because we find that we can make room for just a few more students than those who have already arranged to come, and, therefore, we are making known the activities which are to take place from day to day, in order that some teachers who could not spare time to come up for the whole session, can yet be there for part of it and may have this opportunity of choosing their days. Applications should be made at once to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Hon. Sec. Sunday School Association, at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., accompanied by the student's fee of 5s., which will be exchanged for five luncheon tickets on arrival in Oxford.

It is delightful to find that so many of our schools are taking advantage of this Oxford scheme, and I think there is every chance that the gathering will be as successful both in point of numbers and in interest as the one held last year.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Sunshine.

WHILE I am writing, it is glorious weather; a sweet, fresh, glad day which makes us happy to be alive. There is beauty and sweetness everywhere—beautiful sights, sweet scents, and sweet sounds; the atmosphere is warm but freshened by a cool breeze, and one feels "what a beautiful God to make so fine a day!"

Now I have been thinking, children, of the good you could do if you would try to be like a summer day. What happiness you can give to older people by being happy, sweet, and beautiful, and you can each be all this if you try. Oh! but you say, "I cannot be beautiful; I am not even pretty." If you could see into mother's heart when she sees your eyes full of love looking into hers while she thanks God for the healthy glow on your cheek, or sighs over the little face because it does not look so strong as she wishes, you would know that to her you are beautiful. It only needs the look of love and happiness in any young face to make it better than pretty. Even little children who are not blessed with good health can bring summer into a home by suffering patiently and doing all they can to get well and strong as soon as possible. Some wise old people tell us that children have too many good things nowadays, and that it is bad for them to be allowed so much freedom. I must own it looks very much like it, indeed, when I see children with apparently every blessing under the sun and almost every wish gratified, going about the house looking discontented and being quarrelsome and fretful.

There was once a little girl who had a great many toys, and whose kind father and mother were so rich that she could have nearly everything she wanted; yet in spite of this she never looked happy, and her face was like a November fog. One day her mother took her for a drive in London, and the road they wished to drive through was being repaired, so the coachman had to turn into a street where there were many very poor houses, and even there he had to wait a little while before he could drive on.

It happened they stopped before a very dirty old-looking house, and on the doorstep sat a ragged little girl. She was thin and dirty, and not very strong-looking, and the only toy she had to play with was a piece of rag tied round with a string, but she had such a bright, happy little face, that the rich girl's mother said: "Look, Alice, how happy that little girl looks. How would you like to change places with her?" Alice thought she would not like it at all, and presently she asked, "Why is that little girl happy?" and her mother said, "I think, dear, it is because she has the sunshine in her heart."

That was, indeed, the very reason. It is not what we possess, but what we are, that makes us happy; and we can all be happy if we will try to catch all the sunbeams of life and cherish them in our hearts.

The way to do this is to try to be very thankful for every good thing that comes to us, and to think as little as possible of the bad things—to love every one, especially father and mother. How about disagreeable people? Well, do you know that that beautiful heart-sunshine will change them into nice people, far more surely than a fairy's wand could turn an ugly animal into a princess? Have you ever noticed how an ordinary pebble will sometimes glisten in the sunshine until it looks like a precious gem? So will the most ordinary people, and the most tiresome things be changed when the sunshine of the heart gleams upon them.

Feel then, dear children, that it is your duty to be happy. Dance with the leaves, sing with the birds, be busy with the bees, and love with the angels. It is not so very difficult if you really try, and if you succeed, as you are sure to do if you try hard enough, you will be fulfilling as lovely a mission as this glorious summer weather, and will be bringing about an answer to your daily prayer, "God bless dear father and mother, and all kind friends."

THE CALL TO SERVICE.

IN the sermon preached last week before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and briefly reported in our present issue, the Rev. THOMAS LEYLAND emphasised the fact that helpfulness must be the great test of a church's vitality. Looking forward to the coming years, he declared that for our churches the era of criticism is giving place to the era of helpfulness, which is felt indeed on every side in the religious world to be the supreme call upon the churches' faithfulness. In complete surrender to this conviction lies our deliverance from not a few troublesome and crippling questions, and the one hope of a new birth of spiritual life, in confident strength and joyful and effective service, which shall give to our churches a sense, deeper than they have yet known, of having a divine mission in the world.

When our one aim is to be helpful to the deeper needs of men, the work of controversy will fall into its rightful place, not as an end or as a mere exercise of intellectual superiority, but as a practical service, clearing the way for a more sincere and heartfelt worship. The right tone will be preserved in our relations with other churches, when it is seen that union in common work and in one spirit goes deeper than the differences of intellectual apprehension ; while each by that companionship may be led into new paths of thought nearer to the ultimate truth. And the right tone will also be preserved in the interior life of each congregation, in its religious services, and in the friendly intercourse of members. A church dedicated to self-forgetting labour, seeking new strength from GOD for better service of His kingdom, cannot fail to maintain the true spirit of worship, whatever be the forms in use ; nor will its members fall into those grievous faults of temper and disposition which so often bring shame and confusion to churches which are forgetful of that pure and lofty aim. Self-seeking in a church or a denomination, as in an individual, is fatal to true life. To manifest the divine beauty of truth, the strength of righteousness, the trustfulness of a spirit in communion with the FATHER, to worship GOD and help the brethren, to bring peace and gladness into the world and deliverance from sin, such are the aims of helpfulness which are as breath of life to a true church. Those who will be surrendered to such aims may have at once the pure gladness of that deliverance from self ; and they are setting themselves in the line of right endeavour, to receive whatever new strength and larger opportunities the grace of GOD may give.

The conviction that the salvation of our churches will be found in a loyal acceptance of the responsibilities of this new era of helpfulness is strongly marked also in several of the addresses at the recent anniversary meetings of the American Unitarian Association at Boston. Thus the Rev. P. R. FROTHINGHAM, in his address at the Festival Meeting in Tremont Temple, on May 24, insisted on the need in the future of "a closer and a more fruitful alliance between Unitarian words and Unitarian works, between our gospel as a statement of faith and our gospel as a social impulse in life." And he added :—

> I believe that the time has come when we need frankly to say to the world that Unitarianism is temperance, and is everything else that makes for the uplifting and the ennoblement of mankind. We believe in love to God, we say, and love to man ; but, if we interpret that into the vernacular of every-day life, what does it mean ? You ask me, sir, to define Unitarianism. If Unitarianism is love to God and love to man, then I am willing to define it as meaning peace between the nations. And I believe, sir, that we ought to stand out, and to say that Unitarianism means arbitration rather than war ; that it means a more friendly relation between employer and employed ; that it means a purer civic life right here in Boston ; that it means temperance ; and that it means those good and progressive and humanitarian movements that make our age, not so much, I think, as Gladstone said, the age of the working-man, but the age of humanity and of philanthropy.

And in conclusion, having pleaded for more unity and a loyal co-operation, Mr. FROTHINGHAM made this eloquent appeal :—

> Now there is one other thing that I think I see in the future, and I wish I might have the words and the power to impress it deeply upon all your hearts. I think I see out there a vitalising of our faith—new energy, new warmth, new enthusiasm given to it, which shall make it throb with all the emotions of daily life and circulate with all the hopes of human beings. Too much in the past, I think, we have trusted to the simplicity and the beauty of our religious faith ; and we have expected people to be attracted to it instead of carrying it out to them. We have called it a religion of common sense, and we have wondered why there was so little common sense in the world around us that people did not flock to our banner. But as someone has said, it is not that we have too much common sense, but that we have too little else. We need new warmth of heart, new enthusiasm of soul, to take these principles of faith, and to warm them into an actual gospel of daily life. You all remember the famous legend of Pygmalion—how he carved a statue of a goddess, and made it so beautiful, so simple, so chaste, that, when it was finished, he fell in love with it ; and, lo ! the very fervency of his emotion gave life to the statue, so that it lived and breathed and became the inspiration of his life. So should that be with us : we should take this simple, statuesque faith of ours, whose lines are so beautiful and so fair, and should breathe into it the breath of new fervour and emotion.
> Matthew Arnold once said that the duty and privilege of his life consisted in bearing forward the lamp of life for his father. So, I believe, you and I should take this lamp of faith that our fathers lighted, should fill it, and quicken it, and make it more glowing, and should not only press it faithfully to our own breasts, that it may guide our individual feet in the devious paths of life ; but we ought to come out with it, and carry it into the dark corners of poverty and shame and sin and human need and suffering, so that it may become indeed not only a light to us, but a "light that lighteth everyone who cometh into the world.

Other instances of the same strong conviction we might have added, but they would only be a repetition of the one great truth that what we are called to, as members of Free Churches, as dedicated to sincere Christian discipleship, is self-forgetting service of the Kingdom of GOD.

HYMN

FOR THE SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY, A.U.A.

"From generation to generation."

FROM old to new, with broadening sweep,
The stream of life moves on ;
And still its changing currents keep
A changeless undertone.

In prophet word and martyr faith,
Visions of saint and seer,
The poet's song, the hero's death,—
That undertone we hear.

A sense we have of things unseen
Transcending things of time ;
We catch, earth's broken chords between,
The everlasting chime :

And light breaks through the rifted haze
In shining vistas broad ;
We stand amid the eternal ways,
Held by the hand of God.

FREDERICK L. HOSMER.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers and congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire was held on Thursday, June 21, in the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool.

In the morning the religious service was conducted by the Rev. R. T. Herford, of Stand. The lessons were taken from Ezekiel xxxvii. and Ephesians iii. The anthem, "O for a closer walk with God" (M. B. Foster), was beautifully rendered by the choir.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas Leyland, of Colne. Taking for his text Ephesians iii. 21, "Unto God be glory in the Church," Mr. Leyland said that to the writer of that epistle more clearly than to any other New Testament author the Church was an ideal, and at the same time an actuality. It was a religious community in which and by which glory was to be given to God. In the churches of the present time that ideal was apt to be overshadowed by less worthy aims. Sometimes a denomination was glorified above everything, there was counting of heads, and numbers became the chief object of interest; sometimes an individual, lay or cleric, was allowed to overshadow the ideal of the Church, to the destruction of its true religious influence. For themselves they could heartily accept the declaration of the old catechism that the chief end of man is "to glorify God and fully to enjoy Him for ever"; but even the advocates of the new theology were not satisfied, and insisted that where the deity of Christ was not fundamental there could not be a Christian Society; to which they replied that God is a Spirit, that no man hath seen God at any time, and they must worship in spirit and in truth. Proceeding to ask how they might glorify God, the preacher replied (i.) By reasonably wise and reverentially strong criticism. Faculties must be alert, trained to recognise the truth of things and to remove the parasitical growths of error. But most important of all was the spirit in which criticism worked. It was easy to be critical, far more easy than to be correct. Reverent criticism might be both wisely keen and rationally persistent. In the warfare of truth against error there could be no truce or peace. Knowledge must take the place of ignorance, so that science and culture might be on the side of reverence. (ii.) By affectionate and sympathetic hospitality. They must be hospitable to ideas, to the thoughts of others, and be ready to welcome truth from whatever quarter it came to them; and they must be hospitable to people. Strangers, whether of thought or person, must be welcomed as guests, not proselytes. (iii.) By helpfulness, practical and effective to raise humanity in the moral scale. Such was the method of Christ, who went to the poor and needy and sinful. They must cultivate the Christ-like spirit, and must go to the people and be with them in their daily work, aiming to uplift the whole man and human society. When that was the aim of the Church, it would bring not division but unity, harmony, and peace. Not all Churches accepted human helpfulness as the supreme way of glorifying God, but such it was. For their own part they had simply to work on in the living present, and if they were not thought evangelical enough to work with the so-called evangelical Churches, they could yet strive to be Christian enough to work out some of the practical ideals of Christ. Faithfulness was everything. They had been few in the past, and they were few in the present, but they could do their part. The era of helpfulness was surely at hand. Were they prepared to accept the responsibilities of that new era? Even their isolation among the Churches of the land might be their strength, by which they could glorify God. If they stood firmly for the right and proclaimed it aloud, there would be response in many hearts, and they would not be left alone. Reverently they must seek

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After lunch, the Business Meeting of the Assembly was held in the church, the President the Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS in the chair. The roll was called by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, senior secretary.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, referring to the absence of familiar names from the roll of ministers and delegates, spoke as follows of the death of Dr. Martineau:—"Spared to us for nearly a quarter of a century beyond the canonical 'three score years and ten,' Dr. Martineau has gone to his rest—full of years and honours. His death has seemed to be an almost personal bereavement to thousands who never saw his face, to whom his works were a source of light and comfort and inspiration. To those who knew how warm his heart was towards all old friends—how he welcomed every token that he was not forgotten in his old age by those whom he had taught and guided while in the full vigour of his life-work—how fully his time and his pen were, to the very last, at the service of those who sought from him counsel and sympathy—the pang is deeper, and nothing will soon grow over the vacant place where once he was. But here and now, we should think of him as the staunch representative of the old liberal Nonconformity, the man who preserved its testimony unbroken, in times of stress and strife, and, though perpetually disappointed, believed that its tradition of liberty and comprehensiveness, was worth maintaining. Yearning for a wide communion and a broad sympathy in the life of religion, grieving over the perpetual warning off from mutual understanding brought about by doctrinal names and shibboleths, he was yet as inevitably a Nonconformist as one of the ejected of 1662. I say this because the old suspicion that he was at times either coquetting with the Church or making easy 'middle ways' for others has not entirely ceased. The fact is that I do not think that I ever met with a liberal Dissenter who was so far from feeling any attraction to the Church of England as it is as Martineau was. While resuscitating, in his later years, in a form all his own, the old Presbyterian dream of a comprehensive national Church, he was singularly unimpressed by the existing formularies of this Church; he was, I think, strangely critical even of the language of her Prayer-book, he was unsympathetic to her ritual, and contemptuously hostile to her modern developments of sacerdotalism and sacramentalism."

Mr. Odgers then made sympathetic reference to the loss of other old friends—the Rev. John Wright, formerly so well known in the province as minister at Bury, the Rev. George Ride, of Chorley, and Mr. T. H. Hope, a former president of the assembly. Having referred to the changes in the roll, to the retirement of the Rev. William Binns from active service, and having welcomed the new-comers into the Province, he congratulated the congregation, late of Renshaw-street, now of Ullet-road, and its minister, Dr, Klein, on their new church, expressing the hope that the future of the congregation might be more than worthy of the past. That past was honourable, enriched with the memories of men who in the pulpit led the way to high conceptions of life and duty, and men who not merely heard such teaching in a pew, but wrought it into the daily life of commerce and citizenship and far-reaching philanthropy. And he added the aspiration that the young might rise up to emulate the deeds of their fathers, and carry the traditions they inherit to yet higer issues in the service of God and man.

The address then gave an interesting account of changes in Toxteth Park during the latter half of the century, and of the early history of Nonconformity in Liverpool, beginning with the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, of which the Ullet-road church was the great-great-granddaughter, with the links of Castle Hey, Benn's-garden and Renshaw-street, as commemorated on a tablet in the church.

Turning to the ecclesiastical events of the year, Mr. Odgers said that these had been so fully dealt with at the Leicester Conference and the Association meetings in London, that he should not attempt to go over the same ground again; but having alluded with satisfaction to the decisions of the Archbishops on the subject of incense and reservation, he dealt more fully with the subject of confession. If the practice of hearing confession was to be tolerated, it must be recognised and it must be regulated. At present it was contraband, it had about it an element of concealment and private arrangement which was equally bad for confessor and penitent, and it was practised under circumstances (in private houses and lodgings) which the Roman Church would not for a moment permit. If there was to be confession, sacramental, auricular confession, as distinguished from that going for comfort and counsel to some "discreet and learned minister of God's word," as the exhortation before Communion said—(and it was absurd to say that this means that, because a comparison with the earlier forms showed that the existing form was framed so as expressly not to mean confession)—if they were to have confession, they must have every bit of the romance of doing something rather risky taken out of it, and must have it in the hands of men approved by the bishops for the purpose and holding faculties from them; they must not have youthful curates trying experiments in moral theology—they must have, in short, the Roman system, which was, he believed, considering the immense area of its application, singularly free from the evils which popular suspicion not unnaturally associated with it. He was not willing to criticise a neighbour's creed, and shrank from commenting on another's worship; but the National Church was their business, and he for one could not bear to see that Church perverted and Italianised.

When the young people of their congregations and families went over to the Church, he did not think it was primarily because they had been slowly and by process of reason convinced on certain doctrinal points, because they found the religion in which they had been brought up to be erroneous according to reason or scripture. They had found, oftentimes, that it was wanting in certain things which they hoped to find elsewhere, and they sought only sufficient justification in their own minds for seeking elsewhere what they believed themselves to need. And that to which they willingly submitted themselves under new surroundings often included a regulation of life, a devotional habit, and a doing of strenuous and self-denying things—not at their own pleasure, but because an appeal was made to do those things for the sake of religion; they found themselves associated with people who were doing the same, and attached to an organisation which progressively led them into a full life of real and worthy work, which they could not easily have found for themselves. He believed their young people were as unselfish, as little self-indulgent as any, and they were too shy of appealing to them for self-denying labour, and left them, in the amateur stage of trying to do a little good, with too little help and direction. They all wanted to be more open and direct with the word of religious faith; they all wanted more communion and sympathy on the religious side of life. They wanted in their churches the voice of common prayer and common praise, common need and common effort. Having begun his ministry with unswerving loyalty to the idea of free prayer, he had become a convert to liturgical services, not because he wanted anything ritual or more capable of fine music, but because he wanted to be but an impersonal voice in the worship of the congregation, to pray with them not for them, to escape from his own too familiar thoughts and anxieties, to be immersed in common wants and aspirations, which led them hand in hand to the rock which is higher than they. (Often he thought of the petition of the old American minister, "Lord preserve us from praying too beautifully.") They did not perhaps know how the book helped those who had difficulty in finding their own words, or even making a space in life for trying to do so. It helped young people far away from the old home to join themselves in spirit with the worshippers at the times of Sunday service; its familiar refrains fell on the ear in sickness, to banish pain and foreboding. And that was largely due to the fact that it was not a manual of private devotion, but in the first place recalled the worship of the congregation, and gathered the lonely into the fellowship of common prayer, and so set the solitary in families. He was far from deprecating the use of manuals of private prayer, but was speaking only of one of the things which their young people often truly wanted, and which they found in the prayers of the Church of England.

Having referred once more to Dr. Martineau and Mr. Thom, as two men who in a singular degree were complemental to each other, and to Mr. Henry Arthur Bright, to whose efforts the association of missionary activities with that Assembly had been largely due, Mr. Odgers concluded with expressions of congratulation and good wishes to the congregation which was receiving the Assembly that day.

He then moved:—

That this Assembly mourns the vacant place upon its roll of membership, which, for sixty-seven years has borne the name of Martineau.

While heartily joining in the manifold tribute of recognition, called forth from every side by the remembrance of his services in the fields of philosophy and theology, it is ours, especially, to commemorate his unwavering attachment to the cause of Liberal Religion; the simplicity of his loyalty to truth; and the breadth of his Christian charity.

Meeting in Liverpool, the scene of his ministerial labours for five-and-twenty years, we naturally recall the lofty and generous tone he imparted to inevitable controversy; the holy thoughts which, enshrined in noble words, went forth, far and wide, from his pulpit in Paradise-street or in Hope-street, to help and cheer men and women of every creed and communion in their common endeavours after the Christian life; and his constant efforts to build the future of our free congregations upon personal faith, and to add to faith knowledge.

Some of those now gathered here rejoice, with a deep thankfulness, that it was their privilege to know him as minister and friend—many that it was theirs to be his pupils, and to be knit to him by deepening attachment as they, in their turn, took up the work and burden of their day—many more gratefully acknowledge what they owe to him for his help in their private meditations and devotions, and in the prayers and praises of the Church.

All alike, we rise up and call him blessed. And while placing upon the minutes of this ancient Assembly the record of our sorrow and our gratitude, we send to those who sit under the deeper shadow of bereavement the assurance of our most respectful sympathy.

Mr. R. R. MEADE-KING, in seconding the resolution, said that his father, Mr. H. W. Meade-King, as, perhaps, the oldest friend of Dr. Martineau in Liverpool, and a member of Paradise-street congregation before Hope-street Church was built, had been asked to fulfil that duty, but was not now able to take part in public meetings. He then quoted Mr. Gladstone's tribute to Dr. Martineau's eminence as a religious thinker, and also the resolution moved by Dr. Martineau on the formation of the Free Christian Union in 1867 (given in THE INQUIRER of June 16, in Mr. Clayden's letter), as well expressing his ideal of religion. They reverenced the memory of Dr. Martineau as a deep philosophical thinker, recognised by all sections of religious believers as perhaps in this century the greatest mainstay of Theism as against Agnosticism or materialist ideas, as a great preacher and teacher of preachers, and as having lived that noble and simple life in the cultured quiet of his home circle.

The resolution was passed by the Assembly in reverent silence.

Mr. WILLIAM RATHBONE, who had been asked to support the resolution, was detained by business in London, and was unable to be present. A letter from him was read to the meeting, in which, having expressed his regret and explained the cause of his absence, he said:—

I regret this all the more as I must be one of the few men left who are old enough to remember Dr. Martineau's life in Liverpool, and also because I recently have had opportunities of gathering impressions of his latest views upon a question of vital interest to your meeting.

Last year, and also the year before, I had conversations with him which impressed me very much. We were speaking on both occasions of the missionary work of Unitarianism, and I mentioned the importance of getting our young men of promise to serve two or three years as Home Missionaries in our large towns before taking congregations. On both occasions—I do not remember his exact words—but he spoke anxiously about one of our difficulties: it was that so many Unitarians of the present generation had wandered away from the Christianity of Christ, whom they classed with other great religious teachers, and not as their own special leader, teacher, and Master.

No doubt God reveals Himself in all great religious leaders, and to all that seek and listen; and there are those who can worship an abstract power which "makes for righteousness," as Matthew Arnold expressed it. But struggling, hurrying, ordinary men in every rank generally cannot do this, nor will education enable them to do so. Anyone who has watched this throughout a long life must have seen that more and more as the world grows busier do men need and demand leaders—democracies most of all. If they cannot get a good leader, they will follow a bad one. Personal love of and gratitude to Jesus Christ I have found the most powerful motive among the clearest minds and greatest benefactors of mankind.

If Dr. Martineau could only have expressed publicly what he said to me of his strong feeling that it was the want of this special personal devotion to Christ in too many of our young students and ministers, and their consequent failure to inspire such a devotion in their hearers, that stood in the way of their power and usefulness, we might no longer have to regret that our faith does not spread, especially among the classes upon whom it first took hold.

The minutes of the last meeting of the Assembly having been read and confirmed, the Treasurer, Mr. JOHN DENDY, made his statement of accounts, showing a balance of £37 17s. 1d. at the beginning of the year, increased to £77 8s. 1d., in hand. Subscriptions had been received from thirty-five churches in the Province.

An invitation to hold the next meeting of the Assembly at Oldham was unanimously accepted. Mr. John Dendy was elected President, and the Rev. H. S. Tayler, of Dukinfield, was elected Supporter for 1901.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON presented the report of the Committee on Public Questions, which was taken as read. The report opened with some passages dealing with the war in South Africa, which will be found printed in full among our "Notes of the Week." It then dealt with licensing reform, and with public education, both elementary and secondary.

The Rev. Dr. KLEIN, in moving the adoption of the report, said that none of the questions destined to affect the social and religious welfare of men were matters of indifference to the members of that Assembly. At a time when so much natural excitement prevailed in connection with the war some were of opinion that so controversial a subject might have been left out of their proceedings; but he ventured to say that what would be most properly left out was not the subject, but the controversial spirit in reference to it. To say nothing of a question so absorbing would savour of affectation more than of moderation. It would seem to imply that war as such did not involve religious issues, and therefore did not come within the province of that Assembly. Few would really sympathise with such a view. His duty was to commend to them the general tone and spirit of the report. They would all agree where it showed not a feeling of exultation but of undoubted sadness at the sight of a conflict between two Christian peoples, and they would also agree that the right of public discussion was sacred, and must be upheld by those who recognised the paramount claims of the individual conscience.

Turning to the section of the report which dealt with licensing reform, he said that of the long list of recommendations quoted from Lord Peel's minority report, not all were of equal importance, but they would all support the recommendations for the closing of the back doors of licensed houses, the abolition of grocers' licenses, and music and dancing licenses, and the prohibition of the sale of intoxicants to children under sixteen. As to education, that he felt to be a radical question, and he had little sympathy for the policy of mere compromise. So long as education was a political question, practically in sectarian hands, they would have a sort of educational patch-work, and not an efficient and just system. It was said that a people always had the Government they deserved, and they might say that a nation always had the educational system it deserved. They must have a society for the propagation of educational interests among parents. The New Code was only another instance of the policy of patching up, instead of grappling with the real question, to make education national, equal to the best given elsewhere, and religiously just and fair to all citizens in town and country.

The motion was seconded by Mr. JOSEPH COVENTRY, and adopted with one dissentient.

The Rev. C. J. STREET then moved on behalf of the Committee:—

That this Assemb'y, convinced of the urgent need of temperance reform in the interests of the sobriety and happiness of the people and the welfare of the State, and recognising in the recommendations of the Minority Report of the Royal Commission on the Licensing Laws, signed by the Chairman, Lord Peel, and eight of his colleagues, a series of practical proposals, calls upon all those who have the best interests of their country at heart to unite in pressing for speedy legislation in harmony therewith.

That this Assembly welcomes the passing in the House of Commons of the Second reading of the Bills for the Suppression of the Sale of Drink to Children under sixteen years of age, and for the extension of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act to Monmouthshire; and authorises the President, on behalf of the Assembly, to sign petitions to the House of Commons urging that these Bills shall be speedily passed into Law.

Lord Peel's report, he said, represented the minimum of what they aimed at and still hoped to achieve; they were practical proposals on which all advocates of temperance might be united. As to the sale of drink to children, Liverpool had set an honourable example of how to deal with that question.

Mr. ROBERT D. HOLT, in seconding the motion, said that it was a misfortune that the temperance question should be identified with one political party. What they had done in Liverpool, through the co-operation of the magistrates and watch-committee they were anxious should become the law of the land.

The Rev. A. COBDEN SMITH referred to the work done by Miss Harriet Johnson in the matter of the sale of drink to children.

The Rev. E. ALLEN opposed the resolution as an unwarranted interference with individual liberty.

With his solitary opposing vote, the resolution was carried.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND moved the adoption of the report on missionary activity, which showed that while new churches had been opened at Liscard, Urmston, Bradford (Manchester), and Ashton-under-Lyne, during the year no new ground had been broken. The total receipts of the four district associations had been, from congregational collections £500 13s. 3d., and from subscriptions and donations £823 5s. 6d., rather less than in the previous year. Mr. Drummond called special attention to the following sentences of the report.

Your Committee notes these facts without any desire to undervalue the quiet, patient, and successful work which is being carried on in many centres; but it would at the same time emphasize the fact, that too many churches are allowed to come into existence and continue for a long series of years under most depressing pecuniary conditions. When finance becomes the keynote of the life of a church, there is inevitably some drawing away of thought and energy from its central religious interests. Your Committee is impressed, further, with the impossibility of meeting these steadily growing financial needs by spasmodic efforts. It is large collections yearly given by the wealthier churches in the joy of doing good, and a large and well organised subscription list which alone can meet the need.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES seconded the motion and said that his experience as a treasurer was that where people were convinced that good work was being done, money was forthcoming. They must begin with the work, not with the raising of funds. Their wealthier churches needed to realise more fully their responsibility to stand by the weaker churches, not with any feeling of charity, but as members of one family helping one another.

The Rev. C. J. STREET pointed out that the report had overlooked the establishment of the new Halliwell-street Mission in connection with Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, and also described the establishment of independence funds for other churches in East Lancashire, which would liberate the funds of their mission for further work.

The motion having been adopted, the Rev. H. E. DOWSON presented the report of the Advisory Committee, which on the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Mr. JOHN DENDY, was received, and the meeting then terminated.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea a well-attended public meeting was held in Hope Hall, Mr. HENRY JEVONS, J.P., in the chair. During the evening a quartet, under the direction of Mr. T. Lee Lloyd, rendered some part songs very beautifully and with great acceptance.

An opening hymn having been sung, the CHAIRMAN offered a hearty welcome to the members of the Assembly. They heard, he said, a good deal about the decline of Unitarianism in the country, but he did not believe there was any valid evidence to that effect. There were certainly far more Unitarians outside than inside their body. Having referred to their new church at Ullet-road, and their desire to make the services in every way acceptable, he put in an earnest plea for more regular attendance at public worship.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Mr. JOHN DENDY, the best thanks of the meeting were accorded by acclamation to the minister and congregation of Ullet-road Church for their hospitable reception of the Assembly, and to the chairman for presiding. To this Dr. KLEIN and the CHAIRMAN responded.

Sir J. T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P., then addressed the meeting. Taking for a text the Committee's report on Public Questions, he said that the reading of that report had been to him an extreme refreshment. As to the first part of the report, dealing with the war, he thanked the Committee with all his heart for what they had said on that subject, and for their amusement he would read an extract, which had come into his hands, from the Birmingham Daily Post. The extract was as follows:—

To show the depth of their patriotism, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which several Birmingham gentlemen are members, have elected that opulent pro-Boer of Swiss descent, Sir John Brunner, M.P., as president.

On that he remarked that to be the son of his father was a thing to thank God for daily. That he was opulent was a trouble he had to bear, but he endeavoured to make the fact as little offensive to other people as possible. The British and Foreign Association had elected him as their president, because they believed him to be what he was, earnest and sincere, and absolutely loyal to the principles they upheld. On the subject of temperance, as on most others, Unitarians had earned the character of not being extremists, and they would do well to support those who advocated legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's report. For himself, he would refuse a license to anyone who did not provide for the public honest victuals as well as drink. They were all licensed victuallers, and he claimed that gin was not victuals. That principle he had first heard advocated by the late Thomas Knowles, formerly member for Wigan. From an early age he had been engaged in laborious work, and knew the temptations to which workmen were exposed. He related how again and again he had seen men come up from the pits exhausted by their labour in a close hot atmosphere, and get drunk on a pint of beer, who if they had had a bite as well as a sup would have gone home sober. If that were understood it would not be called tyranny to impose that rule on all license-holders.

Turning to the question of public elementary education he expressed a wish that in non-School Board districts the clergy would have as much regard for the consciences of Nonconformist parents as they had for Catholics. The report did not in his opinion speak with sufficient sternness on the subject of the new block grant, in the application of which the best schools would suffer. Some levelling was good, but to level down, and take away the grant from good schools was not the way to encourage them or those not so good. He did not grudge the extra grant to the less efficient schools, but even with a shilling income-tax he wished the grant to the best schools could have been left where it was. As to the gap between elementary and secondary schools, he gave an instance of what his own firm had done. About nine years ago, with the full concurrence of the parents, they made it a rule that all boys in their service should attend a night school until they were seventeen. He had been struck by the good results of such a system at Wildbad in the Black Forest, and had also been impressed by reading a report on agricultural education in Würtemberg, which showed how the insistence on higher education during the past forty years had raised that people from one of the poorest to one of the most prosperous in the kingdom. By adopting that rule the most gratifying result had been attained, as shown by the number of County Council scholarships gained. He confidently recommended that method of bridging over the gap between elementary and higher education.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED then gave an address on "Our Differences, Political and Religious." He said that when he was asked some weeks ago to speak at that meeting he had been travelling in Italy. He was told to choose his own subject, and after carrying the thought of it with him for some days, he replied that he could not choose his subject, for it had chosen him, and there was none other on which it would be possible for him to speak, but it might not be thought suitable for that meeting. On this he received a renewal of the invitation at the unanimous wish of those who were responsible for the meeting. Their political differences at the moment struck very deep, and they were compelled to acknowledge that the cleavage was a moral one. It was true that on the subject of the war either side was convinced that the other misunderstood the facts, and yet the ultimate reason of the difference was that they differed in their moral estimate of the difference of things. Their judgment differed not only where they were not agreed upon the facts, but where they were agreed. Where such a moral cleavage arose, they were obliged to say that they had clearer moral sight than those from whom they differed, but they must not on that account claim to be better men. They had failed in the attempt to persuade or convert the other side, and the one hope that they might once more stand side by side with their brethren was that each should work out to the full extent the moral principle which was at the heart of the position they took up. And so it was with their religious differences. Argument and controversy were not sufficient. They must on each side get at the foundation principles of spiritual life on which they rested, and work them out more consistently; and if they had not to revise the truth they held, they must yet revise their presentation of the truth. Of some men it was said that they were better than their creed; for themselves it would be well if they came somewhere near being as good as their creed.

[A fuller report of Mr. Wicksteed's speech we shall publish next week.]

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, owing to the lateness of the hour, only added a few words, but spoke with much feeling of the association of Dr. Martineau with Liverpool, and also of John Hamilton Thom and Charles Beard. Remembering such men, to come to Liverpool was like a pilgrimage to him. He also paid homage to the laymen of Liverpool, from whom they received such loyal support in their work.

After a closing hymn, the Benediction, pronounced by Dr. Klein, brought the meeting to an end.

NOTES FROM DARJEELING.—II.

Darjeeling, May 23, 1900.

ONE of the first things that strikes you, after leaving the plains, is the marked change in the cast of feature in the natives. Your attention is at once arrested by the Mongolian type of countenance, with broad face and flattened nose. As the hills are ascended men of the different Mongolian races become more numerous—Lepchas, Limboes, Nepaulese, Bhutias, and Thibetans. The population of Darjeeling itself is a conglomerate of many races, wholly different in appearance and customs from the people of the Bengal plains.

The Lepchas, Bhutias, Thibetans, and Nepaulese form the most important portion of the hill tribes met with in Darjeeling.

The physiognomy of the Lepchas is markedly Thibetan in its character. The language, I am told—for, of course, I do not know it, and I have no intention of acquiring it—is radically identical with Thibetan, though there are important points of difference. They wear their hair Thibetan fashion, plaited into pig-tails; and their religion, such as it is, is a modified form of Buddhism. All these facts point conclusively to the trans-Himalayan origin of Lepchas, though they differ in many respects from their Thibetan prototypes. Still this race has been hemmed into the Sikkim track of mountain country, barely sixty miles in breadth, of which Darjeeling is a division, for a period of three hundred years.

The Lepcha is much employed on household and outdoor work in Darjeeling. He is a capital carrier and mountaineer, is full of fun, very peaceable, and has the reputation of being honest. As household servants they are, however, given to pilfering. He seems to be shorter and a little fairer than other hillmen. His features are distinctly Mongolian. His complexion is sallow; his face is broad and flat; his nose is also flat; his eyes are oblique; he wears a pigtail; has no beard, and little, if any, moustache. Though womanish in the cast of his countenance, he has invariably a mild, frank, and even engaging expression. The young girls are pleasant to look upon, not from any beauty of feature, but from their smiling faces and evident good nature. The children also are bright, lively, laughing urchins.

Men and women dress almost alike, and as the men have no hair about the face, the only way to distinguish the sexes is by looking at their heads; the men have one pigtail and the women have two. Their powerfully developed legs, befitting genuine mountaineers, are always exposed. They wind themselves in a cotton garment, "originally" white, with red and blue stripes, gathered in at the waist, and reaching to the knee. In the winter they wear a loose-sleeved upper garment. I have just said that the cotton kirtle was "originally" white. The Lepchas as a race show a decided aversion to soap and water. Their garments and their persons are dreadfully dirty, and they wear their clothes till they drop off. The women, who can afford it, adorn themselves with a profusion of ornaments, silver hoops in their ears, necklaces of cornelian, amber and turquoise—these brought from Thibet—pearls and corals from the south, with curious silver and golden charm boxes or amulets attached to their necks or arms. These last are of Thibetan workmanship, are often of great beauty and highly ornamental, and of considerable intrinsic value. They contain little idols, charms of written prayers, or the bones, hair, or nail-parings of a Lama. The men carry in their girdles the straight, long knife, called the ban, which is used as a weapon of defence, as a table-knife, as a tooth-pick, as an axe, as a hammer, as a plough. It has a wooden sheath, one side of which is open, the blade being kept in position by some cross bands of tin. A small mat made of leaves and bamboo serves them for an umbrella in the rain and a bed at night. Their only musical instrument is a rude bamboo flute; and after the fatigues of the day the Lepcha will sit for hours making music with his flute, singing in a monotonous tone, or telling stories. Marriages are contracted in childhood. The wife is purchased by money, or by labour rendered to the future father-in-law. The marriage-tie is strictly kept, its violation being heavily punished by beating, slavery, &c. In this respect the morals of the Lepchas are far above those of their Bhutanese and Thibetan neighbours. Their worst faults are indolence and a penchant for gambling.

The Bhutias are of several classes. Some are natives of Bhutan; some come from Thibet; a third class is indigenous to Sikkim; a fourth is a cross between the Thibetan, Bhutia, and the Lepcha. Taking all the varieties together, it may be said generally that the Bhutias, unlike the lazy Lepchas, are active and industrious, but turbulent, quarrelsome, and fond of drinking "murruwah"—a native liquor made from millet. In Darjeeling they become dandy-bearers, rickshaw pushers and coolies. They are tall and of large frame. Their capacity for carrying heavy loads is marvellous. They usually carry their burdens by means of a strap fastened across the forehead. Of their morals the less said the better. They are the most immoral and dirty race in the Himalayas. The marriage tie, where it exists at all, is little respected. One woman may at the same time have several husbands, and she is often the wife of all the brothers. Like the Afridis and other frontier tribes in the north-west of India, the Bhutias are born robbers and thieves. The women generally smear their faces with a kind of dark red paint, supposed to be pig's blood. Square amulets of gold and silver hang from their necks, which also are adorned with strings of glass beads, corals, and turquoise. Their ears, heads, fingers and toes are likewise adorned with silver and gold. Like the Lepcha women, they wear charm boxes containing scraps of Buddhist sacred writings and, sometimes, small idols. On their left wrists they have a white shell. The men often wear a smaller one on the thumb.

They seldom, if ever, change or wash their clothing. Their garments, in consequence, are dreadfully filthy. The men wear a white wide-sleeved mantle which reaches down to the ground. At night it covers the whole body. During the day it is hitched up at the waist by a belt or a rag of unknown hue. The upper part of this garment forms a receptacle into which they cram all sorts of incongruous articles, including often putrid fish or meat, which they use as a relish with their food. From the belt hangs the long straight knife. The women have the same long gown as the men, but wear an apron of many colours, and sometimes a black or white surcoat. Men and women alike have one or two long pigtails. The men sometimes wear felt caps. The women never cover their heads.

Many of the Bhutias keep large herds of cattle in the Forest Reserves, and bring into Darjeeling supplies of milk and butter. They are the medium of a large portion of the trade in salt, wood, musk, cattle, &c., with the Thibetans. They bury their dead on the mountains, raising cairns over them. Their religion is a sort of depraved Buddhism. Their priests, or Lamas, of which there are numbers, may be recognised by their red dresses. Both priests and people make much of the revolving prayer-machine. Inside of this are printed prayers several yards long. They hold it in the hand, and make it rotate from right to left, whilst monotonously repeating the sentence, Om Mani Padmi Om—that is, "Hail to him of the Lotus and the Jewel." Bhutanese huts and villages are easily recognised by the fluttering pieces of cotton cloth found hanging from tall bamboo stakes which surround their houses. The writing on these rags are prayers and charms intended to be wafted to heaven by the wind as a preservation against the "evil one." With all this, they are greatly given, as I have said, to drunkenness, and distil all manner of alcoholic poisons from rice, wheat, and millet. Yet they are of a particularly humorous disposition, and are always to be seen laughing and joking with each other. There are several Bhutian villages within a radius of six or seven miles from Darjeeling, where the race may be seen amidst their evidently congenial surroundings of mud and filth.

Close to Darjeeling, in a Bhutian busti, or village, is a Buddhist monastery or Gompa, which is a good specimen of the religious houses to be met with all over the Eastern Himalayas. In the upper storey live the Lamas. In the lower, which the high priest will gladly show you for a little present, is the temple. At the entrance are a number of prayer wheels, large and small. Some are simply twirled by the hand; others are turned by ropes or straps; a few are actually rotated by water-power. On the occasion of my visit one, about six feet high, was revolving at the ring of two bells. Soon after my entrance it stopped. Several Lamas were counting their beads, and repeating the never-ending prayer already mentioned, the only prayer the Bhutias know. This, with the counting of the beads, is the popular religious exercise necessary for raising them in the scale of transmigration. With the aid of that talisman the love of which is said to be the root of all evil, I had no difficulty in inducing some Lamas to again turn a praying cylinder, and say their prayers, that is, drone forth the never-varying invocation, Om Mani Padmi Om, not with a very grave face, but with an amused smile and a twinkle of the eye that implied confession of the sham. In a dark inner room, which you are requested to enter with uncovered head, are three Buddhist idols on a glass-panelled altar, with many sacred vessels, holy-water, &c., in front of it. On both sides of the altar, in pigeon-holed shelves, are scores of Thibetan, Chinese, and Sanscrit manuscripts carefully wrapped up in cloth. The room also contains big drums, gongs, thigh-bone trumpets, and human skulls made into small drums.

The sole occupation of many Lamas is the printing and transcribing of books. Others make the flutes, whistles, cups, and various vessels used in their worship. A third class are doctors and conjurers, who profess to cure diseases by exorcising evil spirits, and to bring on rain at seasons of drought by certain mysterious rites. Certain Lamas are taught in the monasteries such handicrafts as the manufacture of clothes, boots, hats, &c. Others again are skilled in cooking, baking, and housekeeping generally. The ragged, dirty Lama mendicant is often enough seen in Darjeeling. He wears a black mask, dances, sings, and perhaps plays on some oddly shaped musical instrument. An equally dirty and ragged urchin collects the alms that are offered by the onlookers. The Lama carries with him the inevitable praying-wheel, and as he whirls it round he chants out in dreary reiteration the invocation to him of the Lotus and the Jewel—Lord Buddha.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bath.—Last Saturday afternoon a meeting of the Trim-street congregation was held in the schoolhouse, Sawclose, prior to the annual congregational picnic, for the purpose of making a presentation to the Rev. F. W. and Mrs. Stanley, on their removal from Bath. Mr. J. T. Linsley, senior chapel warden, presided, and warm and affectionate tributes were paid by the chairman and Mr. A. Taylor, to the value of Mr. Stanley's services during his twenty years' ministry, both as preacher and friend. In these acknowledgments Mrs. Stanley was associated with her husband. On behalf of the congregation, Mr. Linsley then presented to Mr. Stanley an address expressing great regret at losing him and Mrs. Stanley, "tried friends who, during twenty years, had unflinchingly laboured for the good of the chapel and all connected with it," and wishing them success and happiness in their new sphere of work in London. The address was accompanied by a travelling equipment and a purse of money. Mrs. Fisher next asked Mrs. Stanley's acceptance of a silver tea kettle and stand, bearing the inscription: "Presented to Mrs. F. W. Stanley by the Trim-street congregation as a parting token of affection. Bath, July, 1900"; and, lastly, on behalf of the Ladies' Working Society, Mrs. Lewis offered an oil painting and a coloured miniature portrait of Mr. Stanley. The Rev. F. W. Stanley, in acknowledging the generous gifts, said that his good friends made it very hard for himself and his wife to part from them. He had come from College to Bath and had remained twenty years, never having had during the whole of that period the shadow of a difference with his people. He had received from them great and continued kindness, and he should never forget them, or the dear friends once with them but now "behind the veil." He had lived so long in Bath and so much admired the city that he hoped he should never entirely sever himself from them. He had accepted a position in London because he felt that his duty lay there, and because after a long ministry in one place work became increasingly difficult. He wished his old friends all happiness. Mrs. Stanley having also expressed her appreciation of the references to herself, the proceedings terminated, and the majority of those present set out in breaks and on cycles for Farleigh Castle, Wiltshire, where the annual picnic of the congregation was held.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—The 60th annual report has just been issued. The Committee congratulate the subscribers on the fact that the Mission, so far from showing any signs of the decrepitude of old age, was never in a more vigorous condition as regards all the institutions connected with it. The report of the Missionary (Mr. W. J. Clarke) states that the general work of the Mission is now probably covering a wider area, and embracing the varied activities of a larger number of agencies than ever before. The various forms of the Mission operations include Sunday religious services (morning, afternoon, and evening), Sunday-schools, teachers' preparation class, classes for physiography, experimental chemistry, sewing, dress-cutting and making, vocal and instrumental music, basket-making, reading and writing, drawing, netting (the last four named being for crippled children only), recreation-room, cricket club, social gatherings, Band of Hope, magazine circulation, flower distribution, mothers' meetings, advice bureau, poor children's summer outings and winter cinderellas, sick, savings, and benevolent clubs, visits to and from the poor, &c. The following City agencies are also given a place in the report on the ground that the Missionary (Mr. W. J. Clarke) is the hon. secretary of them, and that the administrative work of each is mainly done by the Mission staff: Police Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, Distressed Military Veterans' Association, Open-Air Court Concerts Association. Particulars are also given in relation to assistance rendered by the Mission staff in the work of the following societies:—Walliker Garden Parties, Travellers' Aid Society, General Hospital Samaritan Fund, and Daily Mail Reservist Fund. The report states that about 12,000 visits have been paid to and received from the poor during the year; that 2,929 medical notes, 1,325 garments, 1,616 parcels of books and bunches of flowers have been distributed; upwards of £800 having been disbursed in the various channels over which the benevolent activities of the Mission are spread. The treasurer's report discloses an adverse balance of £368, with respect to which the Committee express the hope that the remedy will be found, rather in the needed addition to income, than in reduction of expenditure, which would probably decrease the usefulness of the Mission. Mr. Clarke's report concludes as follows:—In conclusion, let me say that never before have we been surrounded by so earnest, so willing, so devoted a band of workers; never have so large a number of young people been gathered about us; and best of all, never have our Sunday religious services been so largely and so regularly attended, never more characterised by true devoutness and sincerity, never more a source of real help and blessing to the worshippers than at the present time. Once again I desire to express my solemn conviction that these Domestic Missions of ours are among the truest, the noblest, embodiments of Christ's own conception of what a Church of his should be I have ever heard of or met with. God forbid that we should magnify our office; and God forbid, on the other hand, that we should fail to realise how sacred is the nature of the trust committed to our charge, how solemn are the responsibilities it involves, how priceless beyond measure are the opportunities it brings. For my own part, the longer I live the more firmly do I become possessed with the belief that of all forms of organised effort yet devised for the higher service of man, none bear a closer likeness to the religion taught and practised by Christ himself than do our Domestic Missions, and none, therefore, are more surely on the side of those forces, visible and invisible, which are for ever making for the reign of truth and righteousness, of justice and love, the whole world over.

Blackley.—As the existing school is to be pulled down at once to make room for a more convenient building, a closing party was held on June 16, and was numerously attended by past and present workers in the Sunday-school. After tea a meeting was held, at which a number of speakers gave interesting reminiscences of their connection with the place. Songs and glees were rendered at intervals, and a thoroughly successful party was concluded with a dance. On June 17 the Sunday-school anniversary was held in the afternoon and took the form of a flower service. The chapel was prettily decorated, and there was a good congregation.

Blackpool.—Sunday services are now held both morning and evening by the South Shore Unitarian congregation, meeting in the Masonic Hall, Waterloo-road, as well as at the North Shore Church in Banks-street. Visitors not only to Blackpool but to Lytham and St. Anne's-on-the-Sea should note this fact.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The Rev. H. M. Livens, who is leaving Bolton for Brighton, preached farewell sermons on Sunday last, at the conclusion of a ministry of seven-and-a-half years. On the previous evening a tea-party was held, under the presidency of Mr. J. Entwistle, when Mrs. F. Taylor, on behalf of the congregation, presented to Mrs. Livens a silver tea service, with expressions of gratitude for the ungrudging work she had done, and regret that the state of her health compelled their removal to Brighton. The Chairman then presented to Mr. Livens a handsome edition of Tissot's "Life of Jesus Christ," and a purse of gold, with the congregation's earnest good wishes and an expression of their own deep sense of loss in his departure. Mr. Livens having acknowledged the gifts and thanked his friends for all the kindness and support in his work which they had given, Messrs. F. Taylor, J. J. Bradshaw, and others spoke, and the Rev. C. J. Street bore testimony to the public loss involved in Mr. Livens's removal from Bolton. Mr. Livens is about to enter on his new ministry at Brighton, and will be succeeded at Unity Church by the Rev. Wilfred Harris, of Longsight.

Cardiff.—Services in connection with the Sunday-school anniversary were held at West-grove Church, morning and evening, Sunday, June 24. The church had been prettily decorated for the occasion, and special hymns were sung. Dr. Griffiths, of Pontypridd, preached with great power and effect in the morning; the evening service being taken by Mrs. W. Phillips, of Nottage. By her address, which interested the children while it taught the wise, she delighted the congregation, from whom she will always receive hearty welcome on future visits.

Deal.—The Rev. T. Shakespeare acknowledges receipt of the following amounts for the Chapel Repair Fund:—B. and F. U. A., £10; Miss Preston, £1.

Glossop.—The anniversary services were held on June 17. Perfect weather favoured the occasion, and, in consequence, the congregations were exceptionally good. In the afternoon the annual procession of members, scholars, and friends took place, and, as the custom is, two hymns were sung in the public square. This procession is looked upon as a kind of demonstration, and it is pleasing to report that the muster was larger than it has been for many years past. The Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, conducted the services, and preached eloquent and inspiring discourses, which were listened to with sustained attention. The beautiful church, of which Glossop Unitarians are so justly proud, appeared to be well filled at both services. Nearly £40 was collected in the church, and as a rough index to the size of the congregations, it may be stated that this sum was made up of 527 coins, of which 219 were given in the afternoon and 308 in the evening. In every respect it was an inspiriting celebration, and will encourage the congregation to persist in holding the fort in the face of many and serious difficulties.

Guildford.—This year's flower services were very successful, the congregations and the offertories being unusually large. Special gratitude is due to the organist and choir for their helpful rendering of the music, by which so much may be done spiritually as well as æsthetically for the strengthening of our churches.

Hinckley.—On Sunday week, June 17, the Sunday-school anniversary services were taken by the Rev. C. Roper, of Manchester. There were full congregations and good collections. The anthem was Sullivan's "I will sing of Thy Power," the children singing special hymns, Mr. W. Rowlett (of Leicester) at the organ. On Whit-Monday last the senior scholars and teachers organised a waggonette party to Bradgate Park, when about forty joined in what proved a most enjoyable excursion.

Liverpool Sunday-school Society.—The annual summer meeting was held at Liscard on Saturday, June 23. The afternoon was spent by the teachers and their friends in a ramble, in which little groups went their own way through the parks and along the shore, all meeting at the Liscard Memorial Church at 5.30 for tea, at which they were hospitably entertained by Mr. Thomas Gare, a member of the congregation. A cordial vote of thanks to the Liscard congregation and to Mr. Gare, moved by the Rev. J. C. Hirst, President of the Society, seconded by Mr. F. Robinson, was carried by acclamation, and was acknowledged by Mr. W. Woffenden, chairman of the congregation. After tea a religious service was held in the Memorial Church, conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. L. Haigh.

London: Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.—The Rev. Joseph Pollard, having been obliged to resign his ministry after nineteen years' service at this Mission, several "farewell meetings" have been recently held. At the invitation of Mr. Pollard, the Sunday-school teachers and choir met at the Mission on June 20 for a farewell party. On June 22 a most interesting ceremony took place before a large number of members of the Mission, when Mr. H. C. Brison presented to Mr. Pollard an address and a gold watch, engraved with the following inscription:—"Presented to Rev. Joseph Pollard by the congregation, teachers, and scholars of Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, on the occasion of his resignation after nineteen years' ministry. June 24, 1900." Mr. Pollard was greatly affected, and having said a few words of thanks, the meeting was brought to a close. A further presentation was made last Sunday afternoon before the assembled school, and in the evening Mr. Pollard preached his farewell sermon to a large congregation. It is with feelings of deepest regret that all members of the Mission say "Farewell" to one who has worked so faithfully amongst them for so many years.

London Sunday-school Society.—The aggregate service for elder scholars was held at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon last, June 24, under the auspices of this Society. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., of Highgate, who was supported on the platform by Miss M. Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. F. W. Turner, and Mr. Harold Wade. The anniversary service, compiled by Miss Maud Turner, was again used, the choirs of the Essex Church, Highgate, and Newington Green schools, under the conductorship of Mr. F. W. Turner, leading the singing. The scholars joined heartily in the service, and Mr. Sunderland passed a well-deserved compliment on the singing, which certainly reached a high standard of excellence. About 300 scholars, all of the age of fourteen years and upwards, attended the service, representing the following thirteen schools:—Avondale-road, Bermondsey, Essex Church, George's-row, Hackney, Highgate, Kentish Town, Limehouse, Newington Green, Portland-street, Stamford-street, Stepney, and Unity. Mr. Sunderland, taking for his text Revelation iii. 8: "Behold I have set before thee an open door," dwelt earnestly on some of the ways by which all might enter more deeply into life, the "open doors" of work and service, of knowledge, history, literature and art, and, while impressing on his hearers the great value of good reading, good companionship, and good thoughts, he urged them to remember that of all the open doors the most important were those within them, the doors of heart and conscience leading direct to God. The hope was expressed that the address might be printed and distributed amongst our schools for consideration in detail, as it contained much concentrated truth, and would undoubtedly open the door for many a useful lesson. The best thanks of the Society are due to Mr. R. Pritchard, of Highgate, who, at a moment's notice, ably presided at the organ.

Manchester: Strangeways.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 17, the preacher, morning and evening, being the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton. The church was effectively decorated with flowers and plants. Special music was rendered during the day by the choir and the new organist, Mr. G R. Grundy. In the afternoon a flower service of song, the compilation of the Rev. W. R. Shanks, was given, when the story was read by Mr. Henry Stanley with much acceptance. All the services, in view of the day, and the conditions affecting the locality, were successful.

Nantwich.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday, conducted by the Rev. J. Morley Mills. At the afternoon service an address was given by Mr. R. Mansell, of Shrewsbury. Special hymns and other music were rendered by the children and the choir, and the offertories were satisfactory. A peculiar interest attached to these services, as they also marked the close of Mr. Mills's eight years' ministry at Nantwich.

Remonstrant Synod of Ulster.—The annual meeting of this Synod, representing Bangor, Templepatrick, and Armagh Presbyteries, was held on June 20, in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast. The proceedings began at noon with divine service, followed by a sermon by the outgoing Moderator (Rev. A. Gordon, M.A.) upon the text, "The end is not yet" (Matthew xxiv. 6). In the course of his retiring address, Mr. Gordon referred to the easy way in which the churches in this country were getting along as compared with England, where Ritualism had been making progress. He alluded to their code of discipline, which some years ago had been revised, but never published, and recommended that a summary of the most important portions of that code should be printed for circulation. Rev. W. E. Mellone was elected Moderator for the ensuing year; Rev. J. Hall, Crumlin, clerk; and Rev. S. C. Pinkerton, Newry, assistant clerk. Rev. J. A. Kelly presented the Financial Committee's report, and Rev. J. Smyth, M.A., Banbridge, submitted the financial statement. The report, together with the following, were adopted:—Incidental Fund account, presented by the Rev. J. H. Bibby, Ballee; Ballymena Church account, presented by the Rev. James Hall; and Presbytery reports, presented by the Revs. F. Thomas, S. C. Pinkerton, and J. A. Kelly. The trustees were reappointed, a vote of condolence being passed with the relatives of the late Rev. D. Thompson, Dromore, and Mr. W. H. Malcolm, of Holywood. On the proposition of the Rev. A. Gordon, seconded by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, the following notice of motion was adopted:—"That the question of a revised edition of, or summary excerpt from, the Code of Discipline be referred to the General Purposes Committee." The benediction terminated the proceedings.

Ringwood.—The first distribution of prizes from William Clark's School Fund took place at the British School on Friday, June 22. Mr. Conway presided, and explained that the fund originated with the late Mr. William Clark, who left money for the education of children connected with St. Thomas's (Unitarian) Chapel. For some years the fees for the education of such children had been paid to the British School, but the passing of the Free Education Act and its adoption by the school had rendered necessary an application to the Charity Commissioners, which had resulted, after delay which threatened to be interminable, in the framing of a new scheme for the administration of the fund, which had been sanctioned by the Commissioners, under which the trustees, who were still to be appointed by the subscribers to the Unitarian chapel, might give prizes to the pupils of the British School. Mrs. Conway then distributed nearly a hundred prizes in the form of books, writing desks, workboxes, and medals to the successful pupils. After a few words from Miss Polden (one of the trustees), Mr. Culver, Mr. Roberts (School Attendance Officer), and Mr. Morgan (Head Master) the proceedings terminated.

Shrewsbury.—The 110th anniversary of the Sunday-school in connection with the High-street Free Christian Church was commemorated on June 17, when appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. J. C. Street. Special hymns were sung by the scholars, and good collections taken on behalf of the school fund. The following Thursday the annual out-door gathering took place, at which there were about one hundred scholars and friends, and notwithstanding occasional heavy showers, a very pleasant time was spent.

Sunday-school Treats.—Successful Sunday-school summer treats are reported from Kirkcaldy on Saturday last, and Nottage on Tuesday.

THE Secretaries of the London Sunday School Society write to say that there is urgent need of more suitable country homes to which the children of our Sunday-schools may be sent for a summer holiday. At present there are twenty-five children on the lists for whom the Society is unable to make arrangements owing to the lack of country homes. The summer is now here, the school holidays will shortly commence, and we shall therefore be glad if anyone knowing of such homes will communicate at once with the General Secretary to the Fund, Miss Toye, 156, Stepney-green, Mile-end, E.

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR is announced to preach to-morrow (Sunday) morning at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. We understand also that next Thursday afternoon at 3.30, a meeting is to be held at the Imperial Institute, under the presidency of Lord Northbrook, at which Mr. Mozoomdar will deliver an address on "Present Day Progress in India." The meeting is freely open to all who would be interested to attend.

THE annual meeting of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches was held at Norwich on Tuesday, and in the evening a service was held in the Octagon Chapel, for the induction of the Rev. Alfred Hall, B.A., as minister, the charge being delivered by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, and the charge to the congregation by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, a former minister of the Octagon Chapel. A fuller report of these meetings we are obliged to postpone until next week.

THE Manchester District Sunday-school Holiday Home was opened last Saturday, a number of friends from Manchester and Sheffield and other places, in addition to the parties from Pendleton and Lower Mosley Sunday-schools who are the first to occupy the Home, taking part in the proceedings. The account which we have received will be published next week.

THE Mill Hill Chapel Record for July contains a letter from the Rev. C. Hargrove to his congregation, written partly on the voyage home and partly on June 29 after his arrival, telling of the great interest of his visit to America and of his Sunday preachings, which ended with the services on two Sundays on board the s.s. Ethiopia, by which he and Mrs. Hargrove returned. During the present month Mr. Hargrove is preaching a series of sermons on subjects suggested by his American visit, and the first of these on "Lessons from the New World:—I. The World Beyond Time. A Lesson of Diffidence" is published in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. The sermon deals with the discoverers of the New World, and makes of their experiences a parable of what we shall find in that New World, which is still beyond all mortal sight.

THE Rev. T. L. Marshall has resigned his seat on Dr. Williams's Trust, on account of his inability to attend the quarterly meetings of Trustees. Mr. Marshall was Senior Trustee since Dr. Sadler's death, having taken his seat on the Trust so far back as June, 1853, when he was elected as minister of the Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney. For the same reason Mr. Marshall has withdrawn from the Board of Managers of the Sustentation Fund, of which he was a member since its formation in 1883.

THE final volume of the great "Dictionary of National Biography," edited at first by Mr. Leslie Stephen, and latterly by Mr. Sidney Lee, and published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., was issued at midsummer. The work, which is now completed in sixty-three volumes, was projected by Mr. George M. Smith in 1882. The first volume was issued at the beginning of 1885, and, according to the original plan, with unbroken regularity and marvellous promptitude, a new volume appeared every quarter, until the whole was published. The first twenty-one volumes were edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen, ending with December, 1889. Then Mr. Sidney Lee, who had been assistant, became joint-editor for a year, and when in the spring of 1891 Mr. Stephen, owing to continued ill-health, was compelled to resign, Mr. Lee brought out the last thirty-seven volumes as sole editor. The dictionary contains 29,120 biographical notices, of which 27,195 are full substantive articles, and it claims to give some account of "all men and women of British or Irish race who have achieved any reasonable measure of distinction in any walk of life."

THE Preface to the last volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography" gives some very interesting statistics as to the contents of this monumental work. Of the letters of the alphabet, B has the greatest number of names, 3,078, C has 2,542, S and H each 2,420, and M 2,310. Of particular names Smith (with Smyth or Smythe) is far beyond the rest in the number of individuals recorded there being 195, while Jones comes next with 132, and then Stewart (in various forms) with 112. Brown has 102, but Robinson only 63, while Davies is above him with 68. There are 29,103 pages in the Dictionary, so that the average length of an article is not quite a page; but to Shakespeare 49 pages are allotted; while Wellington comes next with 34, Francis Bacon with 32, Oliver Cromwell 31, Queen Elizabeth 28, then after ten others, Wycliffe with 21 pages. The total number of contributors to the Dictionary have been 653, of whom 56 died before the work was completed; the bulk of the work was, however, done by about a hundred regular contributors.

OF the contributors to "The Dictionary of National Biography," Mr. Sidney Lee, in addition to his work as editor, has written the largest amount, in 820 articles, making as much as three volumes; Mr. Leslie Stephen, in 904 articles, as much as two and a-quarter volumes; the Rev.

HEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

Alexander Gordon, in 691 articles, as much as a volume and three-quarters. Among the other most voluminous contributors are the Rev. William Hunt, Mr. W. P. Courtney, Dr. A. W. Ward, Dr. Norman Moore, Mr. James Gairdner, and Dr. Richard Garnett. The names of only seven contributors appear in each one of the sixty-three volumes, and among them Mr. Gordon and Dr. Moore. Among the chief of Mr. Gordon's articles are those on Edmund Calamy, the elder and younger, Paul Cardale, Dr. Lant Carpenter and Mary Carpenter, Dr. Doddridge, George Fox, W. Gaskell, J. Kenrick, J. Kentish, Lodowicke Muggleton, John James Tayler, Jeremy Taylor, Charles Wellbeloved, John and Charles Wesley, Whitefield and James Yates. Among the articles by contributors no longer living are Professor Freeman's on Alfred the Great, Mr. Richard Hutton's on Walter Bagehot, and Mr. Alexander Ireland's on Leigh Hunt. The Dictionary must certainly be regarded as one of the most notable achievements of the century, a monument not only of the high ability and diligent promptness of the editors and their chief contributors, but of the high courage, the generous ambition, and public spirit of the publisher, who out of his own resources has accomplished so great a work.

HIBBERT TRUST.—The Trustees, at their recent meeting at University Hall, passed the following resolution :—

"That the Hibbert Trustees, at their first half-yearly meeting after the death of Dr. Martineau, desire to place on record their deep reverence for his character and genius. They remember with feelings of veneration that his long life was devoted to the service of that pure and simple Christianity to the furtherance of which the Trust is dedicated and that he so brilliantly exemplified in himself, those high scholarly attainments which it has been one of the leading objects of the Trustees to foster in those who were preparing for the Christian ministry. With especial gratitude would they refer to the sympathy and advice which he was always ready to communicate to them, particularly at the time of the inception of the Hibbert Lectures, and to the eloquent defence of the principles of religious liberty and the free study of theology, which from time to time they heard from his lips at the social gatherings after their summer half-yearly meetings. In him they have lost not only a great and distinguished man—a leader of spiritual thought and defender of a spiritual faith, but a personal friend whom they must always remember with heartfelt respect and affection."

SUSTENTATION FUND.—The Board, at its meeting on June 27, made grants to the amount of £1,225.

WORDS are to thoughts what gold is to the diamond. It is needed for the setting—but a small amount suffices.—Voltaire.

DARK skies must clear, and, when the clouds are past,
One golden day redeems a weary year ;

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR'S THOUGHT OF CHRIST.

THE Messiah Pulpit of New York for June 8 contains a sermon by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar on "Oneness with God" in which he maintains that in Jesus is revealed to the world the true way of the soul's union with God. He will not call himself a Christian or a Unitarian because to him Christianity means a special theology and ritual and dominion, but he would call himself and all true men "Christmen," because in Christ is the truest revelation of God to man. The conclusion of the sermon is as follows :—

The greatest thing in man is his moral character. If intellectual men are immoral, what is their philosophy? If poets and men with a strong perception of beauty are immoral—as so many of them have been—what is the benefit of their sentimentality? It is purity of conscience that giveth wings to an inspired thought; it is the holiness of the mind that deepens the emotions of the heart. Religion is holiness : righteousness exalteth a man as well as a nation.

In all countries, I have told you, there are grand utterances about God, and there are aspirations after beauty. But it is a singular thing that the religion of Christ hath furnished motives for moral character which, with all their erratic teachings, the Christian churches have adopted. No religion enforces moral character so effectually as a religion of Christ. Christ was above all things a sinless soul, a holy being, a sanctified soul; and he sanctified himself, not for his own salvation, not for his own peculiar advantage. He sanctified himself for others. He sanctified himself that we might be sacred. He showed his holiness of example that our sins might be purged off, and we might become pure as he was pure. Thus in sonship, in the love of man, in the beauty of character, in the balance between the greatest faculties of man's nature, the example of Christ among men stands supreme, and oneness with God is thus effected.

There can be no oneness with God without oneness with man, and the test of Christ and his Father being one is in the fact that Christ and all men and women have become or are going to be one. Union with God is often a selfish aspiration. Union with God is then proved true when union with man is a reality. Christ's mode of being one with other men was his love for them. In these days, so many hundreds of years after, men want to do good to men through the agency of swords and gunpowder. They want to conquer, to defeat, to slay, to break nations to their yokes. Have they been able to do so? Conquest has its advantages and its disadvantages. We know that very well, because we are a conquered people. England's conquest of India has brought innumerable benefits to us; and you might say the same thing of Russia's rule of Central Asia. Russia has given to Tartary and the Mongolian Empire more civilisation, more knowledge, than these countries before possessed. But where is the oneness of heart? where is the soul's union? where is the brotherhood between man and man? We know the Boers' weaknesses. Within a day, and perhaps even now, the country of the Boer will be at the feet of the British. But will the Boers and the British feel as brothers after the conquest more than they felt before? And the Americans and the Filipinos? That is the question which religious men must answer. First conquer the soul by love, subdue meanness, the most fallen soul, and then unite it to the highest, the noblest, the most pure love of God. That is how Christ dealt with men.

Let great nations go out to those that are not great, let superior peoples rule over the inferior peoples; but let all the rule be through Christ's love, through Christ's sympathy, through that wonderful relation which he established between God and man.

The unity after which nations sigh, therefore, is the unity of the soul with the soul, the union of the Son with the Father, and the union of the man with the man, in the spirit of Christ.

O great and glorious Spirit, shall we be aliens from Thee forever? Shall this feeling of estrangement in us forever trouble us and make us sore? We pray to Thee, reconcile us to Thyself. So change our minds that our thoughts may make the grandest and sweetest music with Thy voice. So fill us that we may learn to love as Thou lovest, always, all things; that we may love with the purity which is at the bottom of Thy love; that all things may fill us with the sense of the presence of Thy love, of Thy holiness, of Thy fatherliness. We know we are Thy children, yet we know we are far from Thee. We have striven and struggled; and our whole life has been like a wandering, endless pilgrimage. O Father, now take us home to Thyself, and let us abide in the joy of our oneness with Thee, as Christ was one with Thee. Also grant that we may be one with men; that their sins may not make us angry or impatient, but that in forbearance and in forgiveness and in the truest, deepest love we may become one with all men. Make the world Thy household; and, whether we are here or there, grant that we may behold Thy love in all men and become one with Thee and one with them. And to Thee shall be all the praise forever.

LIFE'S UNDERTONES.

WE do, and then we repent,
We say, and at once regret,
But the deed is done
And the word has gone,
And in vain do we pray, forget.

A tone, and the heart turns sick,
A touch, and the hand grows cold,
For a hope has fled,
Or a wish is dead,
Or a love is left untold.

A breath, a glance, or a sigh,
And the soul shrinks back in pain,
And the golden gleam
Of the spirit's dream,
Is never the same again.

POETIC INFLUENCES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

II.—The Awakening to the Spiritual.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

"God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."—John iv. 24.

LAST Sunday I spoke of the Revival of the Sense for Nature during the past hundred years. I now take up another and a kindred Poetic Influence of the century, which may be described as the Awakening to the Spiritual. The perception of the beautiful and the perception of the divine are not, of course, identical; but they often go together, especially in the English character, and in the nineteenth century they have been so intimately blended that many of our teachers conspicuous for the one have been remarkable also for the other. Not a few of the great names I mentioned last Sunday I shall refer to again this evening.

Let us go back to Priestley's wig. The drowning of that piece of head-gear in the Atlantic in 1794 may be said to mark the close of wigged and powdered civilisation in England, and of its artificial, materialistic conceptions. Priestley's own mechanical philosophy went down into the waves and billows. The old Necessarian theology, which was the outcome in part of the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, in part of new interest in physical science, but chiefly of a dull formality and prosaicism of life, yielded to the new and tempestuous energies of the period. Priestley and Paley, who embodied in their writings the heterodox and orthodox aspects respectively of eighteenth century religious thought, were, from our modern point of view, in substantial agreement. Impressed by the Power of God and the reign of law in the universe, they regarded man as an object in Nature, like a rock or a tree—as a creature among creatures above them but essentially of them, as a superior piece of divine handiwork or a lordly thing. Both, therefore, denied free-will and conscience, and practically everything of the nature of spirit in man; and they based their belief in God and a future life on the supposed miracles of Scripture. This is the sort of thinking which runs through all eighteenth-century philosophy, history, fiction, art, and verse, and either just robs them of inspiration or, more frequently, reduces them to clever commonplace. No doubt there were exceptions—such as Berkeley, and Butler, and the Wesleys. Charles Wesley's hymns are the most spiritual poetry we have between Milton and Wordsworth; and John Wesley, who was worth more than a hundred Priestleys and Paleys, touched the Divine Spirit in poor weavers and miners long before our learned classes realised that anything so sacred existed in the human heart. No doubt, also, there were protests, and gathering protests, against the prevailing dulness. Yet it is undeniable that the generations successively of Addison, Richardson, and Johnson were desperately matter-of-fact, wanting in the sense of mystery and sanctity, and consequently of possibility in man and hope for the world. On the other hand, during the last hundred years, in spite of numerous reshapings of the Necessarian doctrine and a strong temporary revival of Materialism through the discovery of Evolution, there has been a steadily deepening consciousness of the spiritual. In every form of culture, including even physical science itself, a loftier estimate of the human mind has made its way; so that while Priestley could complacently regard the soul as made up of something like his own oxygen, Tyndall has been driven to confess that its mystery fills him with awe and reverence, and that he must bow his head in the dust before it.

I have already spoken of the "Lyrical Ballads," published in 1798—four years after Priestley's departure to America—as an expression of Wordsworth's joyous sense of the beauty of the outward world. To this volume Coleridge contributed the "Ancient Mariner," the dreamy, weird fancifulness of which is an early indication of his dissatisfaction with the dry and unimaginative Unitarianism in which he had grown up. Coleridge had admired Priestley, named his son after Hartley, Priestley's brother-philosopher, and written a sonnet of regret at Priestley's exile from England; but in 1796, in a time of affliction, he acknowledged that his Unitarian philosophy lay by him "as toys by the bedside of a sick child." He was altogether out of his element among the Unitarians of that period. Their practical and precise temper, their desire for what was "plain and simple," and their consequent suspicion of everything subtle, romantic or enthusiastic, were a weight upon his visionary, soaring spirit; and, as Dr. Martineau says, "on the first opening of his cage of experience he darted out and took to his metaphysic wing." This soon happened. The "Lyrical Ballads" brought a little money which enabled its authors to make a trip to Germany. There Coleridge discovered Schelling and Kant, and took leave for ever of the English materialists. An entirely new world opened itself to his wondering thought, with star-depths, and depths beyond the stars. The inner contents of the mind—the self, the will, personality, obligation, conscience, divine grace and forgiveness, disclosed in man not mere delicate mechanism but spiritual elements which are begotten, not made. The real Coleridge was born—Coleridge the metaphysician, the interpreter of St. Paul, Shakespeare, and the founder of a school of Broad Churchmen which has included F. D. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, Frederick Robertson, Dr. Arnold, Dean Stanley, and Tennyson.

Somewhat later, but independently, German thought stirred another revolter from eighteenth-century materialism—Thomas Carlyle. As Coleridge turned from the Necessarians, Carlyle rebelled against Bentham and the doctrine of Utility. He protested that duty was more than prudence, that religion was not merely hope of reward or fear of punishment, nor knowledge a mere useful science. Such interpretations missed the real meaning and beauty of life. They took no account of the "infinities," or to use another of Carlyle's favourite words, the "immensities" of the world and the soul. Man's best powers are not called forth, he said, by sugar-plums of any kind. The heroic, which slumbers in him somewhere, must be roused. Stir the inner genial life of him, and difficulty, abnegation, pain and self-sacrifice will be the allurements of his nature. We want, he said, a new sense of the miraculous. The universe is full of miracles. The soul itself is a perpetual miracle. Now is a miracle. Science is a miracle. Often what is termed secular is profoundly religious, and so-called religion is sometimes profane. Thus taught Carlyle, like Coleridge a layman, awakening the sense of God and immortality in people who were unaffected by the clergy—so that a devoted admirer of Sartor Resartus could say "Carlyle is my religion." His influence spread to America, and helped to create the "Transcendentalism" of Emerson and Theodore Parker.*

Meanwhile, a third and very different revolt from eighteenth-century "superficiality and dryness"—to use Newman's own words—began within the Church itself. The Tractarian movement at Oxford was emphatically a protest against the old Evangelicalism. Newman was as impatient of the Calvinists as Coleridge had been of the Unitarians. He disliked their clumsy, cast-iron theology, their worship of Scripture and lack of Biblical scholarship, their contempt of philosophy, their want of taste, their savage views of Hell, and dismal vision of Heaven. The Evangelical scheme of religion was hateful to him. Yet he equally hated "Germanism." While Coleridge found new meaning in Christian doctrine by the light of German metaphysics, Newman was afraid of this new Rationalism. It led nowhere, he declared. French Scepticism had already brought the world into a quagmire through Rousseau and Hume. Why go further into chaos? Reason cannot find the light. It is a part of man's fallen and perverted nature. No; we must go back. We must cease questioning, and trust only our sense of what is beautiful and holy. And because the Church of the Middle Ages and of the days of the Fathers was beautiful and holy, we must return to its faith. Such are the pleadings which, enlisting the devotion of the High Churchmen, have, by the revival of venerable pieties and practices, quickened the life of the Establishment.

These three movements, associated respectively with Coleridge, Carlyle, and Newman, were vigorous together, clashing with the older thought and stirring the spiritual energies of England, when a fourth influence, insignificant at first compared with these but persistent, and destined, I believe, to outlive and outgrow them in the future, began to show itself. This was Liberal Christianity.

In 1794, the year of Priestley's settlement in the States, Channing, aged 14, entered Harvard to study law. At the end of his course, shocked by French materialism—which had grown with the disappointments of the Revolution and crept into America through alliance with France against England—and by Calvinism, he had made up his mind to be a preacher. At college he met with opinions like these:—"Man is merely an animal; he has no soul; self-interest is the law of life"; or "Human nature is corrupt; there is nothing good in it; some men are predestined to salvation and

* Preached in All Souls' Church, Belfast, in May, 1900.

* Writing to Miss Aikin in 1840, Channing asks "Will you tell me what place Carlyle holds among you—whether he influences opinion? We have some signs among us of a 'Transcendental School,' as it is called—that is, we have some noble-minded men, chiefly young, who are dissatisfied with the present, have thrown off all tradition, and talk of deriving all truth from their own souls."

Heaven, others to everlasting punishment; there is no free-will." And he said to himself: "These are lies—old, wicked falsehoods from Europe. Man is not depraved, nor selfish by nature. He is a spiritual being. He is not a creature of circumstances, but the child of God, with something of God in his poor human flesh, which enables him, in a measure, to shape his own destiny, and grapple with evil, and rise to God." A tutorship in a slave-owner's family in Virginia brought him into contact with the worldliness of the Southern planters, and confirmed him in his determination. He was too young to share in the hopes of the French Revolution with Wordsworth and Coleridge, and he, therefore, felt less of its failures; but his hatred of Napoleon was as intense as theirs. Napoleon stood to him for the evil genius of the Old World—for the spirit of force and cunning and pride and tyranny; and is his fall at Waterloo he saw the judgment of God. He preached the sermon at a great thanksgiving service held in Boston, and at his words "The oppressor is fallen, the world is free," the congregation sprang to their feet and cheered.

Soon his burning words crossed the sea to England, mingling there with the vague, magic tones of Coleridge and the bleak, prophetic cry of Carlyle. "The handwriting of Divinity," he said, "is in the soul. . . . There is in human nature an affinity with what is mighty, an awful delight in what is sublime. . . . The heart of man is made for worship. . . . Its secret longing is for freedom from evil, and for growth in wisdom and righteousness." It was the same message as theirs, but spoken by the living voice to the people. Coleridge said: "The differences between Channing and myself are apparent, not real—the same truth in different relations." And Channing's illustrious disciple was Carlyle's follower and friend, Emerson.

Emerson in America and Martineau in England worked on parallel lines. I once asked Dr. Martineau if he consciously owed much to Emerson, and he said he did not. They were independently followers of Channing, though Martineau had first to break away from the mechanical philosophy of Priestley; and independently, Emerson leading, they went beyond Channing in dispensing with the miraculous—or rather, with the miraculous in its old sense. Channing, though he never laid stress upon them, had a place in his theology for the New Testament miracles. Emerson and Martineau agreed with Carlyle that of this sort miracle was really "monster," and a hindrance to the Gospel. Christianity, they declared, required nothing non-natural to recommend it. Its own inherent truth and beauty were its sufficient recommendation. Both thinkers were Intuitionalists of the very highest order; but while Emerson was a seer pure and simple, with rare moral insight, a truer and deeper sometimes even than Martineau's, especially in social subjects—but with strange inability to rationalise his conclusions,* Martineau had the keen logical faculty which grappled with the task of weaving the new thought into a philosophic system.

The central truth of their teaching may perhaps be found in Martineau's principle that "Infinitude attaches not merely to quantities like Space and Time, but to qualities as Beauty and Sanctity. It contrasts forcibly with Bentham's dictum that "Pushpin is as good as poetry if you have enough of it." It also conflicts with the hypothesis of the materialistic Evolutionists, that all differences of kind are ultimately only differences of degree. He accepted the theory that "life first appeared in plant form on this globe, and was followed by sentient types, passing by innumerable gradations from the most simple in organism and function to the present nature of man"; but he vigorously combated the idea, entertained by not a few, that life could be derived from the lifeless, feeling from insentiency, thought from unconsciousness, the moral from the pleasant, and responsible self-directing personality from the automatic. These different elements probably had appeared at successive periods of creation, but the higher were more than mere complex elaborations of the lower. From this uncompromising attitude, Martineau became the recognised champion of spiritual thought against the Agnostics.

Lastly, akin to Liberal Christianity, but less openly hostile to orthodoxy on the one hand, and more sympathetic with physical science on the other, and therefore, though more academic in spirit, more influential in many directions, is the so-called School of English Hegelians, associated chiefly with the names of Thomas Hill Green and Edward Caird. These men have met Agnosticism on its chosen ground of Reason, taking up their station on the opposite wing to Newman and the High Churchmen in the Army of Faith, and nearest, of all the defenders of Religion, to the modern scientist. On which account, perhaps, they have done more than others to bring about a change in Agnosticism itself. Certainly the story of Nineteenth-Century Agnosticism is much more interesting and inspiring than that of Eighteenth-Century Scepticism. It has not a trace of the frivolity of the latter. Bentham, James Mill, and Alexander Bain would do with a little gaiety. They are dense and dull beyond redemption. But Tyndall is eloquent and enthusiastic, and there is real poetry in Herbert Spencer's immense generalisations. Best of all, there is an ethical greatness in some of the Agnostic leaders. Professor Huxley, for instance, who, as a philosopher, stands (as in his famous portrait) for the skull and skeleton of the universe, nevertheless expounds it with a brilliancy which wins reverence "for bones," and with a courage of denial that tells us he is a fighter and a Britisher.

Darwin has a higher attraction. His simplicity, patience, and tenderness are very beautiful. Above all, John Stuart Mill's candour and sweet serenity, and his sad but dutiful non-acceptance of the "unsearchable riches of Christ," mark him out as a saint among unbelievers. One cannot help feeling that all his life he was breaking away from his prosaic Benthamite antecedents, and reaching forward to God. There is something of the same in all the best Agnosticism. Not only are the "Unknowable and Incomprehensible Reality," and "the Not-ourselves which makes for Righteousness," and "the Stream of Tendency" which works for "the perfection of our being," significant departures from bare nescience, but the desire among the latest Agnostics to organise into Ethical Societies, and the necessity felt by some of them of linking ethical ideas with infinitude and eternity, point to further advance towards religion and to a reconstitution of belief on a distinctly ethical basis.

Now, this new spirituality reaches far beyond the philosophers and theologians. We find it in History, Fiction, Verse and Painting.

Take, first, History. We have had some great historians in the past hundred years; and among them is Carlyle. Compare Carlyle with our eminent historian of the eighteenth century, Gibbon. The contrast is most instructive. The subject of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" is immense—immense not only in range, but in its political and religious issues, and its lessons for the modern world. And Gibbon handles it with learning and eloquence. But he is without passion. He has little sense of the infinite pathos and tragedy of this vast chapter in human experience. He is not struggling with a theme which makes demands on his whole nature, a theme which eludes his power both of thought and speech, and leaves him, as it were, prostrate with the effort of grasping it. How different is Carlyle's treatment of the French Revolution or the career of Cromwell! Carlyle is a poet, as well as an antiquary and a rhetorician. He is inspired. He goes down below the surface of history to its terribly solemn or glorious significance. One rises from his books not saying, as one might say of Gibbon's, "How interesting!" or, "How well written!" or "What knowledge he has!" but rather "How wonderful life is! How awful is injustice! The hand of God is in human affairs."

So with our nineteenth-century Fiction. I have already contrasted Dickens with Fielding in the sense for Nature. The contrast is equally striking in the sense for the Spiritual. Clever, humorous, wise and large-minded as is the great eighteenth-century novelist, he has little of the insight of Dickens into the conscience. "Amelia" and "Oliver Twist" were both written partly to draw attention to social evil—one in our prisons, the other in our workhouses. The former is Hogarthian in spirit—full of irony, sarcasm, terrible and ghastly realism, with here and there a touch of fine beauty. The latter is realistic and often ghastly; but a new estimate of human nature runs through it. Something divine shines in the miserable story of sordidness and crime from the poor ill-treated workhouse child, and from the repentance of Nancy, while a supernatural terror dogs the steps of Bill Sikes and Fagan. The old hopelessness is gone; conversion is a reality; and a spirit of kindness after all prevails in a sinful world. We feel the same change in Thackeray and in all our chief novelists from Jane Austen to the new Scottish school, and not least in some of our women writers, particularly the Brontës, Mrs. Gaskell and "George Eliot.' In "George Eliot," Agnostic though she became in creed, beneath her philosophising and erudition, which now cease to interest, is her deep instinctive reverence for human nature, and her sense of her littleness before it, which are of the very essence of spiritual religion.

* "I delight," he said, "in telling what I think, but if you ask why it is so, I am the most helpless of mortal men"—a helplessness irritating and not a little weak to an intellect like Martineau's.

Again, look at our best Verse. Compare Wordsworth's "Prelude" with Thomson's "Seasons" or even Cowper's "Task." It is not merely that its sense of Nature is truer, simpler, and gladder than in those poems, but that its spiritual tone from beginning to end is on an altogether higher level. Without being doctrinal the "Prelude" is one of the most profoundly religious poems in our language, one of the books which all who put religion before theology rejoice to read and to see read. Wordsworth takes us completely outside of the ordinary theological world. He gives us no texts, no scheme of salvation, no arguments, no tiresome declaration of principles. He does not tell us what he believes so much as what he loves. And it is what we love that matters most. He takes us with him in and out of villages, over the mountains, and across the Alps, into dalesmen's cottages and London streets; and everywhere he makes us feel that God lives in the universe and in the hearts of men and women and children, that men are brothers, that duty and love are sacred, that,

> Dust as we are, the immortal Spirit grows
> Like harmony in music.

Similarly, compare Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and Browning's "Christmas Eve and Easter Day," with Gray's "Elegy" or Young's "Night Thoughts." The difference is unspeakable. The eighteenth-century poems, like the religious and philosophic teaching of the time, hover about the churchyard and the tomb; they are dark and melancholy, loving the twilight and the owl, and see a future life only through miracle and sign. But "In Memoriam" and "Christmas Eve and Easter Day" see God and Heaven through love; and dwelling on love, and on the bright and holy things of man's heart, they stir the immortal in us until we feel that it is impossible for the soul to perish. This is characteristic of Tennyson and Browning's poetry in general. Both are poets of Immortality by being poets of conscience and love; and they and Wordsworth have probably done more for spiritual religion than all the contemporary theologians and philosophers put together.

The same change, in conclusion, is seen in Art. Before the end of the last century the depraved aspects of life which Hogarth portrayed had largely disappeared from painting. His cruel satire had given way to Blake's allegory, and the pathetic little wretches in his pictures had been followed by the children and angel-faces of Reynolds. Allegorical and domestic art have since developed nobly. Watts and Burne-Jones stand at the head of a great school of mythological painters whose work has been often grandly spiritual, while Rossetti and Holman Hunt have revived directly religious art by introducing a new and rich suggestiveness into the old Christian themes. Child and cottage life, in painting as in fiction, have received much attention, especially from women such as Mrs. Ailingham and Kate Greenaway; and love for animals has produced a Landseer and a Briton Riviere. The change in the treatment of dumb creatures in Art is astonishing. Hogarth introduces them chiefly as the victims of butchers, cab-drivers, or inhuman schoolboys, but in the pictures of great animal painters they are represented for their own sake—for their beauty and character—or as the friends of man. Modern landscape, as I have said, sprang up partly in protest against city ugliness and sordidness; and though Turner never recovered faith in humanity, his mountains and clouds and seas and valleys are coloured with the sadness of human sin and littleness. The good side of life, however—its humour, its tenderness, its fidelity and heroism—is given by a noble company of modern artists among whom Leech, Tenniel, and Millais are conspicuous representatives. Millais is very great, with large human sympathies and deep religious insight. He is our Tennyson among painters—dwelling in his pictures, as Tennyson in his poems, on the goodness of love, on the grandeur of simple faithful lives, of duty bravely done, of common self-sacrifice and daily kindness; on the sacredness of the bonds which bind mother to child, husband to wife, old to young, weak to strong, friend to friend. In such things he finds the real, everlasting grounds of faith in God and the life to come.

This subject is far too large for me to do more than deal with it in brief outline in one sermon; but I hope I have been able to indicate in the time at my disposal that though the forces of Calvinism, Materialism, and Philistinism are still powerful in our midst, the spirit of Jesus Christ is rising up and gathering strength to scatter them.

CHILDREN'S MORNING CAROL.

JOYFUL sing!
Joyfully bring
Glad hearts filled with morn's sweet pleasure!
Not in gold,
Nor gems untold,
But in health lives earth's chief treasure!

Nought 'neath sun,
Better is done,
Than with birds to welcome morning!
Here's new day,
Good shall have sway,
Then kind sleep till comes next dawning!

Till life's last
Even be past,
May our waking breed no sorrow!
When fades light,
"Old Earth, Good-night!"
We will rouse in heav'n to-morrow!

THE MEANING OF INDEPENDENCE.

IN an address at the Boston anniversary meetings, on May 25, Dr. Edward Everett Hale spoke of "The New England Heritage of the Unitarian Movement." Having referred to the position of preachers in a creed-bound Church, he continued:—

"Now, thank God, every man who has been born in New England since the year 1620 has been born in the freedom with which Christ makes us free, and has known nothing of this supremacy. I have here (I will not read them) the covenant of the church in Scrooby, of the church in Salem, of the church in Charlestown which became the First Church of Boston, and so on down to the formation of the Congregational system under the lead of John Cotton. I do not think he is great for anything else. I have not found any words of him that have ever seemed to me worth repeating in the pulpit. But John Cotton is the historic founder of Congregationalism, and as such he deserves to be mentioned with the men who spoke the great words of the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Hoar told us a good story last night, when he told us how old John Adams, Unitarian of the Unitarians, died repeating the Unitarian motto, 'Independence for ever!' He might have gone on to say that the English language owes that word 'Independence' to those men who landed at Plymouth, to the people who were independent in religion, and that the politicians borrowed it from the religionists. When they landed there, they did not pledge themselves—no, not by an iota—to any individual religious or theological opinion. 'Independent'—each man, each woman, each child—but bound to 'walk together as it may please God to show us the way.' That is the foundation of Congregationalism—that we will walk together, each man as the Lord reveals himself to us. But that we will believe together, that we will speak together? No, never! Children of God, we will listen to God; and what God bids us, we will say.

"Now for the future. In this next century we are to see Absolute Religion become Universal Religion, the religion of the world. These old jealousies are to die out. People may have as many forms as they will, if only each child of God is to come to God, to listen to God, and to do what God directs him now to do. That is the religion of the future. The responsibility of introducing that religion must come to those who are willing to say that this is their hope, their trust, and their motive. It is for us, for the liberals of the world, cradled in these memories which I have perhaps taken too much time in trying to recall to you—it is for us to press forward on these lines for the future. Certainly, we have great encouragement. I was very much touched and interested when my friend Slicer said on Sunday night that he had been watching the Œcumenical Council from the beginning to the end, and that in that great meeting of what we call the Evangelical churches there was not one reference to hell, one reference to torment, one reference to the fear of God. Things have so changed that a great body like that shall present the love of God, the immanent presence of God here and now, as you might have had it presented at one of these meetings of ours. It is but twelve years since at a great missionary convention at Portland we were taught, on authority, that the nerve of foreign missions would be cut if we should intimate the slightest doubt about hell. So far have we come.

"I wish we might have had here the honour and privilege of the presence of one of the pure Congregationalists, our venerable friend Dr. Hamlin, the great missionary at Constantinople. He would tell us that, of all the agencies at work for the uplifting and renewing of the Turkish Empire, the strongest is the existence of the Congregational churches which are scattered up and down through Turkey in Europe and Asia Minor. A body of people of conscientious conviction—they have shown their conviction by their martyrdoms—are assembled together, under republican forms, in a Congregational church. They have their quarterly meetings, their annual meetings, they repair the church, they ordain a minister. All the neighbourhood knows that here are people who govern themselves, who have not to wait on any emir or pasha or other officer of the Sultan, who walk together, who ask God to help them, and who receive from God his light. Not only did Dr. Hamlin say this to me, but that gentleman so well-beloved in both continents, Mr. James Bryce, repeated the same thing to me. He said that whatever was the power which England had in Turkey through her navy and army, whatever was the traditional sentiment which united the Sultan to France, whatever Russia or Austria might compel him to do, the United States of America exercised a larger influence in the Sultan's Empire than any one of the other great Powers of the world, and that it owes this power to this Congregational system which has been introduced in the administration of the Protestant churches of Turkey. Mr. MacCauley has shown in his reports how the same thing is true in Japan, and in conversation with him it appears still more clearly. They do not want any more foreign ministers. They have organised the Japanese Unitarian Association, and they will manage their own churches. And, when he tells us that one of the leaders of the great political parties in Japan has united himself with the Unitarian Association and has become one of its officers, I understand that that man has read history well enough to know that the strength of an Empire consists in its being an empire of people, each one of whom comes to God for himself, and for himself receives his answer.

"I have taken more time than I meant to take. I have simply one word to say: that the personal right of the child of God to come to God for himself, and to receive God's whisper for himself, was asserted in the very beginning, in the covenant of the church at Scrooby. So far as it has existed in New England, it has made New England the leader of the world in constitutional liberty. And on that personal relation of the child to the Father depend the religion and the uplifting of the future."

OBITUARY.

MRS. WILLIAM BINNS.

WITH heartfelt sympathy for him whose loss is greatest, we record the death of Mrs. William Binns, which came suddenly and without pain at Blackpool last Saturday evening, in her sixty-third year. Only last October the Rev. William Binns resigned the pulpit of the Banks-street Unitarian Church, chiefly on account of his wife's failing health, who was suffering from heart-disease. Mr. and Mrs. Binns continued to reside in Blackpool, and her brave and cheerful spirit was active to the last. On Wednesday she was to have opened the new school-building at Banks-street, in the erection of which she had taken so deep an interest.

A daughter of the late Frederick Chapple, a Liverpool shipowner, Mrs. Binns was brought up under the ministry of the Rev. James Martineau at Paradise-street Chapel and at Hope-street, and on her removal for some years to London she also attended Little Portland-street Chapel. Returning north, she settled at Birkenhead and joined the Charing Cross Unitarian Church, and in 1869 was married to Mr. Binns. A woman of vigorous and active mind, well-read and of fine literary tastes, she had also a great fund of good nature and the most devoted unselfishness, which she expended in much wise and beneficent public work. A zealous minister's wife, she not only threw herself with the greatest energy into various congregational activities, the choir, home mission and Dorcas Society work, and especially the Sunday-school, but found a wider field in serving the best interests of the community at large. Thus during her husband's long ministry at Birkenhead, she was active in connection with the Women's Suffrage Association, and served as President, she was secretary of the Park Music Committee, and took part in the work of the Charity Organisation Society. The Shakespeare Society was one of her special interests, as it was with her husband, and on their removal to Plymouth they were again able to found a very influential society, which, as at Birkenhead, did much for the literary education of the town. Latterly at Blackpool she showed the same unselfish devotion, as sharer in her husband's ministry, acting as superintendent of the Sunday-school, and constant in her kindly interest in the members of the congregation.

On Sunday sympathetic reference was made at Banks-street Chapel to the sudden death of Mrs. Binns, by the Rev. D. Davis, who succeeded Mr. Binns as minister, and a letter of condolence from the congregation was sent to Mr. Binns.

The minister of the Methodist Free Church, at his evening service, also referred to the great loss the community had suffered.

The funeral took place on Wednesday, the service being conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal.

"To be ourselves, we must be more than ourselves. What we call love is, in truth, the finding of our own life in the life of another, the losing of our individual selves to gain a larger self."—John Caird.

THE INWARD LIFE.

A Prayer of Protab Chunder Mozoomdar's.

O THOU God of truth, Thou alone art real amid the unrealities that fill the earth. Thy constancy changes not, though the relations of life change. Wonderful is Thy power out of which this creation has sprung, Thy power which filleth every atom of us. Almighty God, art Thou not the life of all? What is this life which we have, which we love, which we did not make, which we cannot unmake? What is this life that filleth every cell of the mind, every impulse of the soul? Behold we live in Thee. Thou livest in us. Grant that we may live unto Thee. Grant that all these powers which Thou dost give us on trust may be consecrated to Thy service and glory; and when this framework of flesh, like an old garment, is cast aside, make us all like sparks, living and glowing in Thee. Thou all-seeing Witness, every deed of every man Thou beholdest, though no one can behold Thee. Every word of every mouth Thou dost hear, though Thy voice we cannot or will not hear. Before our mind hath taken shape in thought and our wish hath uttered itself in speech, Thou dost watch the very sources of thought and intention from within. What secret shall we keep? Into what darkness shall we flee? We therefore would look up to Thee, wait for Thy light, wait for Thy voice in the soul, wait for Thy judgment. Thou art infinite, eternal. Even if our voice was as great as that of the thunder, could we utter speech that would measure the greatness of Thy being? Even if our hearts were as deep and immeasurable as the sea, could we set a limit to the depth of Thy nature. All nations at all times have praised Thee; but who has been able to utter in full who Thou art, where Thou art, what Thou art? The sun, the great sun, hath its course marked out for it. The great ocean hath its bounds which it cannot go beyond. But Thou art beyond all, higher than all, deeper than all, without time, without beginning, without end. Yet Thy awful majesty, so great, is softened in such personal love for us, for our protection, that men have agreed to call Thee their Father. Thou begettest none. Thou art father to no one, yet from Thy fatherly love all the fathers and all the mothers of the world are. Thou dost kindle the golden lamp of love in every household. Thy guardianship doth cover man and beast. Thy hand feedeth them. Thou waterest the grass, and doth bless Thy beloved.

Soon are the loves of this world ended, and we forsake one another, we forget one another; but whom dost Thou ever forsake, or to whom art Thou indifferent? Best of friends, best of parents, best of all in this earth, Thou art glory above glory. Thy love, as our love, doth not blind Thee to imperfections, but through all unholiness Thy holiness goeth as a burning flame. The great conquerors of the world tremble before the awful majesty of Thy righteousness. The greatest saints bend their heads and weep in confession of sins. Yet the greatest sinner, the fallen soul, dost Thou raise by Thy sympathy, and givest him a place in Thy holy sanctuary. We know no other Saviour but Thee. We confess our sins to no one but Thee. None can sanctify us but Thy Holy Spirit; and, when the blessedness of Thy presence filleth us, our sorrows are forgotten. When Thou hast sanctified us, the profoundest peace fills our spirit. What great joy hast Thou spread over the world with a bountiful hand! What wonderful peace hast Thou given to the wings of the morning! What benedictions dost Thou shed from the kindled skies of eventide! Thou art the source of all beauty, the foundation of all glory; yet no joy or blessedness is like unto that which we feel when our souls are at peace with Thee. We came unto this earth with the consolation of Thy blessed peace; and we pray that, when we depart and others shall cry for us, we may smile with Thy smile, and enter into the abodes of Thy unspeakable joy. Thou art the One who is always the same. None can stand before Thy presence. Above all kings is Thy majesty, above all holiness is Thy holiness, above the heavens is Thy sanctuary. Thou art One. O our Father, O our Saviour, O our Friend, our Joy, we bow before Thee in the love and the lowliness of Thy peace.

And now for a minute let every sound cease, let even the language of worship be hushed, and in perfect silence let us commune with Him who is ever silent.

God is in the soul: the soul is still. Say farewell to all your senses, farewell to all your love in the world, and for a moment let us abide in silence with God.

From untruth lead us to Thy truth; from darkness, O Spirit, lead us to Thy light; from death, O Eternal, lead us to Thy eternal life. Thou awful One, let Thy countenance shine upon us in love, and do Thou keep us from all harm and from all danger. Peace! Peace! Peace!

"As he thinketh in his heart, so is he."—Prov. xxiii. 7.

"Whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely . . . think on these things."—Phil. iv. 8.

DID you ever hear of Elisha Kent Kane, how he twice sailed to the Arctic regions in search of the famous explorer Sir John Franklin who, some years before, had led an expedition there hoping to find a passage through the ice-bound seas to the North Pole, and had never returned? On his second voyage Kane was commander of the search party. He never found Sir John Franklin, and his own ship was surrounded by fields of ice. Some of his men fell ill from the bitter cold and want of suitable food, and he sent forth a little band of sailors with dogs and sledges to seek for some outlet to the open sea. Days passed and the sailors did not come back. Then Kane, though he was ill himself, fearing his men might be lost in the snow and want food and help, set forth in his sledge over the wide, lonely ice plain in search of them, and at last found their tent. As he lifted up the tent curtain, heavy with the snow that had fallen upon it, their weak voices greeted him with these words—"We knew we could trust you: we knew you would come to seek for us." It was not only the sailors lost in the snow who trusted this man who was their leader. Kane had all his life been so true and trustworthy, and had built up such a character that everyone who knew him had faith in him.

Now read another story of his life. When he was a schoolboy he was full of spirit and courage—the chosen leader of his companions—the first in all games and adventures. But, suddenly a severe illness fell on him and left him with a heart-disease which might at any time prove fatal. Knowing this, his father said to him: "Elisha, you will probably only live a short life; let it be a good one, that if you die early you may die in harness." The boy resolved that from that day he would do and be just the very best he could, that his years, if few in number, might be well spent. The consequence was that when he died (and he did not live to middle-age) he left behind the record of a noble life.

Those were strange words, were they not, that Elisha's father used when he told his boy that he must try to live a good life so that he might "die in harness?" Probably he meant something like this: "Make only good habits, think only good thoughts, and do only good deeds now while you are still on earth, because when you die you will wake up in the spirit world to find yourself in character just as you are when you leave this world." And this we all know is true. We believe that we shall wake up in the new life after death to find that we are cruel or tender-hearted, selfish or helpful as we have been in this life. See how needful it is, therefore, that we should make only good habits and live in right ways now, that we may "die in harness."

It is said that once upon a time in a village home in Germany lived a youth named Rip Van Winkle. He fell among bad companions who tempted him to go with them to drink at the village tavern. Instead of saying "No" and keeping steadily to "No," he gave way to their arguments, and went. After the first time it was easy to go again, and he used to say to himself one day after another, "I'll not count this time," and "I'll not count this time," till the habit became so strong he could not break it, or thought he could not, and he fell lower and lower till his old friends turned from him when they met him. What sort of harness had poor Rip Van Winkle made for himself?

Now for a happier story. There was once a sculptor in Italy who carved the faces of saints and angels so beautifully in marble that the peasants came long distances to buy them from him that they might place them in their little shrines at home, and the images he made were also put in the churches where the people in great towns went to worship. Every year he carved more perfectly than he had done the year before; still, there was always in his mind the thought of a face so pure and so grand that, try as he might, he could never fashion it by his tools. It was an ideal he had in his mind which he kept always in view, and he went on trying to produce it in marble, yet the faces he carved never equalled the face of which he thought.

At last, however, he succeeded. He carved a face so beautiful and so life-like that it seemed as if he had only to breathe upon it to make it live.

And this is something like what Elisha Kent Kane tried to do in regard to his life. He kept in view the thought of the character he wanted to build up, of the noble life he wanted to live. This was his ideal, just as the sculptor kept before him the ideal of the face he wanted to carve, and this was what poor Rip van Winkle did not try to do.

We do not always remember that we tend to grow like what we love and admire. If we admire what is good and beautiful we tend to grow beautiful in mind; if we care for good companions and choose noble heroes to follow we cannot fail to grow good and noble too. It is just so with the books we read and the thoughts we encourage. They influence us and tend to make us rise or fall. A wise man once said: "Tell me what a person's tastes are, and I will tell you what sort of a man he is." Rip van Winkle cared for bad companions, and he grew down to what he loved. The sculptor kept the idea of a beautiful face in his thoughts, and he carved only beautiful faces. Elisha Kent Kane treasured the thought of the good man he wanted to become, and he carried out his thought in his deeds. And this leads us above all to remember how people whom we reverence as saints and true children of God have been helped to live rightly by keeping the example of Jesus always before them and trying to bring his spirit into their everyday lives. So we grow like the ideals we keep in view, and the saying is true of children as well as of grown-up people, "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he."

The other day a number of children were writing essays about kindness to animals, and one boy said in his essay: "If we are good to animals, we tend to become kind to all our fellow-creatures—we grow helpful and merciful, and this is good for the world." Those were wise words, "This is good for the world"; for, you see it does not only matter to ourselves what sort of lives we lead, what kind of persons we are, what ideals we keep in view to guide our actions by; we each of us influence those about us by our words and examples. We do not know what good or harm some little word we speak, or some seemingly trifling deed of ours may do to others. And more than this, we hurt or help our companions more even by what we are than by what we do. Therefore, "whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely . . . think on these things."

WHOM SHALL I SEND?

GOD'S trumpet wakes the slumbering world:
Now, each man to his post!
The red-cross banner is unfurled:
Who joins the glorious host?

He who, in fealty to the Truth,
And counting all the cost,
Doth consecrate his generous youth,—
He joins the noble host!

He who, no anger on his tongue,
Nor any idle boast,
Bears steadfast witness against wrong,—
He joins the sacred host!

He who, with calm, undaunted will,
Ne'er counts the battle lost,
But, though defeated, battles still,—
He joins the faithful host!

He who is ready for the cross,
The cause despised loves most;
And shuns not pain or shame or loss,—
He joins the martyr host!

THE TEACHER'S IDEAL.

A HAPPY fortune has once more attended the Oxford Summer School for Teachers, of which this week we give a somewhat full report. The weather was delightful, and there was more than one perfect summer day. If the country had not the magic charm of spring or of the later autumn, there was yet abundant wealth of beauty in the woods and meadows, by the river, and in the college gardens, and the education of such a holiday, no less than the more serious business of the School, was fully enjoyed. Everything went smoothly. The numbers were not too great—about twenty less than last year, and yet sufficient to afford the pleasure and the stimulus of a considerable gathering, to furnish plenty of variety and energy to the discussions, and to leave with the lecturers the satisfaction of knowing that their good work would bear fruit in many quarters, and that altogether the undertaking was thoroughly justified in its results.

Our notes of Dr. DRUMMOND'S Sunday morning sermon can give but a poor echo of words that came straight out of the heart and went straight to the heart of many hearers; yet we trust that they may serve to recall to those who were present the deep impression of that hour of worship. Of Mr. CARPENTER'S course of lectures on the Bible in the Nineteenth Century we have attempted no report. They were far more than a record of critical results, and were rich not only in instruction, but in religious quickening, to those who grasped their scope. As an interpreter of the divine significance of ancient prophecy, Mr. CARPENTER does not leave his hearers without the kindling of the present Spirit in the passion for righteousness. We heard with the utmost satisfaction that there is good prospect of these lectures being repeated at Essex Hall in the autumn, and we would also hope that before long, in book form, they may reach a yet wider public.

The session was opened, as was most fit, with a service of devotion and an address of sympathy and earnest exhortation by the President of the Sunday School Association, the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, than whom no more faithful worker or more loyal friend of Sunday-schools could be found. He struck a note which was again and again repeated during the session, when he asked why it was that the name of TRAVERS MADGE was still held in such affectionate remembrance in the Manchester district, and replied that it was simply on account of his goodness, the impression left by his beautiful character, and the overflowing love with which he lived as a devoted friend among his scholars, showing to them in his own discipleship the pure spirit of CHRIST.

Of the lectures on practical subjects we are glad to furnish notes which should prove helpful to many teachers, and in subsequent numbers we shall be able to give more of these. The result as a whole is certainly to bring home to teachers with great force the seriousness of the work to which they are called and the noble ideal after which they have to strive. There is a great need, and a great opportunity; and the way has been made more clear by which strenuous work may become delightful in the thorough religious teaching of our children and young people, to strengthen and uplift and cleanse the life of this nation, and through the children as they grow up, to make our churches more effectual than they have been before as helpers to that great end, for the hastening of the Kingdom of GOD.

There was one practical suggestion made by Mr. BOWIE, which we should hope may bear speedy and very useful fruit. He pointed in his lecture to the undoubted inferiority of the teaching in our Sunday-schools to that of the day-schools, and reminded his hearers of the great progress made in elementary education within the last generation by means of the system of inspectors and the Code, which not only furnished schemes of instruction graded to the intelligence of the children of different classes, but gave directions and made suggestions as to every branch of school management. Thus a high standard was kept constantly before the teachers, while experience was not idle, but led repeatedly to fresh improvements in the Code. And his proposal was that the Sunday School Association, with the aid of representative teachers in different parts of the country, and especially the Principal and professors of Manchester College, should attempt for Sunday-schools something of what the Education Department had so effectively done for the day-schools of the country. A system of inspection might be instituted, and, at any rate, a Sunday-school Code might be regularly issued, containing schemes of instruction for the guidance of teachers and suggestions as to the arrangement of the schools, the improvement of buildings in such matters as light and ventilation, the relative duties of teacher and superintendent, and whatever else might be helpful towards raising the standard of teaching and the general efficiency and tone of the schools.

The need of more guidance, both in the matter and method of teaching, is, we believe, very widely felt among Sunday-school teachers, and in many cases is most apparent where not felt by the teachers themselves. Certain it is, as Mr. BOWIE pointed out, that in the majority of schools there is ample room for improvement in securing that the children who pass through the classes shall have received some measure of systematic instruction on the fundamental principles of religion and the broad lines of Christian thought.

The attempt thus to raise the standard of teaching need not interfere in the least with that other invaluable influence of Sunday-school work, in the close personal ties formed between teacher and taught, and the social elements introduced into the life of many who but for their school might have little of brightness and wholesome pleasure, or of helpful friendship. There is no antagonism between good teaching and the happiness of a well-ordered social life or the formation of the closest ties of reverence and affection. On the contrary, the higher aim in education would enrich and uplift the common life of the school, and by making a more serious claim would ensure a worthier response from both teachers and taught.

Such a Sunday-school Code as is suggested could, of course, have no compulsory power, but its moral influence would be invaluable, and we are confident that it would receive a widespread and hearty welcome, and the more hearty as experience showed what it could effect for the teaching of our schools. If the Sunday School Association is able at once to give effect to this suggestion it would be not the least of the good fruit borne by the second session of the Oxford Summer School.

OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS.

THE second Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers opened at Manchester College, Oxford, on Friday, July 6, and has been continued throughout the present week. The numbers were not quite so great as in the first year, but about 120 teachers took part in the session, representing fifty-three schools in different parts of the country, as far apart as London and Plymouth, Taunton, Birmingham, Liverpool, Northampton, Nottingham and Leeds, Middlesborough, Bolton, Warrington and Sheffield; while from Ireland, Dublin, Holywood and Comber were represented. The programme was arranged on similar lines to last year, with two morning lectures given in the chapel, the first being the series on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, the second dealing with the practical aspects of the teacher's work; then followed the common midday meal, and the afternoon was devoted to visits to colleges, boating and cycling parties, longer excursions to Blenheim and Nuneham and visits to the hospitable homes of friends in Oxford. On the first Friday evening Dr. and Mrs. Drummond held a reception in the College Library, and there were also conferences of the teachers on subjects of special interest in their work. Mr. J. H. Woods, M.A., again most kindly acted as local honorary secretary, and with Mrs. Woods, helping to find quarters for the visitors, arranging parties and excursions and in other ways, greatly contributed to the pleasure and success of the session.

On Sunday, at morning service, the chapel was filled by a congregation such as seldom gathers there. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, who also was the preacher.

DR. DRUMMOND'S SERMON.

Taking for his text 1 Cor. xiii. 13, "Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love," Dr. DRUMMOND said that the contrast between the permanent and the transient in religion was often thought to be a modern conception, but Paul was clearly conscious of it. The strange gift of tongues, for instance, and even the gift of prophecy, he said, would pass away when they had served their purpose; but faith, hope, and love would remain. Those were the very things which had characterised the life of Jesus Christ, and they were the abiding things in Christianity. There was never any doubt about them. No massacres or persecutions had taken place because of them. They were the great things by which Paul, Augustine, Francis of Assisi, Howard, Channing—men of every school and sect—were all distinguished. They constituted what ought to be the ideal for themselves and for their teaching of others.

The meaning of faith was often misunderstood—it was limited to belief in some dogma. But it was never so used in Scripture. Faith was a great principle of new life within the soul which apprehended spiritual things, which realised the presence of God within the heart and in the world, and was more akin to moral trust than to intellectual belief. The pure in heart, said the Great Teacher, shall see God. That was the faith which was connected with purity, utter simplicity of heart; simplicity and purity set on that which is above and utterly forgetful of self, looking up to some great ideal to which it aspired, for which it would be ready even to die.

Faith fixed on the great things of God came down to earth, and helped them to look into the heart of man, to have faith in that human nature which had its touch of the divine. Therein they found the first power of a true teacher, who had not only faith in the great Lord of spirits, but in the spirits He had created, and looked deep into the heart of the pupil, believing against hope that the divine was there, if only he could find it. And seldom did that faith fail to reach its object. Only the quickening Spirit of God, passing through them, speaking with their lips, could reach and cure the ills of other souls.

Akin to faith was hope, which was essential to the continuance of human life. There was a hope grounded in faith, resting upon trust in God, which looked beyond its own fleeting endeavours, which could believe that though a man might never see the fruit of his labours, yet they would surely bear a harvest fully proportioned to the purity of the effort put forth. The teacher had many things to dishearten him, and especially the teacher with a high ideal; his efforts often seemed in vain. That was the time to seek for religious hope; and he might remember the great lesson of his own religion, how Christ seemed utterly to fail, the disciples fleeing from him, his enemies triumphing on every side, his teaching of such short duration it seemed impossible it could have any lasting effect, and the cross his doom. Yet his hope never faltered, but when challenged by the High Priest his reply was practically: "Yes, you may nail me to the cross, but the Son of Man, the glorious power of the Spirit in which I have lived, shall come back in the clouds of heaven, coming to conquer, and my empire shall be everlasting." So it had been. The centuries had rolled away, and the great figure, so little known in his own day, towered over all. His spirit had dominated the ages, and now reigned with greater power over the greatest minds than ever before. They must never yield to despair, but trust in the living God. What if they should faint and fall in the field? Other workers would rise up and the cause of God would never perish!

So they must go on from hope to the great root of faith and hope—love which was greater than either. Love was that principle which took them out of themselves and made them fling their lives on the lives of others, so that they sought not their own will, but the will speaking in their conscience, revealing what is right and good. It was that which lay at the root of all good and holy work, which led them to undertake it and sustained them in its performance, which still clung to the blessed work, even when it might seem to fail.

That, too, would lead them to use thought and effort and time so as to make themselves most efficient in carrying on the work; and surely that great work of the Sunday-school teacher, that divine work was worthy of all the care, all the thought and preparation and consecrated prayer they could give to it. Even to save one, was it not worth a life's labour? To save? What did they mean by that? To raise into the true dignity of manhood and womanhood, to lead away from sin to righteousness, from depravity to holiness, from hatred and selfishness to love, from unbelief to faith, from the earthly to the heavenly. What was more awful than to look upon a lost soul, lost through sensuality, through selfishness, through malice or covetousness, all that was earthly and sensual, and to contrast with that the glorious beauty of a soul on which the stamp of heaven was laid, a true child of God in whom was the love of God, moved by His Spirit, and showing forth the beauty, glory and power of that Spirit in the world. Contrast the two pictures, and they must feel that they were privileged indeed to do what in them lay to change the one into the other.

In conclusion, Dr. Drummond said that in teaching religion they must not be too pedantic or take too narrow a view. Whatever tended to raise the mind, to elevate the thoughts, to widen their ideals, was religion. And they must study the needs and characteristics of their various scholars, and must take different ways with different characters, seeking what would most influence them for good. The greatest power of religion was in the spirit of the teacher. Where a loving and prayerful spirit was brought to the work the lesson was sure to be fruitful of some good. Religion was for the most part taught indirectly. That was one of the great sources of power in the Bible; its lessons were indirectly taught through history, parable, allegory, and hymns, and only now and then directly by argument and appeal, and the statement of religious truth. They should combine such means to enlarge and elevate their scholars' minds, and as they were prepared for it, give them direct religious teaching, clearing away as they could doubts that arose, and making them see and feel for themselves the just and the true.

They must never be discouraged on account of the loftiness of their aim. He had set before them and before himself an ideal they could not hope to reach. But it must never discourage them, because it was only by a clear perception of the true ideal that they could ever advance towards it. It gave the direction to their efforts, and by gazing on it, yearning towards it, praying for it, they came to see it more clearly, and still climbing on the ascending path, came a little nearer to the great central glory. It was not to discourage by setting before them the vastness, the majesty of their aim, that he had spoken of those things, but to cheer them by helping them to feel how noble the work was, and entreating them to believe that to them it would bring the most precious of all boons, self-forgetfulness, self-consecration, the gradual cleansing away of those elements which sever from God, until at last when they had passed through the narrow gates and crossed the narrow stream of death, they should enter their true home and live in the life with God, conscious only of Him and His glory. So they would find at last the fulness of their own life, the life eternal, prepared for the righteous and the loving.

On Friday morning, July 6, an opening service was held in the College Chapel, conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, President of the Sunday-school Association, who also gave an address.

ADDRESS BY THE REV. H. E. DOWSON.

At the opening of his address Mr. Dowson spoke of Manchester College as the beautiful home of inspiration for the higher life of our churches, and recalled the memory of John James Tayler and James Martineau as the inspirers of many now in charge of those churches, and teachers of the present teachers in the College. To them he expressed great indebtedness for the privilege of holding that School in the College, and for their aid in setting a higher standard in Sunday-school work.

It was good for them to come to Oxford. Many of them lived amid factories and workshops in the struggle of modern enterprise, with faces turned towards new commercial developments and new mechanical inventions, and it was good to come to that ancient University city, with its traditions, its associations with centuries of reverence. In that progressive age it was a grand thing to be reminded that their roots struck deep down into the soil of the past and to hold intercourse with it in spirit, as they did at Oxford. The thought of ages had much to say to the thought of the passing hour, the religion of centuries had inspiration for the children of each new day. Jesus himself with all his freshness of soul, his new personal conviction springing up within himself, came not to destroy, but to fulfil. It was to hold communion with the twofold spirit of profound religious faith and high intellectual culture associated with Oxford that they had come to Manchester College for that session. Those two elements were needed in all their work for the young.

He then proceeded to speak of two characteristics prevailing among their young people in the present day not conducive to the higher work of the Sunday-schools.

(i.) The growing love of relaxation and amusement with a tendency to shirk intellectual exertion.

(ii.) A loss of the true religious spirit, reverence for holy things, and deep strong personal faith.

They could not but have sympathy with the young in their natural love of pleasure, in social gatherings, and the companionships of leisure hours. It was one of the functions of their schools to supply opportunities for healthy recreation during the week, greatly needed after hard work; and they provided in that way a large part of the sunshine of their young lives, in which he heartily rejoiced. But recreation in connection with their schools must not take the first place. The chief aim must ever be to lift up the life religiously, morally and intellectually. Recreation must only be taken when it was well earned. That was a luxurious age for all classes, but harder times were perhaps in store for them. The war in South Africa with all its attendant evils had yet called out much endurance and self-sacrifice in the combatants on both sides, and it might be that the new generation would be roused to greater energy and to sacrifices for ends greater than self. In coming together there they sought new stimulus, and he trusted they might be roused to higher life and work. Whatever they did in their schools, nothing was to be compared with the exertion on their scholars of a personal religious influence, and nothing could fit them for that so much as to sit at the feet of those who were more full of the spirit of religion than they. What they as teachers needed was personal communion with the true living spirit of their master, Jesus, and fresh from that communion to carry back to their work a deep and strong religion drawn from the Master's well of life. Of all devices to lay hold on young minds nothing could be compared with the outpouring on mind and heart of the spirit of Jesus. Their standard of intellectual culture could not be too high, yet that was as nothing compared with the all-mastering power of a soul on whose altar the sacred and sanctifying fire of personal religion burnt. That through their meeting together there they might be more truly furnished with that most precious gift was his earnest prayer.

The second hour on Friday morning was devoted to the first of the lectures dealing with the practical aspects of the teacher's work, a lecture on "Child Study," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who was introduced by the President.

CHILD STUDY.

A man who would grow roses, Mr. Tarrant said, must know something of the nature of rose-bushes, something of the aspect they prefer, the soil that nourishes them and the enemies that most attack them. If a man is getting a new gardener for his vineries, he particularly inquires if the candidate understands grapes. So they would get more fruit and blossom in the moral gardening, if they were more thorough in their attempts to understand boys and girls. It was a glorious thing they were called to do as teachers, to play to the children the part of sunbeams and breezes to the buds, to help them to open out so as to give and take the beauty of being in all its manifold forms—to think, and by and by to act for themselves; finally, to become helpers themselves and so carry on the divine creation of full, intelligent, productive manhood and womanhood. In trying to understand the nature of a child, as the gardener understood the nature of a plant, they came upon the whole problem of human philosophy. Their study of the child would certainly seem to be sadly incomplete till they had learnt how he was made up, mind and body. They ought, therefore, to know something of physiology and psychology. Much was to be learnt from each. If they had time and patience to master one or other of the excellent manuals dealing with those two branches of science they would find their notions on the subject considerably extended and arranged in useful order; but they must never forget that a human being, however lowly, was always more worthy of attention than any book about him, and when they had learnt the labels put upon his parts and functions, bodily or mental, they had yet to deal at first hand with that very surprising thing himself.

To understand men or children something was wanted that books could not give—the something that enabled the doctor to "get on" with his patients, the minister with his people, and the teacher with his class. Could that knack of getting on with folks be acquired? It was doubtless a gift, but a gift that could be cultivated by earnest thought and persistent endeavour. The man who "got on" had his eyes open all day, and went about putting two and two together in a profitable way. If he had the advantage of scholastic training, he yet jealously guarded and freely exercised his native powers of observation and deduction. No philosopher could delude him into bartering away the tried old lamp of his own sense and judgment for the new lamp of the latest theory of things. One part, therefore, of the secret of the successful student of child-nature was alertness, sensitiveness, constant observation of the real movements of life in the child, at its work and play, with its companions and alone, in its loquacities and silences, in its joys and troubles. The other part brought them very near to the gospel of the great Lover of children. If it was true that a doctor got on with his patients because, with all his learning, he was a man, it was equally true that he who would get on with children must be a child himself. "Except ye become as little children," there could be no entrance into that particular kingdom of heaven. They must remember that in healthy children there was a fund of energy impatient to expend itself on something. Their wonder, their love of action, their love of rhythm, must be engaged by the teacher, entering into their minds and being a child with them, and then he would get on with them; not by compulsion, but by attraction he would lead them to the great lesson of self-control. Was it so difficult to live as children with children? They were all as children amid the vastness and variety of that beautiful world, and were kept in an embrace without which they would be helpless as motherless babes. They had, it is true, elements in their life beyond those of childhood. One was the bud, the other the flower, and all real education was devised to help the flower forth into its purest, sweetest and completest grace; but bud and flower were nourished with the same life-current. The teacher and his class alike awoke to wonder, grew strong by effort, prayed one prayer in varying accents, and sang one song of praise. If they were children with the children they would understand them best, for, however strong compared with them, they would still feel their needs and share their simple spiritual comforts, and thus would best work for them and with them.

On Saturday morning, after a brief devotional service, Mr. Carpenter gave the first of his course of Bible lectures, the subject being "The Struggle for Freedom of Inquiry." This was followed by a lecture on "What Sunday-schools may learn from Day-schools," by Mr. A. J. Mockridge, of Oxford, who was introduced by Mr. Carpenter as principal of the pupil teachers' centre and formerly diocesan inspector of schools, a member of the Church of England, whom on that account they were the more glad to welcome.

WHAT SUNDAY-SCHOOLS MAY LEARN FROM DAY-SCHOOLS.

Knowledge of the subject, Mr. Mockridge said, was not the only requisite in a teacher. Not everyone who knew could teach another what he knew. The great works of the educators of the past should be studied. Both intellectual and moral encouragement would be got from the study of the life of such a man as Pestalozzi, and he strongly recommended to his hearers R. H. Quick's "Educational Reformers" (Longmans). The undue loading of the memory with undigested facts was the danger of all teaching. In Fitch's "Lectures on Teaching" they would find much suggestive information. History should be taught not in dry skeleton but through biography, as it was in the Bible.

The first duty of a teacher was to know his pupils, their temperaments, habits, limitations of knowledge, and, if possible, their home surroundings; but if he could not see them at home, then to get to know them in their playtime, where the real child was to be seen. A teacher with ability in sports should use it to win the admiration and confidence of the children.

Tact should be acquired and cultivated. It was required both in teaching and in management. Often a right answer was timidly and clumsily given. It must not be impatiently brushed aside and the child discouraged, but must be drawn out more clearly by patient and tactful questioning.

Preparation of the lesson was essential, not merely the getting of a knowledge of the subject. Sometimes there was too much knowledge, and matter had to be selected for presentment to a class. The method of presentment had to be carefully considered. They must try to enter into the child's mind, imagine what questions would occur to it, and so be able to amplify and simplify their explanations. Teachers often failed because they lectured, and were not in touch with the child's mind. They must utilise the answers got from children, but so as not to be led too far afield, away from the subject of the lesson. Teachers must have a sense of proportion, and lead the class continually back to the main lines of the lesson. They must know how long attention can be kept, and when to go back for recapitulation, or to relieve the strain of the lesson by illustrative anecdotes.

If a book of prepared lessons had to be used by younger teachers it must be only as suggesting the lines of the lesson, which must be assimilated and freely given by the teacher, not blindly followed out, otherwise the lesson lacked freshness. Eyes must be on the class, not on a book or a heap of papers. The real essential matter, as a wise teacher had said, was love for the work and sympathy with the pupils. The most perfect method, the finest subject matter, were dead things in themselves. The personality of the teacher was the really effective thing to waken the desire for what is good and true and fair. In T. G. Rooper's "School and Home Life" (Brown and Sons) they would find much help.

They must use the child's imagination, and cultivate the art of questioning. To be a skilful questioner was almost the same thing as being a skilful teacher. "Wise questioning is the half of knowledge," Lord Bacon had said. They must question to see what the class already knows, to see whether their teaching had been clear, or whether difficulties had arisen, and at the end to see the result. They must question to secure the mental activity and co-operation of the class. Questions must be clear, in simple language, and as brief as possible. Questions should not allow of being answered with merely yes or no. Answers given were often a grave reflection on the questioner. They should avoid such questions as "What do you think of Moses?" "What happened before the Flood?" Questions should be pointed, not admitting of an infinite number of answers. The Education Department had recently advised that in lower classes answers should be required in the form of complete sentences, to show that the children really knew what they were saying. In questioning manner was as important as matter. A teacher must not be too exacting or cross. A bustling teacher made great mistakes, repeating a question again and again, and making confusion. A spiritless teacher would lose the attention of the class. Questions should be put first to the whole class, and then one child be selected to answer, so as to keep all alert. Simultaneous answering should not be allowed.

As to discipline, the responsibility was divided. The superintendent must see to the general arrangements of the school, that classes are not too near, and noise not too great; then each teacher must see that his own class is comfortably seated, and so that he can see all his children at once. Then if an interesting well-prepared lesson is given, there will be order and the class will be interested. Insubordination must be dealt with firmly. A teacher should neither coax nor threaten. He must never let a naughty boy see that he is disturbed, but he may show displeasure. He should never warn a boy unless he is prepared to act.

In thanking Mr. Mockridge for his lecture, Mr. Carpenter recommended a little book by Professor J. M. Baldwin, "The Story of the Mind" (Newnes and Co.), as rich in illustrations of child life. In answer to questions, Mr. Mockridge said he thought a number of small classes close together in a noisy schoolroom could do little good; it would be better for capable teachers to take it in turn to give a good lesson to the whole school, while the others helped to keep order and remained in personal touch with their classes; or the school might be divided into a younger and an elder division, and so dealt with by two teachers. On the other hand, more than one teacher emphasised the great value of the old method, not so much in the instruction given as in the personal ties formed between teacher and children.

On Saturday evening a Conference was held in the lecture-room on "The Outside Activities of the Sunday-school." The chair was taken by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and Mr. ION PRITCHARD first gave an address, in which he urged that to complete their work as teachers other opportunities must be found beyond the hours at school. To invite a class home to tea and spend a pleasant evening, so that the teacher became as one of the children, was a capital plan; and based on that idea, he described the formation of a club, as specially useful for elder children. The club must not compete with technical and other classes, and should therefore meet not more than once a week or a fortnight. Teacher and class should be together as club-mates, and no one else should be invited in to entertain them. The members should make their own rules. In the club described by Mr. Pritchard, the boys were over 14, with a small regular subscription and register of attendance, meeting on Saturday evenings from 6 to 10. There were rules as to the election of outsiders to membership and the introduction of friends. Smoking and gambling were forbidden. Among their games they had provided themselves with a billiard table. Among their occupations was a Press class, in which cuttings from the current Press on matters of varied interest were discussed.

Another suggestion Mr. Pritchard made was of meetings between neighbouring schools during the winter, and for excursions in the summer. Such meetings were found to create fresh interest, and elder scholars stayed longer with their schools.

Mr. J. BALLANTYNE then gave an account of the Boys' Own Brigade in connection with Stamford-street Chapel, telling of the Boys' Brigade, and the enforced retirement of the Stamford-street company on account of their heterodoxy. They were, however, so impressed with the value of the brigade that they had continued their work under the new name, and were anxious for a larger union with other companies. The gymnastics, the regular drill, the parade services had an admirable effect upon the boys, and it was not found that membership in the brigade encouraged a warlike spirit in them. Their motto was, "Quit you like men and be strong." Questions were asked in reference to the military character of the brigade, and Mr. Leonard's "Life Brigade" was mentioned.

Other teachers added further suggestions from their varied experience, including art classes, gymnastics for the girls, window gardening, musical drill and dancing, and the Conference proved very interesting and helpful.

On Sunday afternoon another Conference was held, at which Miss Marian Pritchard introduced the subject of the "Young People's Religious Union," and part of the Rev. J. Ellis's Conference paper was read, describing what had been done at Sheffield. At the conclusion of the discussion a vote was taken, and it was affirmed, without dissentient, that if a suitable scheme could be suggested, it was desirable to have a national union, in which the young people's societies connected with various churches could be enrolled. Considerable difference of opinion was expressed, and it was not suggested that the exact model of the American Young People's Religious Union should be adopted. Forty schools were represented at the Conference.

On Sunday evening the second of Mr. Carpenter's lectures was given, after a brief devotional service, the subject being "The Revised Version," and the subsequent lectures were given during the week, in the first morning hour. After the third lecture, on Monday morning, Mr. Carpenter showed some of the most interesting books connected with the history of the Bible, in the Library.

The second lecture on Monday was by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, and was entitled, "Wanted, Men and Women!" Of this vigorous and inspiring address we give no summary, as we hope to publish the greater part of it in full.

The second lecture on Tuesday was by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, on

THE PRACTICAL WORK OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

If the Sunday-school, Mr. Bowie said, was looked upon as an educational institution, apart from the question of its value as a social centre and the good influence it had through the personal relations between teacher and taught, it would be generally admitted that the standard of excellence was not very high, and that the day-school was far beyond the Sunday-school in effectiveness.

To render their schools more competent to do their proper work, more attention should be given to the buildings, the apparatus, organisation and officering of the school, but that was all subordinate to the question of ability, willingness and sympathy in the teachers. The business of the teacher was not simply to fill the children's minds with facts, but to develop intelligence, to build up character, to draw the soul towards goodness and towards God. He must awaken a healthy curiosity and interest in questions of life and character, and inspire them to attain to the higher things in their own lives, to love truth and right, and to have the supreme reverence and trust. Affectionate and sympathetic teachers were what was most needed.

Their Sunday-school teaching should be treated as that of the day-schools had been treated. They should have a small commission of competent, large-minded and large-hearted men and women skilled in school work, to go from school to school and examine and report on the work and methods and the character of the teaching, and like the day-school inspectors, not only to observe, but to make suggestions to the teachers.

One thing such an inspector would certainly note in many schools would be the want of all system in the teaching, which was a sure mark of inefficiency. At the end of a year many teachers if asked how far they had gone, what subjects they had made clear, what ideals they had brought home to the mind and heart of their children, would find it very hard to answer. There was great need of more carefully thinking out and planning of courses of lessons in Sunday-schools.

He suggested that the Sunday-school Association, with the aid of local Sunday-school societies and with the advice of the Principal and professors of Manchester College, should be invited to issue each year a scheme of lessons, or alternative schemes, suited to different tastes and capacities, and so provide for their schools something like the code issued by the Education Department for day-schools, with instructions and suggestions as to teaching, as well as the actual scheme of lessons. The day-school code was the result of years and years of experience of experts throughout the country. It dealt with matters of school management as well as teaching, and set an example that would be followed with great advantage in their Sunday-schools. The American Sunday-school Society had a capital system of issuing schemes of lessons to the schools, and there was much to be said for the one topic method of teaching throughout a school—by which the same subject was taught in all the classes, in a manner suited to the different capacities of the children. In Mr. W. A. Sheldon's book, "An Ethical Sunday-school," they would find a good description of how that system might be elaborately carried out. In conclusion, Mr. Bowie said that it was possible to give way to a tendency to make things too pleasant and easy for the children, to shrink from setting them hard tasks. That was not the highest aim. It was far better to teach them how to face difficulties and to work through the drudgery needed in grappling with a hard subject. That was good discipline, and children could be taught to enjoy the effort in company with the teacher. They must not relax their efforts to improve both their methods and the quality of their teaching.

In the discussion which followed general agreement was expressed as to the great value that a Sunday-school code would have, for the guidance of teaching and the encouragement of better methods. Mr. Ion Pritchard, who presided, mentioned the Sunday-school Red Book, issued by the Congregational Union, and noticed in The Helper for 1899, as containing many useful suggestions.

The other lectures on practical subjects were "Nature's Lessons for the Sunday-school," by the Rev. Thomas Robinson; "Hints Gathered from a few American Sunday-schools," by Miss Marian Pritchard; and "What the Average Teacher may do," by the Rev. J. J. Wright. Of these and other Conferences held during the week we hope to have some further account next week.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

STONE-LAYING.

ON Wednesday afternoon, July 4, in the presence of a goodly company, Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., laid the memorial stone of the new Free Christian Church on the Narborough-road. The school-room adjoining the site of the church has already been built, and was formally opened in January last. The church is to be modernised Gothic in style, and is calculated to seat some 300 persons.

Amongst those present were Alderman Mott, Alderman Wood, Councillors Burton and Royce, the Revs. H. Gow, H. E. Haycock (Loughborough), W. G. Price (Hinckley), W. Whitaker, minister of the congregation; Messrs. T. Fielding-Johnson, F. Winser, president of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, C. H. Roberts, and W. F. Price, secretary.

After a hymn and prayer, the Secretary read letters of apology from Miss Edith Gittins, the Misses Paget, Messrs. E. Clephan, E. F. Cooper, W. Simpson, and J. Bell (town clerk).

Mr. C. H. ROBERTS, who presided, said this was a very important ceremony. The laying of the memorial-stone of the new church marked for them in the history of the church another step in its efforts to find a home whereby it might do more good than it had hitherto been able to do. The history of the Free Christian Church had been a long struggle against difficulties since its origin at the Temperance Hall, some thirty years ago. It had, however, become apparent, lately, that the church was situated in the wrong place. If they wished to increase their membership and sphere of usefulness, and wished for an active church life, they must leave the vicinity of factories and workshops, and go to the districts where people lived. They made arrangements accordingly, and decided to build a church in that neighbourhood. It was a rapidly growing and prosperous district, and once they were started he believed many people in the neighbourhood, unattached to any church, would join. It would be a field for the energies of their minister. They had every reason to be satisfied with their success so far. They had built their school, and since Christmas they had occupied it as a temporary church as well, and they had increased their congregation and added to their offertories, and the school, which at the old building had practically ceased to exist, now could boast of some ninety scholars, nearly all residents in the district. It would, perhaps, interest his hearers to know how the church stood financially. The total cost of the site for the two buildings, and the moderate furnishing appointments they would require, amounted to about £4,000, and they had against that, from subscriptions and the sale of the old building in Wellington-street, a sum sufficient to meet the greater part of the outlay, but they would want about £1,100 to make both ends meet. This was not a large sum, and they hoped to materially reduce it by the time the church was completed.

Mr. CHARLES KEMPSON, honorary architect, with a few suitable words, then presented Sir John Brunner with a handsome silver trowel.

Sir JOHN, in reply, thanked Mr. Kempson very sincerely, not only for the gift, but for the appropriate words which accompanied it. The duty he was to perform he was glad to undertake, and he did it with feelings of true sympathy. The work they were engaged upon that afternoon showed among other things, a desire for spiritual independence, with which he was himself very heartily in accord. They did not, perhaps, realise quite as thoroughly as they ought what a very powerful and interesting body the Unitarians were. In the United States, Unitarianism flourished exceedingly, as indeed might be expected in the land where every form of freedom flourished. He was glad that the move to the Narborough-road had already proved a success, and he congratulated them heartily upon the excellent site they had been able to obtain at the corner of the two roadways. They would have bright, wholesome surroundings—he did not think it well that religion should be associated with soot—and he congratulated them on that ground. He hoped the purity of the outside and the purity of the inside might match for many a day. He regretted the absence of Mr. E. Clephan and Mr. W. Simpson that afternoon, and continuing, said nothing was more to be desired; nothing tended to happier prospects, nothing was more necessary than that they should believe in freedom of religion, in rational religion; in rational reverence in their religion; and nothing promised better than that they should meet together to encourage each other as they were doing that day. He hoped they had made up their minds to be loyal and staunch to each other, and that they would continue that loyalty. He was glad to say, wherever he had gone amongst Unitarians, he had found that spirit growing. It was with the heartiest good wishes for the prosperity of the cause they had met there that day to further that he thanked them for the reception accorded him.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER then declared the stone well and truly laid.

The Rev. H. Gow proposed, Councillor BURTON seconded, and Alderman WOOD supported, a hearty vote of thanks to Sir John Brunner. A collection in aid of the Building Fund having been made, the company, on the invitation of the ladies of the congregation, adjourned to the schoolroom for tea.

In the evening a service was conducted at the Great Meeting (kindly lent for the occasion), when the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, preached to a representative congregation, on the necessity of vitalising the religious life of the churches. He most effectively urged the need of an advance towards a more spiritual morality which should arise from personal religion. A most eloquent sermon closed with a plea for the socialising of our efforts and the abandonment of the old individualism.

The choir rendered Gounod's anthem, "Send out Thy Light."

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE annual examinations of the above College were held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday, July 4. During the day sermons were preached by Messrs. Davison, White, Schroeder, and Rossington, and they manifested a considerable amount of pulpit ability. The visitors were the Revs. Philemon Moore, B.A. and J. E. Odgers, M.A. At the prize-giving in the afternoon, at which Principal Gordon, M.A., presided, the Rev. P. Moore delivered the Visitor's Address. He said that the visitors were pleased to report most satisfactorily upon the work for the students during the past year. In addressing himself to the students, he declared the ministry to be the noblest of human callings. They would never have finished with the preparation of their work. It was certain that more or less calamity would ensue if the man of action swallowed up the man of thought, or when formularies cramped the impulse of the living spirit. In recommending the claims of study upon them, he hoped they would avoid the evils of one-sidedness. The time was past when the Unitarian ministry could be charged with too exclusive devotion to learning. The ministry was [not] an end in itself; the Christian minister was no finished creation. Upon leaving college they must not think that all was done, that no more effort was needed, or that they might now follow their inclinations. The ministry to be a useful service must be an intelligent service. They should consider it a duty to cultivate specially some corner of truth in the vineyard, and endeavour to enrich the world with some humble fruit of their husbandry. The effort would mean much to themselves; it would prove an occupation for their slack hours, and the nucleus round which would crystallise the elements of their life's experience which otherwise might be lost. He hoped the congregations would recognise that for them the most valuable part of a minister's life was that he spent in his study.

Principal Gordon made the following announcements of University attainments at the recent Victoria examinations:—M.A.: Revs. J. M. Bass and Alfred Hall. Intermediate B.A.: Henry Dawtrey, Jno. Evans, S. Jones, H. McLuchlin. Preliminary: E. Thackray. Owens College Prizes were secured by S. Jones (Hebrew) and H. McLuchlin (Latin and Ancient History). The Home Missionary College Prizes were awarded as follows:—Sharpe Prize of £10 (Biblical), W. L. Schroeder, M.A.; Greek Prize of £3, H. J. Rossington, B.A. Books presented by Mr. Charles Tyler (Church History), W. L. Schroeder, M.A. Certificates were presented to Mr. Davison, who has accepted a call from the Church at Dromore; and to Mr. Rossington who, as a Hibbert Scholar, is to spend the next twelve months abroad.

In the evening a valedictory service was conducted in Cross-street Chapel by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, who delivered an impressive address to the outgoing students, taking as his lesson and text passages from Isaiah vi. Addressing himself to the students, he said they had no doubt felt as the prophet felt when he said "Woe is me," &c., and had been overwhelmed by a sense of unfitness to undertake any work for God; but somehow there came to their lips a coal of fire, and they heard a voice saying "Who will go?" and the fact that they had come to College to give years of patient study would seem to indicate that in answer to the voice each one of them had said, "Here am I; send me." Any less consecration than that would be incomplete. The ministry of religion is the divinest of all ministries. Other things have their time and place; but this ministry of religion which links together God and man is the greatest and the supremest of all. He recalled with a thrill sitting where they sat, forty years ago. He recalled his emotions and the awful sense of responsibility that came upon him. Since then he had been in the toiling, struggling world, trying to deliver the message which he thought was delivered to him by the very voice of God. He had not found his task an easy one. It had been one of stress and strain and labour, though happy and blessed. It had made demands upon all the powers and capabilities of his nature; indeed, it had made more demands than he could meet. His studies had all proved useful; never had he read a book which had not given him some help, and every event of his life had helped him in some way to discharge his duties. Not enough was it to be in the cloistered aisle reading the books of the past; they must live in the present, able to feel the touch of a brother's hand, and have knowledge of those who toil and suffer and sin, if they would be successful ministers. Great as would be the demands upon their intellects, the demands upon their hearts would be greater. He could only meet the intellectual doubter on his own ground, and yet the other side of his work had made the greater demands upon him; the only way he could be of any service to the waifs and strays was to put himself side by side with them, to enter into their lives and feel sympathetically towards them, to recognise their brotherhood and sisterhood, and to do what he could to help them. To have been in the presence of the Holy one, to have heard the voice of God, is to see that all are brothers and sisters, and that the Father is of infinite tenderness and has not forgotten the poorest or most wretched. Such a ministry will yield unspeakable joys as well as heart-breaking pangs. No worldly wealth or honour would be theirs; but there would be peace beyond understanding.

The Blackley choir led the singing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JOSEPH BARKER.

SIR,—I have been much interested in the articles you have published upon the "The Unitarian Methodists," communicated by an esteemed friend, Rev. W. H. Burgess, and more especially his references to the late Joseph Barker. I should like to point out the following which I have not seen mentioned, at any time, in print. In 1867, when I was co-pastor of the Free Christian Church, in New Swindon, we invited Mr. Joseph Barker to Swindon. He came, spending Saturday, Sunday, and Monday with us there. After a public tea on the Saturday afternoon, he lectured in the church. His freedom of utterance and richness of thought magnetised the large audience. On Sunday he was a worshipper in our services. At the close of the evening service, we held the Communion service, and I had the joy of going forward with him, side by side, and handing to him the elements of this service. After this service was over and we had gone to Rose Cottage, Old Swindon, the home of the late Mrs. Wreford, where he staid during the visit, he said: "Words could not express the deep feeling he had had all the evening. It was the first time for eighteen years that he had joined in any such service, that he had now abandoned his scepticism, and once more sought to be a Christian, a disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ." The man himself, the occasion, with his future career made impressions upon my mind and heart that remain, and ever will. For sometime after this, beyond question, he sought admission to our pulpits; not succeeding as he had hoped for, he turned to the Primitive Methodists. His previous changes of religious thought naturally made our people somewhat shy of him. I well remember a conversation I had with the late Rev. Brooke Aspland about Mr. Barker soon after this visit. It was at this time that Mr. Barker, finding I had been brought up in the Methodist Churches of England and America, said this to me:—

"Methodism wants Unitarian theology, and Unitarian wants Methodist zeal; unite these two and they will win the world to Christianity."

He told me the following:—That during his visit to America, one morning, his wife received here in England sixteen newspapers from the States, each one of which contained an obituary notice of him, setting forth the particulars of his life, time, place, and nature of his death.

Saffron Walden, July 9.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherstone.—Those who have so generously subscribed to the repairs of the old Presbyterian Chapel that has been closed for two years would be delighted to see the change that a few well-spent pounds and shillings have effected. From a building with holes in the roof, mouldering pews, a brick floor full of pitfalls, and a general sickly smell of mould and decay, the place is transformed into a neat, comfortable meeting-house for worship on Sunday, for classes and reading-room and mothers' meetings in the week. The reopening services on Sunday were conducted at three and six o'clock by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, when congregations of over 100 at each service filled the floor and gallery. Many came over from Hinckley, and a good choir from Tamworth, and were entertained between the services in Mrs. Gee's garden. A large number from the town proposed to be regular attendants and to bring their friends. It was especially encouraging to see a great many young men attached to no place of worship listening intently. Collections and subscriptions now amount to £40.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—The school sermons on Sunday last were in all respects most successful. Dr. Klein was the special preacher afternoon and evening, and his sermons were highly appreciated by the large congregations which as usual on these occasions assembled, including representatives of nearly all denominations in the district. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin gave a very appropriate address to the scholars at their service in the morning. The collections on the day amounted to £79 3s., being an increase of £17 on the previous years.

Guildford.—The past and present scholars of the Ward-street Sunday-school are to hold a sale of work on Dec. 14, in aid of the funds of the church, and would welcome any help in this their first effort to identify themselves with the work of the church.

Halstead.—On Sunday last a flower service was conducted by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., of London. The congregation was much larger than it had been for a long time, and comfortably filled the chapel, which was prettily decorated with a profusion of flowers. The collection was proportionately good. An excellent band of string, wood, and brass instruments, under the able leadership of Mr. Finch, led the singing very effectively, and played selections from The Creation, and other classical works during the evening. It is worthy of mention that a member of the congregation, imbued with the true missionary spirit, personally invited twenty of his neighbours, who were strangers to the place, and of these no less than fourteen attended the service.

Hindley (Bi-centenary).—The congregation of Hindley Presbyterian Chapel threw themselves with great energy into the fitting celebration of their bi-centenary. The buildings were renovated and beautified, the school and chapel being used in turn for all purposes while the work was going on. New trustees have also been appointed. A beautiful memorial brass to Thomas Gaskell, who was long connected with school and chapel, and died thirty years ago, has been placed in the chapel by Mr. T. Prescott, now of Southport. A portrait of Mr. John Jones, who for upwards of thirty-four years has been superintendent of the school and acting trustee of the chapel, has been hung in the school-room. On Saturday and Sunday, June 23 and 24, the bi-centenary meetings were held. The Saturday gathering took the form of a tea-party and public meeting. Tea was served in the school, and the after meeting was held in the chapel. The senior trustee—Mr. Abraham Hurst—presided. The Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., in a most interesting address, told the story of Nonconformity in Hindley from a period more than half a century previous to the building of the chapel in 1700. It is hoped that the address may find a permanent record in print. Speeches of hearty congratulation and earnest hope were also made by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., of Oxford; the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, speaking on behalf of neighbouring congregations and of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission; the Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., of Warrington, representing the Provincial Assembly; the Rev. Adam Rushton, of Macclesfield, a former minister, who, in a stirring address, full of reminiscence, brought to remembrance some of the things done by an earnest band of hard-working people during his ministry twenty-five years ago. The minister—the Rev. John Moore—also spoke in supporting a vote of thanks to all who had helped to provide so successful a gathering, which had been moved by Mr. Isaac Barrow, and seconded by Mr. J. Platt. There was a large gathering of friends, which included the Rev. E. Allen (Wamsley), the Rev. J. E. Stead (Park Lane), the Rev. R. C. Moore (Horwich), and the Rev. W. E. George, M.A. (Swinton). The meeting was brought to a close by hymn and benediction. On the following day (Sunday) special services were held. That in the morning took the form of a scholars' service. The fact that it was to be conducted by the Rev. Adam Rushton, and that he had been absent for twenty years from his old sphere of labour, was the means of bringing together a considerable number of old friends. And both by them and by the younger members of the congregation, many of whom had heard traditions from former days, the wise and helpful words of the venerable preacher, now in his eightieth year, will be long remembered. In the evening the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., preached. In a sermon which greatly enlightened and impressed the congregation, he dwelt on the principles of the Puritans and Presbyterians, which led to the building of our older chapels, and which had left our ministers and congregations free to accept the developments of religious thought during the intervening centuries. Mr. Odgers congratulated the congregation, as descendants of the English Presbyterians, on preserving the original name as a designation of their chapel. Our friends here hope that Mr. Odgers will allow his sermon to be printed along with Mr. Gordon's address. On the succeeding Sunday the Rev. John Moore preached sermons bearing on the event.

London: Peckham.—The open-air mission, conducted on Peckham-rye by the Rev. G. Carter, in connection with the Avondale-road Church, was even more largely attended on Sunday afternoon last than on the previous occasion, and over 200 Unitarian tracts were distributed among the bystanders, who, for the most part, gave attentive hearing throughout to an address lasting about three-quarters of an hour. The proceedings were opened with explanatory remarks by Mr. G. V. Carter, the minister's son.

London: Stamford-street.—On Sunday last the children's summer flower service was held in the afternoon, conducted by the minister, whose subject was "Summer." The flowers were afterwards taken by some thirty scholars and teachers to the Evelina Hospital for Sick Children, in the Southwark-bridge-road, where they were gladly received. Recent events of interest have been the annual inspection of No. I. Company of the Boys' Own Brigade, by a captain of another organisation, who complimented the lads on their proficiency in drill; this and the closing meeting of the children's happy evenings, when medals and prizes were also distributed, were very largely attended. On June 23 the Sunday-school went to Riddlesdown, Surrey, and on the 27th the members of the Mothers' meeting to Theydon Bois, Epping Forest; both days were gloriously fine and much enjoyed; on each of these occasions our minister was present.

London: Stepney.—On Sunday, July 1, the usual monthly religious conference in connection with the Postal Mission was held in College Chapel. Mr. Tavener occupied the chair, and Dr. Herbert Smith delivered an address on "Further Logical Developments of the Principles of the Reformation." There was a good attendance, and the address was followed with the closest attention. At the evening service a good congregation listened to Mr. Tavener's exposition of Mr. Holman Hunt's study of Jesus the Carpenter in his picture called "The Shadow of Death."

London: Welsh Services.—The service at Essex Hall was conducted on Sunday, July 8, by Mr. J. Islan Jones. There was a fairly good attendance. Mr. Jones took for his text 1 John ii. 23, and showed that the accusation often made against Unitarians of denying Jesus is uncharitable, and is due in the main to the lack of knowledge on the part of those attacking us as to the position Jesus occupies in our religious worship. He brought a powerful sermon to a close by making an earnest appeal for greater enthusiasm and more self-sacrifice on behalf of the principles of Unitarianism, indicating that the lives of famous Unitarians of the past are proof sufficient that our faith has ample resources for religious development and spiritual joy.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The annual picnic was held at Macclesfield on Saturday last, and was a very successful one. About ninety friends partook of tea in the Parsonage-street Schools, prior to which a large party was conducted through the West Park with its recently erected interesting Museum. Among those present were the President, Mr. J. Barrow; the Revs. H. E. Dowson, L. Scott, W. C. Hall, A. L. Smith, and J. A. Pearson; and Mr. A. Slater, hon. secretary. After tea a ramble was taken, in the course of which several halts were made, and the M.D.S.S.A. Whitsuntide hymns were sung, Mr. W. Wooley conducting. Shortly before reaching the town again an informal meeting was held, the Rev. H. E. Dowson taking the chair. A cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the Macclesfield friends for their hospitality, on the motion of the Rev. J. A. Pearson, seconded by the Rev. L. Scott, to which the Rev. A. L. Smith responded.

Pontypridd.—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who is on a visit to Pontypridd, conducted the service at the Lesser Town Hall, on Sunday, July 8, and preached an interesting and instructive discourse to a large congregation.

Styal.—The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., of Scarborough, having accepted the joint pastorate of Styal and Dean Row, a welcome party was held on Saturday, July 7, when a goodly number sat down to tea, after which the Rev. H. P. Greg took the chair. Letters of regret for unavoidable absence were read from the Revs. P. M. Higginson, Dendy Agate, A. L. Smith, H. E. Dowson, T. Robinson, G. A. Payne and Priestley Prime. The letters contained many expressions of goodwill and wishes for the success of Mr. Thomas's ministry at Styal and Dean Row. The chairman gave Mr. and Mrs. Thomas a very hearty welcome on behalf of the trustees of Norcliffe Chapel, and then called upon Mr. E. H. Greg, Junr., to say a few words in the absence of Mr. Greg, of Quarry Bank, who was unavoidably absent. Mr. J. Barrow, the oldest member of the congregation present, welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Thomas on behalf of the congregation. Mr. G. H. Venables, the superintendent of the Sunday-school, welcomed them on behalf of the Sunday-school. The Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, on behalf of the ministers of the district, joined in the welcome. In the course of Mr. Thomas's reply, he said that, with the kind co-operation of the members of the congregation and teachers of the Sunday-school, he hoped to be able to keep up to the high standard of his predecessors. The rest of the evening was spent in roaming through the woods and grounds of Norcliffe and Quarry Bank by the kind permission of Messrs. E. H. Greg and T. Crewdson.

Urmston.—On Saturday, July 7, a farewell meeting was held for Mr. Alfred Davison, who has accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at Dromore, co. Down. Mr. Davison, during the past session, has been assistant to the Rev. Priestley Prime in his oversight of the churches at Heaton Moor and Urmston, and as resident-student at Urmston has rendered valuable help in the consolidation of the congregation and the management of the Sunday-school. A goodly gathering of members and friends, presided over by the Rev. Priestley Prime, evidenced a keen appreciation of the work done by Mr. Davison, and a number of very cordial speeches were made. At the same meeting a welcome was extended to Mr. W. L. Schroeder, who has accepted a three months' vacation appointment with the congregation.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-third annual meeting of this Union took place on Saturday last at Wakefield. A service was first held in the chapel, at which a helpful sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Roper of Moss-side. After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, the chair being occupied by Mr. Fred. Clayton, the President of the Union. Among those present were the Revs. Chas. Hargrove, Chas. Roper, E. Ceredig Jones, A. Chalmers, J. G. Slater, John Fox, W. H. Eastlake, and C. H. Cook, the newly-appointed minister at Holbeck. The report showed an increase in the number of scholars, the total being 2,016, which is the largest number recorded since the formation of the Union. The increase mainly comprised scholars over sixteen years of age. Bradford again takes the lead in the increase, and is closely followed by Rotherham, the schools responsible for slight decreases being Huddersfield and Holbeck, both of which places were for some time without settled ministers. Two Teachers' Conferences had been held, at which interesting papers had been contributed by Miss Brown, of Leeds, and the Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield, respectively. The examinations had not been the success they were formerly, although the Committee had endeavoured to select suitable subjects for study. The other organisations, along with the finances, were deemed to be satisfactory. After the singing of a hymn the President opened the meeting by extending a cordial welcome to all present to Wakefield, and, in moving the adoption of the report and financial statement, referred to several encouraging features of the report, and urged upon the teachers perseverance in their noble work. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, in seconding, took the opportunity of giving a cordial welcome, on behalf of the Union, to the Rev. C. H. Cook. The resolution having been unanimously adopted, the Rev. A. Chalmers moved, and the Rev. C. H. Cook, seconded, a vote of thanks to the Rev. Charles Roper for his able and most helpful sermon. Mr. Cook took the opportunity of acknowledging the kindly reference to his appointment as minister at Holbeck. The motion was adopted, and the Rev. C. Roper replied. He also—in the absence of a delegate from Manchester—referred to the good work which was being accomplished by the Manchester District Association. The Rev. Chas. Hargrove proposed a resolution thanking the officers for their services during the past year, and also the appointment of the officers for the ensuing year, which was seconded by the Rev. W. H. Eastlake, and adopted. The meeting closed with thanks to the hosts and the chairman.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,

NARBOROUGH ROAD, LEICESTER.

CHURCH BUILDING SCHEME.

The Congregation and Committee beg to acknowledge the following additional donations, with thanks.

Since the opening of the New School-room in January last our work has shown signs of increased success. The Memorial Stone of the Church Building was laid on July 4th by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., and it is expected that the Building will be completed by the end of the year. Fully £1,100 is needed for the completion of the scheme.

It is highly desirable that this sum should be raised without resorting to a Bazaar, and the building opened free of debt.

Donations will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the following members of the Finance Committee :—

Rev. H. Gow, B.A., St. James'-road.
Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., 171, Hinckley-road.
Mr. E. F. Cooper, Lloyds' Bank, High-street (Treasurer).

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE appears to be no longer any ground for hope that any but the worst fate has befallen the Europeans who were defending themselves in the Legations at Peking, and a service in memory of the victims of the cruel massacre is announced to be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Monday morning next. Amid our horror at this dreadful tragedy and the profoundest sympathy for those to whom it has brought personal bereavement and sorrow in the most appalling form, we yet cannot escape the conviction that the cry for vengeance is not the only one that should be heard. It is with shame that we must remember the high-handed violence with which Great Britain has treated China in the past, with no excuse but the interests of trade; and what can civilised Europe expect, the Great Powers of which have so openly and contemptuously regarded China as decrepit and semi-barbarous, fit only to be partitioned among themselves?

WE have received from the Rev. George Hudson, of the Southern Presbyterian Mission at Hangchow, a letter which has appeared in the daily press, pointing out that the present violent outbreak in China is not specially directed against Christianity, but against all foreigners, and at the root of it are very natural distrust and indignation and hatred bred of bitter experiences in the past. To the steps that have been taken by various European Powers in order to gain a hold for themselves on China, and the aggressive action of missionaries whom the Chinese not unnaturally confuse with political agents, Mr. Hudson adds a third very potent cause for this outbreak of hatred against foreigners in the opium traffic, which this country long since forced upon China, and to which is very largely attributed by the most enlightened people of that country their national decay.

ON Thursday afternoon, on the invitation of the Earl of Northbrook, who presided, Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar gave an address, at the Imperial Institute, on "Present-day Progress in India," before a large and distinguished audience. Having paid a high tribute to British rule in India, as the source of unity and peaceful progress, as wise in refraining from religious propagandism, and thus obtaining for Christianity a more sympathetic attention, Mr. Mozoomdar spoke of the Brahmo Somaj and its religious and moral ideals. He distinguished between Hindu Pantheism and the Theism of the Brahmo Somaj, the society of the worshippers of God, and then spoke of the social reform which naturally grew out of their religious faith, and especially of the education and elevation of women. There were now large numbers of educated Hindu women, and even a number of graduates of the University of Calcutta; but the great problem was to find careers for those who did not marry. Dealing later with their attitude towards Christianity, he said that while India would not have the theology of the missionaries, the human and the ideal Christ commanded their allegiance. Towards the conclusion of his address Mr. Mozoomdar made an eloquent appeal for worthier treatment of natives by the British residents in India. There was still a lamentable want of right social relations. Every Englishman in India ought to be a missionary and feel that the honour of the Empire should be represented in his person. The address was very warmly received.

THE "World's Convention" of the Christian Endeavour Societies which has been held in London during the past week, with its headquarters at the Alexandra Palace, bears witness to the astonishing growth of a movement which had a very humble beginning. An interesting article in this month's Puritan tells the story. In February, 1881, the Rev. F. E. Clark, minister of a Congregational Church in Portland, Maine, held a meeting of his young people, at which, being troubled at the lack of vitality in his church, he induced them to form a new society, to be called the "Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour," with the object of promoting an earnest Christian life among its members, to increase their mutual acquaintance and to make them more useful in the service of God. That was the beginning, and after a few months of quiet and successful work in this one church, the good example began to spread, so that in a little over a year there were six societies and a membership of 481. In 1889, at a Convention in Philadelphia, it was reported that there were 7,062 societies, with a total membership of 485,000. The great success of the movement has been in America, and England was slow to follow; but now it has taken hold, as the present convention shows, and it is in fact a world-wide movement of Evangelical faith and practical religion.

THE Christian Endeavourers have rallied from all parts of the world for this Convention. On Saturday, last week, two huge welcome meetings filled the Albert Hall and the central hall of the Alexandra Palace. On Monday 27,000 persons paid for admission to the Palace, and there were also several thousand ticket holders. At the Albert Hall welcome meeting the Rev. F. B. Meyer, President of the British National Christian Endeavour Union gave an address to his "Fellow Endeavourers," in which he sketched the chief features of the movement, which wakened fresh and practical loyalty in each member to his own church, and to the larger fellowship of all Christian churches, and made of religion a power affecting the whole of life. He further noted five special movements which claimed their immediate attention:—(1) The proposal that as the new century dawns, it may find all the ministers of the Evangelical Churches of the English-speaking world united in fellowship and covenant of special prayer; (2) the simultaneous Mission during the first months of the new century; (3) the resolution to check the disastrous effects of the drink traffic by obtaining 1,000,000 signatures to the pledge of total abstinence; (4) the resolute attempt to rid our cities and towns of the temptations to immorality, by the return of clean men to power; (5) the evangelisation of the unevangelised parts of the world, as early as possible in the coming century. That was a great programme, which might seem quixotic and impossible, where it not for the hope generated and inspired by that great catholic convention of young and earnest spirits from every part of the English-speaking world, and from other lands.

ON Tuesday Dr. Francis E. Clark, President of the World's Convention, gave his annual address. He had just completed his third Christain Endeavour journey round the world, and had found everywhere, in Japan and China, in India and Kamtchatka tokens of the same true life of faith. Out of the same four root principles, he said, a Christian Endeavour Society would grow anywhere: (1) Confession of Christ; (2) service for Christ; (3) fellowship with Christ's people; (4) loyalty to Christ's Church. Confession was the lungs of the meeting, and service was its hands and feet. Their great secret was that whereas it had become customary to have many sleeping partners in a church, they found some work for everyone to do. The annual report showed a wonderful record of growth. In the United States there 43,262 societies, in Great Britain 7,000, India 459, Germany 168, China 148, Africa 139, Jamaica 120, Mexico 110, Japan 73, France 69, Turkey 60, Spain 36, these with others making a total of 59,722 societies. The meetings of the Convention have been carried through with the utmost spirit, and a great variety of subjects, dealing with the religious aspects of every side of life, have been discussed.

THE closing meetings of the Convention were held on Wednesday. In the Concert Hall of the Alexandra Palace the greetings of some of the chief religious bodies of the country were offered to the Endeavourers. The Rev. J. G. Greenhough spoke for the Baptists, the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes for the Wesleyans, and then the Bishop of London, who said that it was eternally true that they would be judged more by the temper in which they did their work than by the results actually achieved. If they were trying to follow Christ, they must do so in Christ's spirit. He had often been struck by the amount of evil done by the little faults of good men. Dr. Parker afterwards spoke for the Congregationalists, and the Rev. W. Watson for the Presbyterians.

IT is the same secret of frank religious utterance and the demand for loyalty and some practical religious service from each one, that has led to the great success of the Young People's Religious Union among our Unitarian brethren in America. How far we shall follow in this country, in claiming the active participation of our young people in religious life and work, remains to be seen; but the subject is under earnest consideration. It was brought forward by the Rev. J. Ellis's paper at the Leicester Conference, and was again discussed at the Oxford Summer Session for Teachers.

BRAHMO SOMAJ INDIAN FAMINE FUND.

SIR,—Those friends of India who have contributed towards the fund for the millions of sufferers from famine will be glad to read the following letter from Mr. A. M. Bose, of Calcutta, and to learn that the money raised is being carefully expended under the direction of members of the Brahmo Somaj.

£1,900 has already been remitted by me. This may seem a small sum compared to what is required to feed almost a whole nation, but we are reminded and may take comfort in knowing that the generous contributions of English Unitarians to this special fund are alone sufficient to sustain the lives of many thousands of men, women, and children for several months. How long England's help will be required it is difficult to say; even to-day's news which speaks of rain falling in the central and other provinces, tells us also that so far there is no diminution in the demand for relief.

Mr. A. M. Bose, in acknowledging the receipt of the last remittance of £500 on June 28, writes:—

"Our work is going on in the Central Provinces where we have four Brahmo workers at present, who have proceeded from Bengal and are entirely devoting themselves amid many privations to the work of Famine relief. The number of our workers was larger during the last two months, but some have had to come away. We are hoping, however, to send more workers should the need arise. You and our generous friends in England will be pleased to learn that their work in their limited sphere has been most helpful in relieving distress and saving life, and it has been warmly appreciated both by the official and non-official public. I had, while at Darjeeling, an opportunity of speaking to our good Lieutenant-Governor Sir John Woodburn on the subject of the help which the members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and others are rendering in this work of relief, and of their previous help on the occasion of the last famine and the earthquake. He was very glad to hear of all this and expressed his pleasure at the way in which such practical sympathy helps to bind England and India closer together.

I am not sending you now any details of the work. You no doubt see the accounts which appear from time to time in our Brahmo papers here. Our Brahmo friends in the Western Presidency of Bombay, to whom we have sent a portion of your contribution, are working through their local agency. It is uncertain yet how long the work of relief will have to be carried on. All India is anxiously watching the course and progress of the monsoon." A. M. BOSE.

London, July 17. ION PRITCHARD.

THE Athenæum of July 7, following an annual custom, contains an elaborate and most interesting review of Continental literature during the past twelve months. The literary activity of twelve countries—Belgium, Bohemia, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Italy, Norway, Poland, Russia, and Spain—is reviewed by as many writers, belonging to the countries of which they write. Mr. Alfred Ipsen, writing of Denmark, says that the year has been one of great activity, so that he is inclined to ask whether the reading public is not lost in a period when everybody is writing. Of French literature it is said by M. Jules Pravieux, after a review which fills more than twelve columns, that tendencies are confused, but that "it is all over with scientific literature; only an artistic literature can be produced."

To-day it is all over with naturalism, as it was forty years ago with romanticism, and seventy years ago with classicism. The literature of the future will be a naturalism widened by being reformed out of certain romantic and especially classic elements, a synthesis, as it were, of the three doctrines of art which our literature has evolved since the Renaissance.

Among the religious books noticed is a study of Newman and the Oxford Movement, by M. Thureau-Daugin.

OF German literature Mr. Ernst Heilborn writes that during the year "no masterly genius has produced a work of power; but there are signs of serious and conscientious work." A new romantic movement, he says, is making its way, which originates in an awakening desire for greater depth and thoughtfulness.

In any case this much is certain: that consistent realism has seen its best days, and that the writers who are its chief representatives are more and more turning aside from it. It is equally certain that, in spite of much journalistic glorification, it has never found a true echo among the people. From the very first it was regarded by discerning minds as excellent discipline for rising talent. German naturalism left an element in German nature untouched, and it is just that element which urges humanity towards art.

Of Italy also we are told that no work has appeared capable of compelling general admiration, but the year has seen a growing revival of Dante studies, "since in coincide centenaries of Dante's vision, and also of the year of his priorate (1300). That revival, the dawn of which was already visible last year, is to be regarded as of more than merely literary importance.

It answers to the present state of the Italian conscience, which, wearied and pained by a present out of harmony with its aspirations, seeks guidance and comfort in a return to the glorious traditions embodied in the immortal book which is its Bible. . . We have to deal with a genuine return to the purest and most vivifying springs of Italian art. We are tired of all the dry bones of academic dissensions and rhetoric old and new, and spirits desirous of freedom and strength find their master and leader in the most ardent and rebellious genius Italy ever had.

In contrast with this remembrance we find in the review of Russian literature keen regret expressed that the centenary of the birth of Pushkin, "the hundredth anniversary of our own intellectual birth, for we begin with Pushkin, who was the Peter the Great of Russian poetry," has been allowed to pass without any worthy notice by the representative writers of the day. Of Spain it is said that the serious self-questioning and the desire for national regeneration which followed the disasters of the war with America have found solid and hopeful expression in the literature of the year, and especially as directed towards educational reform.

LITERATURE.

WOMEN DOCTORS.*

IN the report for 1899 of the London School of Medicine for Women a list is given of the two hundred and fifty-four medical women the school has trained. Many of these have been called to the ends of the earth to serve in hospitals as medical missionaries. China has a large number, and of Japan Dr. J. C. Hepburn says that during the last sixty years the number of medical missionaries from this country and from America has increased from less than twenty to about six hundred and fifty, of whom two hundred and twenty are women. South Africa has several lady doctors in good practice. New Zealand has two. In Persia there is one medical woman. Dr. Mary P. Eddy obtained at Constantinople a diploma from the Imperial Faculty of Medicine authorising her to practise medicine and surgery in all parts of the Turkish Empire. In Russia there are over two hundred women medical practitioners, and quite lately three lady doctors have been appointed to the Army Medical Corps. From London the Hon. Ella Scarlet, Lady Abinger's daughter, is going to Korea as Medical Officer to the Imperial Household, and has been fitting herself for her post by a course at the London School of Tropical Medicine. In May this year Dr. Esther Kim Pak, of Korea, got her medical degree at Baltimore, and returns to practise in her native country. The foregoing are only a few examples of the results of the medical education of women. Did space permit they might be multiplied fourfold in proof of the world-wide work of women doctors, all dating from the last three or four decades of the century.

Pioneer work is always an inspiring theme, and the pioneer in the medical education of women is still with us, and has given us in the book under review a most interesting record of her work since 1847, when she, a young Englishwoman, resident in America, having made up her mind to study medicine, vainly applied for admission to the medical colleges of Philadelphia and New York, and was eventually received at the University of Geneva, in western New York, the only woman student in that exceptionally generous school of medicine. There, in 1849, Elizabeth Blackwell received the full diploma as Doctor of Medicine. This event created quite a sensation in America; the Press generally expressing a favourable opinion upon it. In Europe also notice was taken of it, and Punch showed his cordial appreciation in some amusing but friendly verses.

Feeling the need of some wider opportunities of study than were then open to women in America, Dr. Blackwell resolved on a journey to Europe, and returned to her native country, which she had left as a child of eleven years. In Birmingham, where she made a short stay, and in London, she was kindly received by the doctors, including Professor Owen, Dr. Carpenter, and other medical magnates. But her plan was first to go on to Paris to study at La Maternité; and of her residence in that great State institution Dr. Blackwell gives a very graphic and picturesque account. Her next medical school was at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London, where she was admitted under certain limitations. Sir James Paget was warden of the medical school at the time, and a very cordial friend to the one woman student.

We must pass by Dr. Blackwell's social opportunities in London, but that they were rich and rare may be seen from the names of some who became her life-long friends—Madame Bodichon, Lady Byron, Mrs. Jameson, Mrs. Follen, the Herschells, Faraday, the Hon. Russell Gurney, and Florence Nightingale were all in full sympathy with her. Being now fully qualified Dr. Blackwell returned to America, and found the good seed she had sown there bearing fruit. Medical schools for women were being formed, and her sister Emily had entered the Medical College at Cleveland, Ohio. Dr. Elizabeth established herself as a regular practitioner in New York in 1851, and Dr. Emily joined her sister some years later. "The first seven years of my New York life were years of very difficult, though steady, up-hill work. It was carried on without cessation, and without change from town, either summer or winter. I took good rooms in University Place, but patients came very slowly to consult me. I had no medical companionship, the profession stood aloof and society was distrustful of the innovation. Soon after settling down I made an application to be received as one of the physicians, in the women's department, of a large city dispensary, but the application was refused, and I was advised to form my own dispensary."

This advice was followed two years later, when, with the aid of some friends, Dr. Blackwell opened the New York Dispensary for Poor Women and Children in a small room in a poor quarter of the city.

In 1854 the Act of Incorporation for an institution where women physicians could be available for the poor was obtained and a few well-known citizens consented to act as trustees. From this very small beginning have gradually arisen the present flourishing institutions of the New York Infirmary and College for Women.

My keenest pleasure in the early days of struggle in New York came from the encouraging letters received from the many valued English friends who extended across the ocean the warm sympathy they had shown in London. At this time I employed the leisure hours of a young physician in giving lectures on the "Physical Education of Girls," and later gave a drawing-room course on the "Medical Education of Women." In 1854 my sister, Dr. Emily Blackwell, who had graduated with honour at the Medical College at Cleveland, Ohio, was pursuing her studies in Europe. There she gained invaluable surgical experience from having been generously received as assistant by Sir James Simpson in Edinburgh in his extensive practice in female diseases. In 1856 my working powers were more than doubled by the arrival of this sister, who became henceforth my partner and able co-worker. Dr. Maria E. Zackrzewska also joined us as soon as she had graduated at Cleveland, and became for a few years, before her removal to Boston, our active and valued assistant in the New York work. In 1857 the New York Infirmary for Women and Children was formally opened. The practice of the infirmary, both medical and surgical, was conducted entirely by women, but a board of consulting physicians, then of high standing in the profession, gave it the sanction of their names.

The first attempt to establish a hospital wholly under the care of women doctors met with much opposition, but it prospered through all, and is now a splendid success. Dr. Zackrzewska was the resident physician for some years, and then removed to Boston, where, with Mrs. E. D. Cheney and other allies, she founded the now famous and noble institution the New England Hospital for Women, also conducted entirely by women doctors, to which only this year a new building has been added, for surgical practice, fully equipped with all the latest scientific appliances.

In Philadelphia also a Hospital and Medical School for Women were established. No such school or hospital as yet existed in England, although enlightened public opinion was favourable, and Dr. Blackwell determined to visit her native country again on a sort of medical mission. She prepared a series of addresses showing what was being done in medicine by women in the United States. After a brief visit to the Continent, where she found allies in the Countess de Noailles, that generous sanitary reformer, and Dr. Trêlat, the head of the Salpêtrière, Dr. Blackwell delivered her lectures in London, Birmingham, Liverpool and Manchester. In the Marylebone Hall perhaps the most important listener was the bright intelligent young lady whose interest in the study of medicine was then aroused—Miss Elizabeth Garrett—who became the pioneer of the medical movement in England, and who, as Dr. Garrett Anderson, lives to see the great success of her difficult and brave work, and now presides over the well-established Hospital for Women in the Marylebone-road. During this visit to England an important technical step was taken, and Dr. Blackwell had the satisfaction of being enrolled a recognised physician in the Medical Directory of Jan. 1, 1859. Thus armed at all points our pioneer returned to New York, where an increasing private practice and the claims of the Women's Hospital fully occupied her. In 1861 the Civil War broke out, and all the energies of the women doctors were engrossed in providing trained nurses for the soldiers. The Ladies' Sanitary Association was formed, and worked efficiently.

In 1865, when Emancipation was proclaimed and peace restored, public and professional opinion had so far progressed that there was no difficulty in obtaining a charter for the college, which was now amply endowed as the New York Infirmary and College for Women. Dr. Blackwell occupied the Chair of Hygiene. One of her students was Dr. Sophia Jex Blake, from England, who has recently retired from a successful career as a physician and the founder of a Medical School for Women in Edinburgh.

In 1869 Dr. Blackwell returned to England to assist in the pioneer work here. When the London School of Medicine for Women was established she was appointed Professor of Gynæchology, and for a few years enjoyed a good practice as a physician in London. In the autumn of 1869 Dr. Blackwell attended the Social Science Congress in Bristol, where she met Miss Mary Carpenter, and at her earnest request entered, she says—

On that tremendous campaign against the unequal standard of sexual morality known as the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, in which for the following seventeen years I was to take an active part. The study of the subject was a revelation to me. I had never fully realised its wide bearing on human life, and the inevitable social degradation produced by a double standard of morality. My eyes were now suddenly opened, never to be closed again, to that direful purchase of women which is really the great obstacle to the progress of the race.

In this connection Dr. Blackwell wrote her excellent work "The Moral Education of the Young." A little bibliography is given of her other published works, all valuable contributions to Medicine and Hygiene. R. MOORE.

THE BEST BOOK ON THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

MESSRS. ROWNTREE AND SHERWELL may be warmly congratulated upon the remarkable success of their book.* It deserved to succeed; but probably, even in their most sanguine moments, the authors did not expect it to reach its seventh edition within fourteen months. May we take this result, not only as a testimony to the excellence of their work, but also as a proof of a widening interest in the subject and a deepening determination to grapple with its difficulties in a broad-minded spirit? There can be little doubt that this is the explanation. At any rate, it is a characteristic of the authors that they look at their subject in a very large way. While supporting proposals which are already familiar as "practical politics" they offer a scheme which, as a whole, there is little hope of bringing into operation in England in less than fifty years. But this is what makes the book so valuable—it is for the future quite as much as for the present—it is as remarkable for its imagination as for its analytical power; it is a most practical romance; it is just the book that has been wanted to convince waverers that the temperance movement does not necessarily commit its advocates to a mere dream of ascetic enthusiasm, but that it has a social aim which is attainable and a social scheme which is workable.

The present edition contains a large amount of material which is either entirely new or has been recast. This statement applies to as many as 300 pages, and the consequence is that the book is larger than before by 160 pages. The principal additions consist of a detailed account of the working of Prohibition and Local Veto in the United States—the fruit of recent researches made by Mr. Sherwell on the spot. The facts are set forth in the most lucid and telling way, and they strongly support the authors' previous conclusions. Two examples will suffice. It is one of their contentions that Prohibition has totally failed in the larger towns. They now give a map of Portland, Maine, marking in red "the actual location of 176 places at which liquor was being sold in the summer of 1899." They say "a complete list of the names and addresses of the proprietors or managers of the saloons and other liquor places shown on the map is in the possession of the present writers." Moreover, "the list does not pretend to be exhaustive." Other towns are mapped in a similar way.

With regard to Local Option, they contend that though, like Prohibition, it succeeds in many rural districts, yet in towns it also (with one qualification) is a failure. The qualification is that, where there is a "safety valve," towns have found it possible to close public houses throughout the whole or parts of their area—the "safety valve" consisting of accessible towns, or parts of towns, where public houses are not closed. A map of the Boston district strikingly illustrates this point.

A special word of praise is due to the admirable series of new illustrations (nineteen in all) by which the authors make their statements and arguments appeal to the eye. This edition of their work brings powerful reinforcements to their plea that for a real solution of the temperance problem there must be some such constructive scheme as that proposed in their last chapter. AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

WE have glided through a wet, cold, and depressing autumn into midwinter without any very striking experiences, except those produced by war cables and the war fever, which we have had badly indeed. The "event" of these last few weeks has been the visit of the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, who has been "doing" Australia. I was fortunately able to travel to Sydney with him, and so saw more of him than otherwise would have been possible, and had ample opportunity of talking about "home," as well as about the aspects of our Church life and work here. At Sydney and Melbourne, and again at Adelaide, our visitor received a very cordial welcome, and from his own observation will be able to report on our Churches out South. At my request he put himself to some inconvenience to visit Hobart Town, Tasmania, where he preached to a good congregation. Mr. Jones is now on his way back, and will, I doubt not, have something to say that will deserve and secure consideration, as he can now speak with the authority of knowledge.

Dr. Zillmann has left Sydney. The Church there is in a critical condition, but I found the people anxiously and hopefully awaiting the announcement that a minister had been appointed to the vacant pulpit. I have since learned from the INQUIRER that there is a difficulty in securing a man. I am not surprised at that, but cannot help regretting it. There is really a fine field of work in Sydney. The initial difficulties are formidable, but not insurmountable; hard as the work must be, no nobler could be undertaken by man. Fortunately Mr. T. R. Skemp happened to be on a visit for his health, and has been kind enough to conduct the services; but the state of his health will not permit of his assuming full pastoral duties, and at any time may compel him to retire.

I hear encouraging news from Auckland; Mr. Jellie has organised an orchestra and is getting together a good choir, and new members are being added to the church weekly, such as shall be saved. A building fund has been inaugurated, and one promise of £100 and several for smaller amounts have been handed in. The outlook appears to be full of promise.

One reads the reports of the churches, of the National Conference, and of the B. and F.U.A. with indescribable longing that something similar, however much smaller, were possible here on the outskirts of the Empire. But it is something to keep the flag flying in this Mafeking of the South. Some of us would like to do a great deal more, but are crippled by our utter lack of any kind of organisation. Political Federation is almost completed—large preparations are being made for its consummation towards the end of the year—but to federate our churches seems extremely difficult. Distance is our great obstacle. We are each five hundred miles apart, and Mr. Jellie is thirteen hundred miles from anywhere. Obviously it is not easy to co-operate effectively across these wide spaces. A suggestion has, however, been made to found an Association of Unitarians for Australasia, somewhat on the lines of the B. and F.U.A.; and if this can be carried through, a new departure will be possible. There are several thousands of Unitarians in Australia, but they are very widely dispersed, and most of them are quite out of touch with our church life. I reckon that if only 5 per cent. of these can be induced to join the proposed Association and to subscribe to its funds, there would be a yearly revenue sufficiently large to enable us to assist existing churches when needed and also to break new ground. By the generosity of our friend, Mr. H. G. Turner, a preliminary circular has been issued and is being sent out to the various colonies. The response so far has not been large, but is unanimously in favour of the proposal. But to realise the scheme we need an agent to devote some time to each of the several centres of population, to organise local committees and to press the matter upon the attention of our people. This, unfortunately, we are unable to accomplish, and must make the best of limited resources.

Church affairs in general are not very lively just now. The chief attention centres upon the evolutions of the Presbyterian church. There are vague rumours of coming storms which may or may not be true; but it now appears that the federation of that church is likely to be delayed by the action of the New South Wales Assembly, which has rejected Clause 4. This clause protected minorities of not less than one-fifth, and secured them their properties should they object to the proposed basis of union. It is said that New Zealand and Tasmania will follow the lead of New South Wales and not that of Victoria, which had adopted the clause. The issue is serious, but quite uncertain.

I should like to say a little about some other movements that are of more than local interest, but the Mail is due and these must wait until a more convenient season. R. H. LAMBLEY.

OPENING OF THE MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL HOLIDAY HOME.

GREAT HUCKLOW was en fête on Saturday week, when the new Holiday Home connected with the Manchester District Sunday-school Association was opened. Parties were present from two schools—namely, Pendleton and Lower Mosley-street—to take up their abode in the Home, and there was also a large gathering of friends from Manchester, Sheffield, and other places present to take part in the opening proceedings. The Home embraces a number of separate buildings, including three houses which are specially fitted up as dormitories, a large day-room, kitchen, pantry, &c. In the dormitories there are eighty single beds, and the day-room, which is fifty-two feet long by twenty-five wide, affords dining accommodation for one hundred persons. The day-room, kitchen, and pantry are new buildings, of corrugated iron, lined with wood. They stand in an elevated position on the side of a fine hill in a field which will serve as a playground, and commanding a magnificent view of the surrounding country. The cost of the erection of these latter buildings together with the furnishing of the dormitories will be about £500, and it will be met out of the Twentieth Century Fund which the Association is raising for this and other purposes. The Home is fully booked until the middle of September, parties representing about fifteen schools taking it in turn to spend a week there. Some of the parties will require the whole of the accommodation; in the case of others several small parties are grouped together. The Committee, however, desire to keep in view their ideal, which is the transference of the whole school, teachers and scholars, into the country for a week's family life together, and to promote this they encourage the sending of large parties rather than the grouping of small ones.

The visitors on their arrival for the opening found the various buildings constituting the new Home gay with flags, and the village friends generally turned out to give them a welcome and to join in the proceedings. The Revs. C. Peach, S. H. Street, Miss Darbishire and Mr. D. A. Little (members of the Home Committee), who had been spending several days in the village preparing the Home, met the visitors and conducted them through the various buildings, the neat and clean appearance of which evoked constant expressions of pleasure and surprise. After the tour of inspection a meeting was held in the field in front of the new day-room. Among those present were the Revs. S. A. Steinthal (President of the Association), C. Peach, S. H. Street, W. E. Atack, J. W. Bishop, W. Holmshaw, G. Street, W. H. Rose, and Messrs. W. H. Talbot, R. Nicholson, T. Robinson, J. Wigley, W. Green, G. W. Osborne, and a large number of ladies. The chair was taken by Mr. D. A. Little (Secretary of the Association), and the meeting opened with the singing of the hymn "Come Kingdom of our God," after which prayer was offered by the Rev. W. E. Atack. The Chairman referred to the great growth in the work of the Association. By the generosity of their late President, Mr. C. C. Grundy, they were in possession of an admirable little Convalescent Home at South Shore, Blackpool, and now they were launching this larger enterprise. All this went to prove the vitality of their northern Sunday-school life. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal before opening the new buildings spoke of the great pleasure it afforded him to take part in a movement which was calculated to bring happiness and health to hundreds of poor children. No better work could be done than to take the children out of the smoky streets of Manchester into the sunshine and pure air of the Derbyshire hills for a week's holiday. Nor could he imagine anything better for the teachers and scholars than this week together under one roof. It would be the grandest opportunity the teachers would ever have of influencing the lives of their scholars, and he was sure it would re-act upon the life and discipline of the schools. Having further expressed his great pleasure at the charming situation of the new Home and at the perfect adaptation of all the buildings to the purposes in view, Mr. Steinthal proceeded to unlock the door of the main building.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Steinthal was passed, on the motion of the Rev. C. PEACH, seconded by Mr. W. H. TALBOT, and supported by the Rev. S. H. STREET, and the meeting closed with the Benediction.

The whole company then entered the new building, where tea was provided. The afternoon was very fine, and the visit was very much enjoyed by those attending the proceedings.

Letters of apology were received from many who were unable to be present, including the Revs. L. Scott and D. Agate. Regret was also expressed during the proceedings that neither Mrs. Worthington, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. Percy Leigh, or Miss Leigh could be present to see the completion of a scheme which their generous benefactions had done so much to forward.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE annual meetings of the Missionary Conference were held at Memorial Hall, Manchester, July 5, under the presidency of the Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough. A Communion service was conducted by the President at 10 A.M., and a religious service at 10.30 A.M. by the Rev. J. A. Pearson. At the business meeting the President, in his address, spoke upon the subject of individual enthusiasm and what it could achieve in the sphere of ministerial activities.

The report referred to fresh missionary effort successfully engaged in at Bolton, Blackpool (South Shore), Gateshead, and Burnley. The Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., was unanimously appointed President for the ensuing year; the Rev. J. C. Hirst and the Rev. W. R. Shanks were re-elected treasurer and secretary respectively; and the Revs. A. H. Dolphin, A. W. Fox, J. A. Pearson, A. E. Piggott, and J. Ruddle were elected members of Committee.

There was a paragraph in the report concerning the Unitarian outlook in the Isle of Man. The Secretary had recently paid a visit there with a view to ascertaining the desirability of holding services at one of the seaside resorts—the feeling being in favour of Ramsay. The Committee were instructed to take the matter further into consideration, and if possible to arrange, in conjunction with the trustees of the old Douglas Church, for a series of summer services.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A., suggested that there was a suitable field for tentative missionary effort at Colwyn Bay. He pointed out that a great many members of our town churches go and seek rest and health there, and he thought that a series of summer services held there would be appreciated. A resolution was, after the question had been discussed, passed, empowering the Committee to make full inquiry, and to proceed with any effort there which it may deem desirable. There is a strong desire on the part of the Conference to do what it can in promoting the preaching of our gospel in places where we have no established congregations.

At the afternoon meeting the Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN read an able and interesting paper on "What can our Churches do for the Social Life of the People?" The Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., opened the discussion, and the Revs. Jno. Howard, A. E. Parry, C. J. Street, J. Ruddle, J. C. Street and others also took part in it. Most of the members present stayed and had tea together, after which a pleasant evening was spent in proposing various toasts suitable for the occasion.

LONDON PERMANENT CHAPEL BUILDING FUND.

A MEETING of the Council of Ministers and delegates and subscribers to the Chapel Building Fund was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., in the chair. A statement was made as to the result of the bazaar, and the present position of the Fund, from which it appears that the treasurers now hold £13,035 13s. 10d., and there are still further proceeds to be looked for, from the sale of pictures and other goods left over from the bazaar. The total receipts from donations up to date, Mr. Frank Preston announced as £10,048 7s. 2d. Receipts from entertainments before and at the bazaar amounted to £316 17s. 9d., and on account of interest at the bank £97 6s. 7d. Thus £10,462 11s. 6d. had been received irrespective of actual proceeds of the bazaar itself, and these amounted to £3,142 3s. 3d., making gross receipts of £13,604 14s. 9d. The expenses amounted to £569 0s. 11d., leaving the net result as above stated. A considerable number of donations have been received since the last public acknowledgment, and we understand that a completed list will shortly be published.

In accordance with the original scheme, on the motion of Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, seconded by Mr. S. S. TAYLER, the meeting unanimously appointed the following gentlemen as the twelve trustees to administer the Fund:—Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Messrs. Hahnemann Epps, Sydney Martineau, Oswald Nettlefold, W. Blake Odgers, Frank Preston, J. Sudbery, Harold Wade and A. Wilson, and the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, A. Farquharson, and W. G. Tarrant.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, it was agreed that subject to the consent of the London District Unitarian Society, £9,000 be appropriated to the Permanent Building Fund, and the remainder amounting to something over £4,000, but not exceeding a third of the whole amount, according to the original scheme, be at the disposal of the London District Unitarian Society, for "paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of some of our chapels or halls in or near London," this part of the scheme to be completed by Dec. 31, 1902, or any balance remaining to be added to the Permanent Building Fund.

The trustees were also directed to submit a scheme to the next meeting of the Council, to be held not later than November, for the establishment of the Fund on a permanent basis, whether by a trust deed, or by incorporation under the Companies Act of 1867, or in some other way.

The Chairman, alluding to the amount of £9,000 as forming in the first instance the Permanent Building Fund, pointed out that it was a direct incentive to some generous friend to add one more donation, to make the Fund up to £10,000. A vote of thanks to the chair concluded the proceedings.

OBITUARY.

MRS. WILLIAM BINNS.

The death of Mrs. Binns, which we recorded last week, called forth many expressions of very warm and genuine appreciation and sympathy, the Blackpool papers especially giving full notices of her life and work. To the memorial notice which we published last week it should be added that in addition to her many activities in connection with the Banks-street congregation, she threw herself into public work, as she had previously done at Birkenhead and at Plymouth, and is spoken of as the virtual founder of the Blackpool Literary and Scientific Society. Before that society during the last session she read a very able paper on "Robert Browning."

The funeral service at the Blackpool Cemetery, on Wednesday week, was conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who, in the course of his address, spoke as follows:—

"The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. And so, while we are gathered here with sorrowing hearts to pay our last earthly tribute of respect to her who has entered into peace, we thankfully acknowledge that those qualities which have made her so dear to us can never pass away, but remain with us for evermore. How rich is not the harvest which her spirit is now gathering from the unselfish deeds of love she wrought, and the blessed seeds of beneficent activity she sowed on every side. I can remember how I was impressed more than forty years ago by the bright intelligence with which she entered into the rich promise of good which the benevolent plans of Mary Carpenter held out to those who were prepared to sacrifice mere earthly interests and pleasures to the well-being of the needy and neglected, and how she readily and cheerfully consecrated her cultivated mind to the service of those who had not enjoyed the advantages which had been hers. And from those early days even to the end of her life, her course has been a never-changing one of helpfulness beyond the ordinary range; not always crowned with the success which her unceasing self-devotion seemed to merit, but accomplishing so much and earning so much thankful love that we cannot help offering our grateful praise to our Heavenly Father that He has permitted us to see so blessed an example, and to be assured that she has met Him with well-used talents to receive His welcome into the joy of her Lord, and to see of the travail of her soul and be satisfied. For her we have no reason to grieve; she has done His work faithfully and well; it is those who are left behind who suffer loss and must bear the sorrow which that loss inevitably brings. This very day the workers in the Sunday-school to which she gave so many years of precious service had hoped to give her some slight evidence of their thankful appreciation of her devotion to its welfare, but it has pleased God to open to her the door of the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and welcome her into the mansions of His heavenly home, whither our blessings follow her. But not only has she done so much for the opening promise of the spiritual and intellectual life of children, you in this town have reason to honour her memory for the work she has done in promoting literary and scientific cultivation, and have felt the refining influence she has exercised on the social life of the community. It has been one of the features of the last half-century for which we are not yet sufficiently grateful that the self-devoted labours of cultivated women have raised the tone of social life, and brought an element of purity and grace into public life, the value of which will with growing years be ever more and more appreciated. I have had special opportunities of seeing the ennobling influence of this increasing share which women have taken in very varied branches of activity, educational, ethical, political and religious, and I thankfully remember to-day how earnestly Mrs. Binns has taken her part in this work, and has aided the coming of the day when the unwisdom which has hindered the helpful assiduity of women will give place to a recognition of its true worth. She has never feared to take her share of the obloquy and censure to which the defenders of women's rights have been exposed, and has helped to lay the foundation of a better form of social life for both men and women alike in days to come. Mine is not the intimate and close acquaintance which can do full justice to her rich worth, but I feel assured that if he who knew her best could tell, he would own the best work he ever did owed much to that communion of mind and heart which has made his life so blessed, and which, while he so deeply mourns its outward breach to-day, gives the promise of an even more blessed reunion in that world where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

MR. RICHARD EVE.

Many friends will have heard with regret of the death of Mr. Richard Eve, of Aldershot, who passed away at a Nursing Institute in London, on Friday, July 6, in his sixty-ninth year.

Mr. Eve was a native of Kidderminster, where his father, a Yorkshireman, had settled as a worsted spinner. He was articled to Mr. A. S. Field, solicitor of Leamington, and in 1861 settled at Aldershot, and there built up for himself a very wide and lucrative practice, shared for many years with Mr. Norman Clinton as partner, who survives him. In 1864 Mr. Eve was elected Vestry Clerk at Aldershot, and Clerk of the Burial Board. For many years he was a member of the Local Board, and afterwards a County Councillor of Hampshire. He was Lord of the Manor of Farnborough, and a prominent defender of Common rights. He gained much distinction by his able defence of Arabi Pashi in the trial of Cairo when impeached by the British Government. A man of much benevolence and public spirit, he was an enthusiastic mason, and held many honourable and responsible posts, having been for some years chairman of the managers of the Masonic Boys' School and Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge of England. In politics Mr. Eve was an ardent liberal, and made a second home of the National Liberal Club. He fought several contested elections, and twice as liberal candidate for his native borough, but unsuccessfully. A liberal in religion also, he had been for many years a member of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and by a regular attendance at meetings proved the sincerity of his interest. To the New Meeting of his native town he showed his good will by a bequest of £500, the interest to go towards augmenting the Minister's stipend.

The funeral, which took place at Aldershot cemetery on Thursday, July 12, showed in what high esteem Mr. Eve was held in the town of his adoption as in his native place and in the Masonic brotherhood. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster.

MRS. WILLIAM TITFORD.

On Sunday last Mrs. William Titford, whose presence in the little meeting house at Newington-green has been so familiar for upwards of forty years, although of late growing infirmity kept her from her accustomed seat, completed her long, useful, and loving life; and, at the age of eighty-four, passed peacefully "behind the veil."

Mrs. Titford, the third daughter of Mr. William Wilkinson, of Coleman-street, was born in 1816, and married her cousin, William Titford, in 1836, whom she survived eighteen years. Eleven children were born to them, of whom nine are now living; to these, to her many grandchildren, and to the large circle of friends who had the privilege of knowing this "Mother in Israel," the sweetness of a beloved memory will ever remain.

The funeral service was held at Newington-green on Wednesday afternoon, conducted by the minister, the Rev. William Wooding, after which the interment took place in Abney Park Cemetery.

Habits are soon assumed, but when we strive
To strip them off, 'tis being flayed alive.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Rooted and Grounded in Love.

DID you ever see a tree that had been blown down in a storm of wind? Then you saw how all the ground was torn up round about, where the great roots had stretched out on every side to get a firm hold of the ground, to keep the tree from falling as well as to get its food out of the earth. And very likely it was because some of the roots had got rotten and could not hold firmly enough, that when the storm came they snapped and the tree was blown down.

A well-grown tree is always beautiful, with the great trunk rising so straight out of the ground, and the branches stretching out on every side and reaching far up into the air, covered with beautiful leaves; and it is even more beautiful when one thinks of the roots that are out of sight, but are there all the time, going so deep down into the earth, holding it firmly grounded in its place.

In my old home there were two beech trees which stood side by side, and we boys used often in summer time to climb up into the highest branches. We could get so far up that we could look right over the top-most branches. There were all the other trees, and the roofs of the houses close by, and the neighbours' gardens, and far away, the hills were in sight. It was like a little bit of fairy land to get up there, and we loved those old trees. But we should not have dared to climb up there and swing about on those high branches, if we had not known that far below the strong roots were deep in the earth, making the trees strong and safe.

I have told you this, because I want you to think a little more of what roots are for, and what we mean when we say that our life ought to be "rooted and grounded in love." You sometimes see little children playing in the sand, digging on the sea-shore, or, perhaps, in country-places where they find a sand-heap, or have one made in their own garden. Then sometimes they arrange it all with borders of shells and make paths across; and they get some flowers and stick them in and say it is a garden. But the flowers soon wither, and of course they cannot grow, because they have no roots. Even the youngest children very soon learn that, and know that a plant must have roots if it is to grow. Not long ago our children brought home some acorns, which they had picked up under the oak-trees on a common where they had been spending the day, and we put them in a saucer with some water. Now the acorns have split in two, and at one end we can see the root growing down into the water, while at the other there is a tiny little trunk and some oak leaves on it. So the children can see how a root begins, and the trunk too. But of course an oak-tree cannot really grow up in a saucer, it must be rooted and grounded in the earth, and then it becomes a great tree and can live for hundreds of years.

I dare say, when you were quite little, if you had a garden you sometimes were impatient to see if things were growing. Perhaps you scratched up the seeds you had put in and saw the little roots beginning to form and the tiny shoots getting ready to press up through the soil and open out into leaves. But by disturbing them you spoilt their chance of growing up properly, and you learnt that for a healthy plant one of the things needed is good ground and a quiet place for the root to grow. The root must be undisturbed, for it has not only to get a firm hold of the ground to hold the plant upright and firmly in its place, but it has to get deep down into the ground, and often to spread out hundreds of little fibres in every direction, through which it drinks in moisture and nourishment from the ground, just as a baby drinks in milk and lives upon it, and grows bonny and strong.

Now think of your own life. You are not like a plant, rooted in one place, and you stand upright not by sending a root down into the ground, like those chessmen you stick into the board with a peg, to play in the train or on a tossing ship. You stand upright because your muscles are strong and you have learnt how to hold yourself together and keep from falling; and you walk wherever you want to go. And yet you must have one special place of your own—you must have a home; at least, if you have not, you are very much to be pitied. Think how it might have been if you had not had a home of your own, and if there had been no love to take care of you and teach and help you to grow up strong, and true, and brave. To have a true life you know that you had to be rooted and grounded in home; and because there is no real home without love you had to be rooted and grounded in love.

And there are other things in your life which, perhaps, you will understand better, if you keep this thought of the root in your mind, and the way in which it both holds fast and feeds the life. Love does make you strong and helps over many difficulties. I like that story of the little girl who was seen carrying a child almost as big as herself, and when some one said, "Isn't he too heavy for you?" she replied, "He isn't a bit heavy: he's my brother." Now, if she had been carrying a sack of potatoes or any other heavy load, and especially if she had been carrying it for a hard master, who had no kind word or look for his servants, she would have felt quite differently about it. But her life was rooted and grounded in love, and because she loved that little boy, she forgot all about his weight. And so, if you love your work, either at school or in being helpful at home, or when you are really old enough and go out to work, you will find it easy and pleasant; not because there is no difficulty in it, but because love makes you strong and brave to do it, and lifts you over all the hardest places.

Now think of all the things you can that go to make your life strong and true—the love of truth itself, the love of what is right, obedience at home, gladness in helping others, and admiration and reverence for great and holy men and women and wise teachers, and especially Jesus, the great and loving teacher, whom you are learning to follow. Your love goes out to all these, like the hidden roots of a plant, to take hold of them, to keep you firmly in the right place, and to feed your life from them. That is how we have to be rooted and grounded in love. Just as God makes the earth fruitful, so that the flowers and trees grow up beautifully in their season, so He gives us that good ground for our life, and, unless we choose what is wrong and evil, nothing can pull us up out of it, or keep us from growing up as true children of our Father in heaven.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Psalms of the West."

IN perfect loveliness her spirit dwelt among us, in the fulness of grace and beauty came joy to the sad of heart.

In the light of her pure soul it was heaven to rest, in the harmony of her clear voice all troubles melted away.

No bitter things arose in her presence; her gentle strength gave hope to the weary mind.

All her words were true and righteous, her thoughts were good and noble in every utterance.

Infinite was the joy of her kindness, and her sweet reasonableness transformed the partial judgment to equity.

Tender and strong in virtue, all the fashion of folly passed by her unregarded.

In her charity dwelt all beautiful thoughts; her songs breathed forth the sighing of hope in sadness, the sorrow of the divine immortal.

In the twilight a lamp beamed afar; from the dark city came one perplexed; across the dewy field came strains of a glorious hymn.

Thankfulness and praise went up in the still evening, as the stars shone down on peace.

O how blessed are the single-minded, and how joyous the quietness of the household of faith!

Truly to live is sweet, and to work honourably in the sight of God is the highest delight of man.

She doeth little kindnesses,
Which most leave undone, or despise:
For naught that sets one heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

Blessing she is: God made her so,
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow,
Nor hath she ever chanced to know
That aught were easier than to bless.

THE correspondent to whom we are indebted for our report of the South Wales Unitarian Association meetings, referring to a discussion which took place on the means of rendering the Welsh magazine Ymofynydd of greater service, adds on his own behalf the following suggestions as likely to be helpful:—"Let us have (1) more sympathy with the editor in the difficulties with which he has to contend; (2) a more generous appreciation of hard work done, with no pay; (3) a more numerous and faithful staff of contributors, to relieve somewhat the burden that now presses heavily on one or two; (4) a larger circulation, and (5) lastly, less fault-finding, especially on the part of those who neither read the Ymofynydd nor contribute anything on its behalf. Suppose every lover of the Unitarian cause were to try in future the effect of a word of commendation. It might be productive of good results."

LIFE BEYOND THE POWER OF DEATH.

THE simple service of commemoration in the Richmond Free Church last Saturday, when the tablet in memory of the late Countess RUSSELL was unveiled, touched many chords of sympathy in those who were gathered together for a common act of reverence and thankfulness. Such a life, so worthily spoken of in the addresses that were given and in the letters that were read, and remembered with such deep gratitude in many hearts, remains as an abiding possession long after the visible presence is removed, and the church in which such a memory is cherished is happy indeed in the possession of that which must uplift and purify from all unworthy thoughts and summon constantly to high endeavour.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON took part in the service on Saturday as a friend of long standing, and one eminently fitted by distinguished gifts, by intimate acquaintance and close sympathy with many of the noble enthusiasms of Lady RUSSELL'S life, to draw a faithful picture of her character and speak satisfying words concerning much that was most admirable and inspiring in her. And yet there is more to be said, and more to be cherished with unspeakable thankfulness, as, indeed, the whole service testified, beyond that which is compassed by Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON'S Religion of Humanity.

With perfect frankness, and touched by genuine feeling, Mr. HARRISON spoke of Lady RUSSELL as passing "into a world of greater permanence and of more spiritual meaning than our fleeting and too material world of sense and sight." But we confess that it is with a strange chill of disillusion that such words, even in their most beautiful expression in GEORGE ELIOT'S lines on "The Choir Invisible," affect us when we remember that in reality there is no permanence in the spiritual life of which they speak, and that Mr. HARRISON'S "Humanity" substituted for "the LORD" in his adoption of PAUL'S great words of faith, is simply an abstraction. If it is not then we are flung once more into the arms of the Eternal, as indeed we are, with great joy—finding our human life unmeaning without the living GOD, and knowing that "the world of the good and just men and women whose memory survives their mortal career, and whose inspiring influence works for good even in generations to come," is not simply a world in which their memory survives in other evanescent mortals, while they themselves have ceased to be, but a communion of living souls in which, by the grace of GOD, there abides, on both sides of the veil, a love that is stronger than death.

Every word that GEORGE ELIOT has used concerning "those immortal dead who live again"—

> In minds made better by their presence; live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> Of miserable aims that end with self;

in that Choir Invisible, "whose music is the gladness of the world"—we can accept to the full, and yet be assured that the most precious meaning has gone out of them if we do not realise that there is a true unselfish immortality of abiding spiritual life, in which the children of GOD not only leave the pure influence of what they were, but remain themselves still active with growing power in the service of righteousness and love. There are lines in MATTHEW ARNOLD'S "Rugby Chapel," as it seems to us, nearer the truth in its completeness than what GEORGE ELIOT wrote :—

> O, strong soul, by what shore
> Tarriest thou now? For that force,
> Surely, has not been left vain!
> Somewhere, surely, afar,
> In the sounding labour-house vast
> Of being, is practised that strength,
> Zealous, beneficent, firm!
> . . . .
> Still thou performest the word
> Of the Spirit in whom thou dost live,
> Prompt, unwearied as here.

While, therefore, we are grateful for Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON'S memorial words concerning Lady RUSSELL, we are still more thankful to rest in the assurance of an unbroken communion, in which memory is enriched and lifted into the expectancy of undying hope and the consecration of a united service in the great Household of GOD.

THE mind and conduct mutually imprint
And stamp their image in each other's mint.—W. Cowper.

IN MEMORY OF THE LATE DOWAGER COUNTESS RUSSELL.

A SERVICE of commemoration was held in the Richmond Free Church on Saturday evening, July 14, on occasion of the unveiling of a memorial tablet to the late Countess Russell, who from the foundation of the church to the time of her death had been an earnest and loyal member of the congregation. The tablet, which is of beaten copper, beautifully worked, with simple decoration, bears the folowing inscription :—

"In memory of Frances Anna Maria, daughter of Gilbert, second Earl of Minto, and widow of Lord John Russell, who was born November 15, 1815, and died January 17, 1898. In gratitude to God for her noble life this tablet is placed by her fellow-worshippers."

The service, which included the anthem, "The Lord is mindful of His own," was conducted by the Rev. Silas Farrington, who, after the Lord's Prayer and general collect, offered the following special prayer of commemoration :—

"Especially do we thank Thee at this time for the life and influence of Thy servant, Frances Russell. We thank Thee for the simplicity and nobleness of her aims. We thank Thee for her entire fidelity to her convictions of truth and duty. We thank Thee for her broad and generous sympathies, for her openness of mind and of heart, for her clear judgment of right and wrong, for her sincerity and singleness of thought and will. We thank Thee for all she was—for all of encouragement and high stimulus she gave to family and friends, to all who came within her circle, and for all the good which overflowed from her beyond her circle into the world. We thank Thee for a life filled to the brim, and filled to the last, with the enthusiasm of humanity, with hope and with trust. And we pray that the memory of her may be so kept alive in our hearts that she may still influence us for good, still inspire us by her faithfulness, her courage, and her steadfast faith in goodness. So may she continue to live in us, as in Thee—here, as in the Beyond. Amen."

After the anthem, Mr. Farrington unveiled the tablet and read the inscription, and then also read the following passages from the letters of friends unable to be present.

From Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford :—

> It was not my privilege to know Lady Russell either very long or very intimately; but it was impossible to know her even a little without being impressed by the warmth and genuine kindness of her heart, her strong and intelligent interest in public affairs, the high tone of her careful and balanced judgment, and her enthusiasm for all that tended to further human good. It will be a consecration to your church to enshrine such a memory not only upon a tablet, but in the hearts of the worshippers, and to cherish the spirit, equally independent and devout, by which she was distinguished.

From Sir George Otto Trevelyan :—

> I am very sorry to say that I shall be in Northumberland all July, and shall be unable to accept your invitation to be present at the unveiling of the tablet in memory of the late Lady Russell. I had the honour and privilege of knowing her in the lifetime of her husband, in that home which was a conspicuous instance of the kindly simple life that is the true accompaniment of greatness. Since his death she has always been devoted to noble and humane causes, and she has left a shining and a winning example to all that were around her.

From Mr. Justin McCarthy :—

It would be, indeed, a melancholy pleasure to me to testify by my presence my love and reverence for that most noble woman. She was the ideal of womanhood. Nothing was too high or great for her intellect to comprehend; nothing was too lowly for her refined and penetrating sympathy. One who knew her, as I had the honour to know her, must feel that he has not lived in vain when he remembers that such a friendship was given to him. Her memory will for ever be an abiding influence with me.

From the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter :—

I rejoice that your Church should thus express its reverence and affection for one who found in it—I think from the beginning—a true help in the maintenance of the spiritual life. Lady Russell had probably gone through large changes of opinion, but these had only strengthened her hold on what were to her the supreme realities of religion. Directness, simplicity, trust were the notes of her utterance in the occasional conversations which remain in my memory as among the privileges of my last year's residence in London. She seemed to me to pierce with clear insight through tangled issues straight to the inner core of disputed things, and there her judgment rested on the truth and right and love that did not change. Fearlessly she confronted great problems, knowing that there was a solution somewhere, though we might not see it here and now; but this courage was absolutely without display or self-assertion; it came from the faithfulness of her devotion to great ends, in which the cause of justice or of good claimed her whole being. The same strength of conviction which animated her in outward affairs dwelt also in her inner life, and lifted her above any dependence on external forms and the emotional aids which seem sometimes needful for souls less finely poised; the habit of her mind was worship, and communion with the Unseen gave her abiding joy. To her fellow-worshippers in your Free Church such a memory must be always precious. May the grace and purity and power of her spirit quicken those who remain, and give added strength alike to their public testimony and to their personal endeavours.

Mr. FARRINGTON then called upon the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and Mr. Frederic Harrison in turn, to deliver Memorial addresses.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said :—For several years, during her later life, I had various opportunities of meeting the late Countess Russell in the quiet of her own home, where the real mind and heart are revealed, perhaps more perfectly than in any other place. In attempting to focus the impression which her striking personality made upon me, I cannot better describe it than by saying that she impressed me most strongly by her fine spirit of sincerity and seriousness. It was this that led her to follow with such singleness of aim and earnestness of purpose the course which her convictions of justice and truth marked out for her. It was this spirit which compelled her to take what most people regarded as the unpopular side in politics, in education, and in religion. She spared herself no effort to arrive at just and true conceptions and conclusions; and, having reached them, she held by them frankly, firmly, fearlessly. In days when liberalism seemed in its decadence, and politicians were deserting the camp of liberty and progress, she never lost heart nor hope; in times of clerical reaction and sectarian exclusiveness, she remained steadfast to the principle of the public control and management of the nation's schools; amid the controversies of creed-makers and the pretensions of priests, she found comfort and inspiration in the simplicity of the Unitarian faith. She had travelled far from the Presbyterianism which she inherited, but the nobler side of her Scotch Puritanism remained with her to the end, and she was impatient of all ceremonial and ritual observances, for she feared they might rob religion of its inner beauty and spiritual power. Even this meeting-house in which we are assembled to-day was more pretentious than she cared for, and the humble upper-room in Friars-lane was evidently more to her liking.

Countess Russell possessed wonderful strength of character. There were times, I imagine, when nothing could move her from the path she had marked out for herself; but there was also a winning and gracious tenderness of disposition which gave beauty as well as strength to her character. The combination of these qualities gave a delightful charm to her personality. Dignity and simplicity, courage and graciousness—with sincerity always and everywhere present—these were the qualities that impressed me most.

Then, too, her remarkable vigour and hopefulness were a constant inspiration to all who were brought into contact with her. I saw her only a short time before her death; she was weak and ill, but her love of truth and right was keen and strong as ever. It was this characteristic which made her such a helpful influence in the world. So many men and women lose heart and hope before they reach middle-age that it was a joyous and inspiring experience to meet one who, after a long and full life, after passing through many a dark perplexity and enduring some bitter sorrows, clung to her faith in the ultimate triumph of truth and right with an eager, passionate, tireless enthusiasm. It is sometimes said that it is easy for the high-placed to be good and noble. I do not profess to know, but I believe that the struggle is hard enough for all wherever placed, and every station in life has its own peculiar temptations unknown to those who live outside.

I said that sincerity was the keynote of Lady Russell's character, but I think I am also right in saying that a simple reverence and a devout trust lay at the very roots of her being: her piety was to her an abiding joy and a perfect peace. Nor was her religion only a possession of the inner and deeper life of the soul; it expressed itself constantly in acts of thoughtful, kindly benevolence. Her heart went out in softest sympathy, her hand in most generous helpfulness to the poor, the sad, the suffering, and the lonely.

It is fitting that there should be a memorial of Countess Russell in this building. She was one of the first and chief founders of the movement which gave rise to the Church in Richmond. She was its warm friend and generous supporter in the days of its infancy, when its difficulties were greater, perhaps, than they are now. She was proud to own her connection with Unitarianism in a community that looked upon it as an evil and dreadful thing. The great principles and ideals of worship represented here week by week had her sincere and intelligent attachment. She believed in a Church that stood openly for faith, freedom, progress, brotherhood. She found—I might say fought—her way into this freer, larger faith, and it is wise and good that there should be erected here a simple memorial which will remind those who continue to worship in this place of a brave and noble lady, the memory of whose life will abide, and will deserve to abide, as an inspiration and a blessing to all seekers after truth, to all doers of right, to all lovers of goodness, to all pious, trustful souls.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON then spoke as follows :—Now that our gathering of to-day has given full scope to the loving sorrow and filial piety of the children, descendants and family of her whom we meet to commemorate and honour—now that the minister, whom she was accustomed to hear, and the worshippers, with whom she was wont to join in praise and prayer, have recorded their solemn union in the same sacred memory, I crave leave to offer my humble tribute of devotion as representing the general circle of her friends, and the far wider circle of the public to whom she was known only by her life, her character, her nobility of soul, and her benefactions.

I do not presume to speak of that beauty of nature which Frances Countess Russell showed in the sanctity of the family, in the close intimacy of her private friends. Others have done this far more truly, and will continue to bear witness to her life whilst this generation and the next shall survive. My only title to join my voice to-day with that of her children and of this congregation resides in the fact that my memory of her goes back over so long a period; that I have known her under circumstances, first, of the highest public activity, and then again, in a time of severe retirement and private simplicity; that I have seen her in days of happiness and in days of mourning; at the height of her influence and dignity in the eyes of our nation and of the nations about us, as well as in her days of grief and disappointment at the failure of her hopes, and the break up of the causes she had at heart. And I have known her always, in light or in gloom, in joy or in misery, the same brave, fearless, natural, and true heart—come fair or foul, come triumph or defeat.

Yes! it was my privilege to have known Lady Russell in the lifetime of the eminent statesman whose name she bore, and whose life of toil in the public service she inspired; I knew them five-and-thirty years ago when he was at the head of the State Government and immersed in public cares. And I am one of those who can bear witness to the simple dignity with which she adorned that high station and office, and the beautiful affection and quiet peace of the home-life she maintained, like a Roman matron when her husband was called to serve the State. And it so happened that I passed part of the last summer that she lived to see, here in Richmond, within a short walk of her house. There I saw her constantly and held many conversations with her upon public affairs; and perhaps those were amongst the last occasions on which her powerful sense and heroic spirit had full play before the fatal illness which supervened in that very autumn.

I do not hesitate to speak of her power, ful sense and her heroic spirit, for she united the statesman-like insight into political problems with the unflinching courage to stand by the cause of truth, humanity, and justice. She was not impulsive at all, not hasty in forming her decisions, still less did she seek publicity or take pleasure in heading a movement. But, with the great experience of politicians and of political things which in her long life and her rare opportunities she had acquired, she saw straight to the heart of so many vexed problems of our day; and when once convinced of the truth, she held fast to it with a noble intrepidity of soul. In a life more or less conversant with public men now for forty years past, I have rarely known either man or woman who had a more sound judgment in great public questions. And I have known none who surpassed her in courage, in directness, and in fixity of purpose. No sense that she and her friends had to meet overwhelming odds would ever make her faint-hearted. No desertion by friends and old comrades ever caused her to waver. No despair ever touched that stalwart soul, however dark the outlook might appear; for it was her faith that no right or just cause was ever really lost, however for the time it were defeated and contemned.

Lady Frances Elliot, as she was before marriage, came of a race of soldiers, governors, and tried servants of the State, and she married into a race which has long stood in the front rank of the historic servants of the Crown and of the people. But neither the house of Elliot nor that of Russell in so many generations ever bred man or woman with a keener sense of public duty, a more generous nature, and a more magnanimous soul. In the annals of that famous house, whose traditions are part of the history of England, there has been no finer example of the old motto noblesse oblige, if we understand it to mean —those who have high places inherit with it heavy responsibilities. That idea was the breath of her life to Countess Russell, as assuredly it was also to her husband, and she whose memory we keep sacred to-day is worthy to take her place beside that Rachel Lady Russell of old, who, more than two centuries ago, suffered so deeply in the cause of freedom and of conscience; she whose blood runs in the veins of the children who to-day revere the memory of their mother.

The Italians call a man of heroic nature —a Garibaldi or a Manin—uomo antico— "one of the ancient type"—one whom we rarely see in our modern days of getting on in the world and following the popular cry. I have never heard the phrase applied to a lady, and, perhaps, donna antica might be held to bear a double sense. But we need some such phrase to describe the fine quality of the spirit which lit up the whole nature of Frances Countess Russell. She had within her that rare flame which we attribute to the martyrs of our sacred and secular histories —that power of inspiring those whom she impressed with the resolve to do the right, to seek the truth, to defend the oppressed at all cost, and against all odds.

It has been my privilege to have listened to many men and to some women who in various countries and in different causes have been held to have exerted great influence, and to have forced ideas, principles, and reforms on the men of their time. But I have listened to none in our country or abroad who seemed to me to inspire the spirit more purely with the desire to hold fast by the right, to thrust aside the wrong, to be just, faithful, considerate, and honourable, to feel for the fatherless and the poor, and not to despise the humble and the meek. I know that all my remaining term of life there will remain deeply engraven on my memory all that she said, all that she felt, in the last conversation I ever held with her at the very commencement of her last fatal illness. Weak and suffering as she was, unable to rise from her invalid chair, she asked me come and tell her what I knew, and to hear what she felt about the public crisis of that time (I speak of the end of 1897). The storm of South Africa was even then rising like a cloud no bigger than a man's hand out of the southern seas. I listened to her: and her deep and thrilling words of indignation shame, pity, and honour sank into my mind, as if they had been the last words of some pure and higher spirit that was about to leave us, but would not leave us without words of warning and exhortation to follow honour, to serve truth, to eschew evil and to do good, to seek peace and to ensue it. I well knew that I was listening to her for the last time; for her life was visibly ebbing away. But I listened to her as to one who was passing into a world of greater permanence and of more spiritual meaning than our fleeting and too material world of sense and sight. And for the rest of my life I shall continue to bear in my heart this message as it seemed to me of a nobler world and of a higher truth.

Yes! she has passed into a nobler world and to a higher truth—the world of the good and just men and women whose memory survives their mortal career, and whose inspiring influence works for good ever in generations to come. In this Free Church I can speak freely, for I too profoundly believe in a future life of every good and pure soul beyond the grave, in the perpetuity of every just and noble life in the sum of human progress and enlightenment. And in a sense that is quite as real as yours, even if it differ from your sense in form, I also make bold to say, this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality—Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of Humanity, for as much as ye know that your labour is not in vain in Humanity.

Surely, we have before us a high example of what it is to be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in good work, in the memory of Frances Elliot, Countess Russell, who united in herself principles typified in the historic mottoes of her own house and that of her husband's—who kept her high courage under all adversities and opposition, in the spirit of che sarà sarà, "stand fast come what may"—in the spirit of that other motto of the Elliot's, suaviter et fortiter, "with all a woman's sweetness and all the fortitude of a man."

After Mr. Harrison's address another hymn was sung, and the service concluded with the Benediction, pronounced by Mr. Farrington.

There was a large attendance at the service, not only of members of the Richmond congregation, but of other friends. Especially touching was the presence of a number of old servants of the family, and some humble village friends from Petersham. Among those present were the Hon. Rollo and Mrs. Russell, Lady Agatha Russell, Hon. Bertrand and Mrs. Russell, Hon. George Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Seymour, Dr. Anderson, Dr. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Beach, Mr. Barralet, Alderman Thompson, Sir Roland and Lady Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Wilkes Smith, Mrs. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred Praeger, Prof. W. Graham, Mr. J. R. MacDonald (Secretary London Trades Council), Mr. Cobden Sanderson, Mr. Barkas, Mr. Barkby (Vice-Principal of Borough-road College, Isleworth), Mr. Williams (Assistant Secretary of British and Foreign School Society).

The Duke of Bedford, Lord Ribblesdale, the Right Hon. W. E. H. Lecky, M.P., and Mr. Blennerhassett had hoped to be present, but were unavoidably prevented.

OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS.

Nine days of college training for Sunday-school teachers—that is what our Summer School at Oxford essentially means. It may not seem much, measured by time, but those teachers who were fortunate enough to attend this year, and those who attended last year, now know how much can be done, even in nine days, for mind and heart and soul. Allowing for some who came this year a second time, at least 250 of the teachers in our Sunday-schools throughout the United Kingdom have, in these two sessions, come into contact, under the most favourable conditions, not only with one another, but with the best knowledge and the finest skill in relation to Sunday-schools, that perhaps it is possible for us to offer. The gain of this to our schools must be great. The effect upon individual teachers who have had the privilege of this Oxford session has been in some cases very marked.

In continuation of last week's report, a meeting on Tuesday evening should be noted, at which Mr. Ballantyne further explained to those specially interested the work of the Boys' Own Brigade; and he was requested to prepare a circular on the subject, to be laid before our Sunday-school Unions throughout the country.

On Wednesday morning the Rev. Thomas Robinson gave a lecture on "Nature's Lessons for the Sunday-school." Surely on Mr. Robinson has fallen the mantle of the late J. G. Wood! With his coloured chalks and the blackboard, with his wonderful skill at sketching the thing he is speaking of, with his full and accurate knowledge, the perfectly scientific humility with which he tells you that he "doesn't know" if he really doesn't, the clear unhurried style in which he conveys his lesson, the unforced little touches of humour which come out here and there, the unprimer-like livingness—Nature's own naturalness —with which he leads us into knowledge, and above all, the sense of reverent wonder, the consciousness of a Divine Power in and through and behind all things, which our lecturer aims at and succeeds in awakening within us—these characteristics all made of Mr. Robinson's lecture a help indeed to Sunday-school teachers. Chiefly he spoke about "Gnats," and with such effect of word and black-board illustration that we all fell in love with gnats (as was perhaps natural)! and marvelled at the infinite care which a Higher Wisdom takes in the construction of these creatures of a day. Some talk about the moon we had all seen in such beauty on the previous night, and about the sticklebacks which the lecturer had seen some dirty little boys fishing for in dirty little mud pools as he came in the train, Mr. Robinson also gave us. These grimy boys, at any rate, he said, cared a little for Nature, and out of that little might be evolved a sense in them of Almighty God and the divinity of their own powers. The teacher who wishes to interest his scholars in Nature must himself be interested in Nature and not merely in a text book. To learn Nature we must be simple-minded, ask simple questions as ourselves a part of Nature. To teach children, for example, about tadpoles we must care almost as much for tadpoles as for children. Mr. Robinson, in conclusion, gave a short list of book's suitable to teachers who wished to give "Nature lessons."

Perhaps one of the very brightest meetings was that held on Wednesday evening, when a series of "Five Minute Sunday-school Addresses" for opening or closing school was given. All listeners for the time being became not simply good children but average boys and girls in a Sunday-school. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones was made superintendent and admirably played his part. A hymn being sung as at the opening of a school, the superintendent told the scholars of two or three visitors who had called and would be kind enough to address them. He then introduced the Rev. J. J. Wright, who spoke for five minutes upon the word "Listen." This was followed by an address from Miss Brown, Leeds, on "God's Love for His own." Mr. Hillier, Oxford, then spoke on the words "Lest we forget." A suitable hymn was at this point suggested by one of the scholars and two verses of it were briskly sung. Mr. John Ballantyne, London, then addressed the boys and girls on "Striving and Helping Upward." Miss Upton, Oxford, followed with a talk upon the old saying, "The Master's Eye doeth much." Another hymn was here suggested and sung. Mr. Ion Pritchard spoke on "Making Pathways"; Mr. Thomson, London, on "Dante"; Mr. Haigh, Liverpool, on "Good-afternoon." Miss Pritchard gave the final five minutes' address on "The little things that tell." There was humour as well as seriousness during this imaginary school session. As for instance, when a boy appealed to the superintendent about another boy who was sticking a pin into him, and the superintendent not quite catching what he said, replied quite blandly, "Oh, well, that's all right!" Another hymn, and the Benediction, brought this happy and useful "Teachers in Council" meeting to a close.

On Thursday morning Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD gave her admirable address on "Hints gathered from a few American Schools."

Miss Pritchard began by saying that although she had only had the opportunity of seeing a very few of the Sunday-schools of America during her short happy visit, still she had gathered several hints that she thought might be useful to us.

At the outset it had to be remembered that whereas the majority of our schools dealt with scholars whose parents did not come to our churches, and who, as a rule, belonged more exclusively to the artisan classes, in America the greater number were attended by the children of the congregation, and belonged to the more cultured classes. The schools there may, indeed, be fitly regarded as the children's church. Naturally, therefore, the devotional service occupied a very prominent part (for sometimes they did not join the service in the church at all), and the lecturer wished that every superintendent, and every teacher could have heard the reverent and intelligent way in which the service was given at the Church of the Disciples at Boston. It had been compiled by Mr. Beattley, the superintendent, and consisted mainly of hymns and an explanation and illustrations of the five points of faith—

The Fatherhood of God.
The Brotherhood of man.
The Leadership of Jesus.
Salvation by character.
The progress of mankind, onward and upward for ever.

This little service Miss Pritchard then read, and it was so generally appreciated that, after the lecture, several teachers asked if they could have a copy to take back to their schools.

A visit to an infant class in a Universalist Church in Chicago was next described. The little ones sang a verse of welcome to their guests, a verse of welcome to some new school-fellows, and then a greeting to three "birthday" children. This was followed by a march past, the teacher who had a glass money-box in her hand, into which nearly everyone dropped a cent to go towards helping some poor destitute child. When all had returned to their seats, a little verse offering the gift in Jesus' name was sung, and then the teacher gave her lesson in a graphic and interesting manner, being careful to lead the children's minds to the subject by gradual steps.

The "intermediate classes" in the schools visited were made up of children between the ages of eight and fourteen, and each teacher gathered round her some eight to ten scholars. A lesson for us may be found in the general acceptance of the belief in the necessity for the teachers to gather together under the guidance of minister or superintendent, to study the subject to be taught. The "one topic" lesson was frequently used, and the Sunday School Society had brought out several books of these, suiting them to three grades—i.e., junior, intermediate, and advanced.

Again, the method of using a six or seven years' course is advocated in many schools, but this plan is better adapted where the schools were composed of children of the congregation, than it would be in many of our cities where there is so much shifting of population.

Another hint was given from the school of the Church of the Disciples, where it is the custom to hold a sort of repetition exercise at the end of the session, when some pictures illustrating the course are thrown on the scene and various scholars recite a passage illustrating it, or a hymn is said, or a few verses from the Bible are given by all the school together. The dramatic force, the interesting manner in which these passages were delivered, afforded an excellent lesson of the way in which the Scriptures can and should be taught, instead of the humdrum fashion in which such passages are usually "reeled off"; their true beauty was brought out in a quite wonderful manner.

One feature which might well be introduced in some of our classes is that of giving the scholars scrap-books, and in these each week the children paste a picture illustrating the lesson given by the teacher and in some cases the lesson notes referring to it, so that, at the end the year, each scholar has a book which forms an excellent memento of the course.

On Friday morning the subject of the lecture by the Rev. J. J. Wright was "What the Average Teacher may do." Of this it is not for your present correspondent to say much.

[Mr. Wright's lecture we hope shortly to publish in full.—ED. INQ.]

Saturday morning brought us "Teachers in Council" again, on "Subjects that have been actually taken in class."

[Some interesting notes on this conference we must reserve till next week.]

At the conclusion of the meeting, over which Mr. Wright presided, the chairman asked all present to accord especially to Mr. Estlin Carpenter their warmest appreciation of the most able and helpful lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," which he had delivered to them from day to day. This tribute of thankfulness to Mr. Carpenter was carried with great acclamation. To Miss Pritchard, Mr. Pritchard, the Chairman, and others thanks were given, and then with the hearty singing of an appropriate hymn and the benediction the work of the Summer School for the present year concluded.

Luncheon followed, and soon good-byes were being said, as those who had found such pleasure and profit in each other's company were separating to start for their several homes throughout the Kingdom. Happily a large photograph of the whole assembly was taken in the college garden during the week.

On Friday evening an impromptu concert was held, and a presentation of a silver teapot was made to Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Woods, in gratitude for their invaluable services in making all arrangements for the lodgings, the meetings, the excursions, &c., in connection with the gathering. The services of the steward of the college, Mr. Soundy, were also warmly spoken of and acknowledged. During the united singing of "Auld Lang Syne," all present joining hands, a daring nephew of Aunt Amy's ventured to pull her into the centre and start the singing, which was heartily joined in, "for she's a jolly good fellow." Need it be said that she's even more than that! To her and her brother and the Sunday School Association our Sunday-schools are again indebted for this second successful Summer School at Oxford.

J. J. WRIGHT.

EASTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held at Norwich on Tuesday, July 10, under the presidency of Mr. G. J. Nottcutt, of Ipswich. Mr. I. M. Wade and Mrs.

Mottram acted as joint hon. secretaries. The executive met in the morning, and after lunch the business meeting was held in the Octagon Chapel.

The President in opening the proceedings acknowledged the hospitable kindness of their Norwich friends, and moved a resolution of welcome to the Revs. C. D. Badland, of Yarmouth, and Alfred Hall, of Norwich, on their settlement in the district. This was seconded by the Rev. R. H. Fuller, and acknowledged.

Mr. I. M. Wade read the Report of the executive.

The report noted the ministerial changes of the past year, with Ipswich and Lynn still without ministers, and Halstead also dependent on supplies, since Mr. Fuller's removal to Braintree. There were, however, cheering signs that the congregations had held together, the numbers in the Sunday-schools had been maintained, and the work of other institutions had been steadily maintained. References followed to the death of Dr. Martineau, and among other members of the Union, Mr. Sydney Courtauld, of Bocking, Messrs. C. F. and Horace Stevens, of Norwich, and Mrs. Pearce, of Ipswich; and the Report continued:—

"The committee have long wished that the interchange of ministers and intercourse between the congregations of the Union could be more frequent than it is at present. The only thing that prevents this being done is the want of sufficient funds. Of course there are but two ways of meeting this and other like difficulties, and that is for the friends of the Union to bring in new members and increase their subscriptions, many of them being at present modestly small. Friends at a distance, but imperfectly acquainted with the difficulties to be contended with, and the awkward distances to be traversed, often think, and are not slow to say, that this eastern part of England is, as far as missionary work is concerned, very much asleep. But if the ministers we find it is so difficult to obtain are drawn away from us before they have even got well settled in their cures, and if funds are not at once forthcoming to enable your Union to compete with more highly favoured districts, the exercise of a little of that excellent gift of charity on the part of our critical friends may not be altogether out of date."

The Rev. C. D. Badland moved the adoption of the Report, and having remarked on the many changes in the district during the last year or so, bore warm testimony to the value of the services of Mr. I. M. Wade and Mrs. Mottram, who had undertaken together for a time the duties of the secretaryship. As a new-comer to the district he was greatly struck by the difficulties it presented to united action.

The motion, having been seconded by Mr. R. W. Ladell, was carried, and Mr. H. Blazeby, as treasurer, presented his accounts, showing a small balance in hand, and these, on the motion of the Rev. J. Dale, seconded by Mr. J. Cherry, were received.

The Rev. Alexander Gordon moved, and Mr. W. Finch seconded, a vote of thanks to the officers for their services during the past year, and also the appointment of the officers and committee for the coming year, with Mr. R. W. Ladell as president, Mr. H. E. Blazeby as treasurer, the Rev. Alfred Hall as secretary, and Miss S. S. Dowson secretary of the district Postal Mission.

The President-elect, having acknowledged his appointment, the rules of the Union were revised, and a brief address on Postal Mission work was given by Miss Tagart.

At the conclusion of the meeting a reception was given by Mr. R. W. Ladell, chairman of the Octagon congregation, to introduce the Rev. Alfred Hall to the ministers, delegates and other members of the Union.

Welcome to the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.

In the evening a service was held in the Octagon chapel for the induction of the Rev. Alfred Hall as minister, who since leaving Manchester College, Oxford, had been studying as a Hibbert Scholar at Berlin. Among the congregation were the Revs. J. Holden, W. H. Claxton and Herbert Kenward, ministers of other Nonconformist churches in Norwich, and the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, formerly of the Octagon.

The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., and the anthem, "Lift up your heads," was sung.

The Rev. Dr. Drummond delivered the charge to the minister, taking as his text 2 Cor. iii. 6: "Who hath made us ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." Addressing Mr. Hall, he said: You are this day dedicating yourself to what I know full well you regard as the very high and sacred duties of the Christian Ministry. You are henceforth to seek at the deepest fountains of Divine life power to touch and quicken the souls of your brethren. You will rely, not on any priestly functions, with which you might be supposed to be entrusted, but on a spiritual energy which makes itself felt within; and you will gladly confess that you cannot do the sincere work of Christ except so far as through the self-surrender of faith you become the instrument of the higher Will, as a revealer of the Divine Spirit. It is in the midst of momentous times that you undertake this great duty. Our free and spiritual gospel stands between two vast contending forces, and incurs the execration and derision of a traditional ecclesiasticism on the one hand, of a scientific and philosophical scepticism on the other; and it is for us to dissipate the groundless negations, and gather into a clear and burning focus the richest affirmations of both. It will not, therefore, be inappropriate to the present occasion, if, in contrast with more external systems, I remind you in broad outline of the interior basis of our Gospel, and point out at the same time that the spiritual freedom which is its immediate result is not, as is sometimes insinuated, the phantom offspring of modern vagueness, but a solid portion of our Christian inheritance, handed down to us from primæval times, hallowed by the testimony and sealed with the blood of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. In attempting to trace the idea on which Paul rested his claim to spiritual freedom we must not forget that though the same principles may be ranged in mutual antagonism, the forms of controversy change, and the questions under immediate discussion may vary from age to age. Paul's contention was with the exclusiveness and externality of Judaism on the one hand, with the corruptions of polytheism and the scepticism of philosophy on the other. In regard to the former, many problems demanded a solution. Was it necessary for the Gentiles to take upon themselves the yoke of the Levitical law? Was this minute obedience of an outward rule the highest elevation to which the human mind could ascend? Nay, was this external shaping of the life real righteousness, real religion, at all? Was not religion something inward, the surrender of the heart to God in faith, was not righteousness the submission of the thoughts, desires, affections, and purposes to the Divine Will revealed through the indwelling Spirit? But when once the soul was caught up into this higher communion it was saved from what was now felt to be the slavery of ritual and precept, and this Christ within had abolished for ever the oppressiveness of the law without. Against the Gentile world also this same Spirit bore witness, while, in the very act of abolishing the temporary forms, it confirmed the noblest and most spiritual elements of Judaism. This controversy, in the form in which it presented itself to Paul, soon came to an end, but the principle against which he contended soon reappeared in another guise. A huge wave of dogma and ritual gradually arose, which overshadowed with its unchangeable features the free play of individual life. Orthodoxy has been set up as a substitute for faith, and our religion has been made contemptible in the sight of all masculine understandings by squabbles about postures and vestments. Nor is the evil confined to the adherents of the several churches. Those who repudiate the claims of Christianity have grown up under the shade of dogmatism, and, in obedience to truth, abandoned the only gospel which they knew. To this extremity of conception we must oppose a religion of the Spirit, which seeks to bring the soul into its true relation towards God, and then leave it free to listen for itself to the inward voice, to work out in its own way the inner behests of duty. It would, however, be unjust, and nothing can be further from my intention than to deny that saintliness of character is often found in rare perfection within the pale of the most authoritative churches. Holiness must be always fascinating to one who has caught the peculiar life of Christianity, but wherever it may bloom he must still see in it a heavenly flower, planted by our Father to adorn with its beauty and scent with its fragrance the desolate and sinful ways of earth. Yet, if St. Paul be correct, subservience to the letter tends to deaden the spiritual life. None of our faculties attains its widest compass and intensest power except under a sense of freedom. Conscience, dethroned from its autocratic position, must forfeit its inner light. The spirit cannot be enlarged with the fulness of Christ, if it is tied down to forms of thought and ceremonial usages, and may not commit itself in trustful freedom to the leading of Him whose Spirit dwells within it, and bears witness that it is a child of God. The letter killeth also because it induces men to fix the essentials of religion in the wrong place. But a religion of the Spirit would not abrogate Christianity as an outward institution, for that which kills when regarded as an outward rule may give life when received into the soul as an inspirer and guide. When we escape from slavery to the letter, and allow our minds to sink into the spirit of the Gospel, a new ideal of life emerges, and thenceforth dwells within, an image of light and beauty, lifting us towards the Father of our spirits, and bringing us into harmony with His righteous will. As for ourselves, there is little hope for mere reaction. Freedom alone will not give life. Freedom and life are the twin offspring, and till the Spirit of Christ captivate our hearts we have made no real advance. What we need in addition to well-grounded information is a prophet's faith by a prophet's voice to make the sacred writings throb and glow and burn with something of their old brilliance and power, and to bring home to the sleeping heart their mighty call to righteousness and God. Take up then, dear friend, with earnest faith and zeal the work to which you have been called. It may be that the hour is come, and now is, when men will hear the glad tidings of a universal Father and of the human brotherhood, and begin to make these mighty truths operative in the practical regulation of life. But should it be otherwise, should you fail to obtain a hearing from numbers of your countrymen whom you desire to elevate and bless, still faint not nor be weary in well-doing. It is not for us to choose our way, or court an ephemeral success, but to be true to our duty, and live with simple fidelity out of the inward force of a Divine life. Still let the Spirit shine in self-forgetting love and holy peace, and reverent trust; still plead with undiminished fervour for individual, social, and political righteousness, and the beauty of a heavenly life will fall in places which you know not, and those in whom slavery to the letter has not yet killed all spiritual discernment will be compelled to acknowledge that, though your ways are not their ways, God has made you an able minister of the New Testament—not of the letter, but of the spirit.

The Rev. A. Gordon, M.A., then delivered the charge to the congregation. They had, he said, in a Christian congregation a double association, the first being that Christ was their Master, and the second that their fellow Christians were their brothers and sisters. Many had the first association to begin with, and if it be real it must lead to the other. Others entered into the fellowship of the Church and the revival of the spirit of the Church, and were led little by little into a close and intimate attitude of discipleship of the one Master. The duty of the congregation consisted not only in the maintenance of what had been handed down to them, but of strengthening the foundation of the Church. He then proceeded to deal with the relations that should subsist between the pastor and the people.

The proceedings concluded with the chanting of the Lord's Prayer and "The Vesper."

SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The 98th annual meeting of this society was held at the Old Meeting House, Aberdare, on Wednesday and Thursday, June 11 and 12. On Wednesday evening a service of communion was first held, conducted by the Rev. R. C. Jones, and afterwards a further service, conducted by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, when sermons were preached by the Revs. T. J. Jenkins and Lewis Williams.

Early on Thursday morning a meeting of the committee was held, under the presidency of the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, when the officers for the ensuing year were elected: President, Mr. Lewis N. Williams; vice-president, the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P. The secretary and treasurer, Messrs. W. James and John Evans, were re-elected. It was agreed that the next annual meeting should be held at Llandyssul, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones to preach the Association sermon, and the next quarterly meeting at Dowlais at the end of September, the Rev. John Davies to preach. The Gospel of Luke was selected as the subject of study for the Sunday-schools during the forthcoming year, and a text-book is to be prepared at once. Mr. James expressed a wish that the Sunday-schools should have a society of their own, with separate officers to look after their interests and see to their publications. He thought the children should have the opportunity of contributing to the funds and have the benefit of being taught early—a virtue not at all too well known among Unitarians—the virtue of giving. They would be interested and benefited thereby. The suggestion was only agreed to so far that the Sunday-schools should be asked to make a collection for the funds of the society once a year. The question of a Welsh prayer-book, raised by Mrs. Jones, Gellifaharen, at the Ciliau meeting was brought up and, after some discussion, shelved; our churches, like most of the Nonconformist churches in Wales, are little inclined in this direction.

Other questions dealt with were the travelling expenses of ministers attending the meetings, a suitable commemoration of the new century, to be finally dealt with at the September meeting, when it is hoped that a scheme for the extinction of church debts may be carried through, and the making of the Welsh magazine Ymofynydd of greater service to the interests of Unitarianism in Wales.

At eleven o'clock an English service was held, conducted by the Rev. E. R. Hughes, and the Rev. W. J. Phillips preached from Luke viii. 33-35 on the need of openess of mind to truth from whatever quarter it might come, as divine inspiration, and the realising of God as a living God, for whose teaching and incoming the reverent mind must be prepared.

In the afternoon, after reading and prayer by the Rev. W. James, the President, the Rev. Jenkin Thomas delivered a very fine address in Welsh on "The Shadow and the Substance." At the close of the service printed copies of the address were offered for sale and found ready purchasers. At 7 p.m. the Rev. David Rees introduced and the Rev. W. Tudor Jones preached the Association sermon, from Hebrews iii. 7, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." And a final sermon by the Rev. John Davies brought a successful series of meetings to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Sunday-school Treats.

Summer Treats for the children are reported from Brighton on July 13, Chichester on July 12, Reading on July 11, West Ham-lane and Forest Gate, together, on July 14.

Belfast: All Souls' (Appointment).—The Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., of Warrington, has accepted a cordial invitation to the ministry of All Souls' Church, in succession to the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A. A peculiar interest attaches to Mr. Drummond's appointment, as in August, 1800, his grandfather, the Rev. W. Hamilton Drummond, D.D., afterwards of Dublin, was ordained minister of the same congregation, at that time the close neighbour of the First Presbyterian Church in Belfast.

Birkenhead.—The Secretary of the Unitarian Church, Mr. E. Wallace, 15, Reedville, Birkenhead, writes to say that there is an harmonium, no longer needed by the congregation, which may be useful to some other church or school. It is at the disposal of any such applicant who will arrange for its removal. The instrument is no longer new, and would need some repairs.

Birmingham: Small Heath (Resignation).—The Rev. H. H. Johnson, B.A., has resigned the pulpit of this church, and will conclude his ministry in September.

Blackpool: Banks-street.—The formal opening of the new schoolroom, which was to have taken place on Wednesday, July 11, has been postponed, owing to the death of Mrs. Binns, till Monday, July 23, when it is hoped the Rev. Wm. Binns will be able to perform the ceremony which had been assigned to Mrs. Binns. There will be a tea at five o'clock, and a public meeting afterwards. Mr. Thomas Holt, J.P., of Bury, will preside.

Chesterfield.—The Rev. Ambrose Bennett, having accepted a call to the pastorate of the Monton Church, Eccles, has resigned that of the Elder Yard Chapel, and will conclude his ministry on the last Sunday in October.

Chester (Appointment).—The Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Loughborough, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of Matthew Henry's Chapel, in succession to the Rev. H. D. Roberts.

Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—Two foundation-stones of the new Unitarian church to be built in Wilbraham-road were laid on Saturday afternoon, July 14, by Mr. J. R. Beard and the Rev. C. J. Street. Service was conducted by the Rev. J. Ruddle, who has been in charge of the church since November, 1898, and the Rev. Dendy Agate, who, after the singing of the hymn, "God of our fathers," read from the Old and New Testaments and offered a prayer for the spiritual success of the building. Mr. R. C. Law, Chairman of the Church Committee, stated that the initiation of the building was due to the Rev. C. J. Street, and that the idea had assumed practical shape owing largely to the vigorous and intelligent efforts of Mr. Beard. It was for these reasons that they offered to these gentlemen the honour of laying foundation-stones. Mr. Beard, in declaring the first stone "well and truly laid," congratulated the Chorlton congregation on the near accomplishment of that which they had so long desired—the possession of a church of their own. He especially praised them for the tenacity with which they had carried out the scheme. They did not arrogate to themselves exclusive knowledge, but would open their doors freely to all that came. They would join in any work for the good of the community, or, if necessary, initiate such work. Mr. Beard also spoke of the tact, the devotion, and the high-minded conduct which had characterised their late minister, the Rev. Dendy Agate. The Rev. C. J. Street, who laid the second stone, expressed his satisfaction in helping to raise a temple for the worship of God and the service of man. That church would be the home of a religion of hope and trust and practical good-will. Faith and love were its foundation-stones, a reasonable faith and love grounded in God. It was not enough to give passive support to such a church, it must be the home of active workers, in which all were united in a common purpose, as helping to build "the universal church, lofty as is the love of God, and ample as the wants of man." The collection, including donations from friends who could not be present, amounted to £45 7s. Many friends expressed afterwards their enjoyment of the service and the satisfaction that the work had proceeded thus far. It was announced that the congregation hope to be in possession of their new house before the end of the year.

Clydach Vale, South Wales.—On Sunday last anniversary services were held, the officiating minister being the Rev. William James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul, the services being held in the Co-operative Hall, Tonypandy, as the chapel would not have held the congregation which was expected, and actually assembled. The services were very helpful, and the collections satisfactory. Thanks are due to friends from the sister-church of Pentor and the Unitarian Mission of Tylorstown for their presence and help.

Dewsbury.—On July 15 the Sunday-school anniversary services at Unity Church were conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, and after the serious crisis through which the church has been passing during the last fifteen months or so, it was pleasing to see such good congregations, there being 71 present in the morning, and about 150 in the evening. At the close of the evening service the preacher invited the congregation to remain for a short time to discuss the future welfare of the church, and all present responded to his call. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. J. Keighley, Sykes, T. Richards, J. Fell, Kershaw, Newsome, Ernest Thornton and Miss Howe, all of whom took a hopeful view of the situation. On the motion of Mr. J. Keighley, seconded by Mr. T. Sykes, it was unanimously resolved to ask the Yorkshire Unitarian Union to appoint a minister at the earliest possible date as the only means of saving the congregation from extinction. Mr. Ceredig Jones expressed his entire approval of this course, and undertook to visit all the families connected with the church with the view of securing their continued loyalty and support.

Flagg.—On Sunday last anniversary services were held in this Peak Chapel, known to many by the devoted service rendered by the late Mr. Charles Woollen, of Sheffield. The preacher on this occasion was the Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., of Derby, who was accompanied by members of the Derby choir. Tea was partaken of between the services in the chapel yard, and friends were present from Buxton, Manchester, and Sheffield.

Great Hucklow.—The annual sermons were preached in the Old Chapel on Sunday last. Additional interest in the sermons this year arose from the fact that the preacher was the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern, of Crewe, who ministered here and at Bradwell for nine years. Good congregations assembled at both services, especially in the evening, when the chapel was crowded, every available seat being occupied, and chairs and forms being placed in the aisles. Many of those present had travelled a considerable distance to attend the services. Mr. Arthur Maltby presided at the organ, and special hymns were sung by the choir and scholars of the Sunday-school.

Hull.—Park-street Church will be closed for the next two and perhaps three Sundays, for the installation of electric light and necessary cleaning and repairs. On July 25 the usual annual services will be held at Sutton-on-Hull.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—The prizes won by the Mill Hill scholars in the recent examinations under the auspices of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union were presented on Sunday afternoon last by Miss Matthews. The scholars, along with a few parents and friends, assembled in the Priestley Hall. The Rev. Chas. Hargrove, M.A., the president of the school, occupied the chair, and in formally introducing Miss Matthews, expressed his pleasure that, as the oldest superintendent of the school, and also representing one of the oldest families connected with the congregation, she had consented to present the prizes. It was an honour to which he knew of no one who had a greater claim. Her sense of duty in the performance of her good work had been so strong that numerous difficulties, including weather and distance, had been overcome, mainly, he felt convinced, because her heart was in her work. Miss Matthews having presented the prizes, Mr. Fred. Clayton (superintendent) proposed, Mr. Ferro seconded, and Miss Brown supported a cordial vote of thanks to Miss Matthews, which, having been warmly accorded, devotional exercises concluded the proceedings.

London: Brixton.—The Rev. F. W. Stanley, formerly of Bath, entered on his ministry at Effra-road, on Sunday, July 8, and on the following Friday evening a welcome meeting was held in the schoolroom and in the adjoining tennis ground, which was prettily illuminated with Chinese lanterns. In the course of the evening, which was chiefly spent in social intercourse, Mr. F. Nettlefold took the chair, and in the name of the congregation offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Stanley. Mr. Martinelli, on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, on behalf of neighbouring congregations, and as President of the Provincial Assembly, joined in the welcome. Mr. Stanley, in responding, thanked them for the cordiality of their reception. In appointing a minister, he said, he took it for granted that they wanted one, and would support him. A sermon, though written by the minister, was preached by the congregation. If there was an inspiring congregation, the sermon was far more effective. They must work all together, not the minister alone, but minister and people, bound together by the highest bond. He trusted that the kindly feeling of that evening might never be marred, so long as they remained together. At the conclusion of Mr. Stanley's address, the chairman called upon Mr. J. Harrison, who said that their friend, Mr. Henry Eaton, after serving the congregation as secretary with exemplary faithfulness for 18 years, had felt obliged to retire, and as a token of their esteem and gratitude to him an illuminated address had been prepared. It bore upward of eighty signatures, and when completed and framed they should hand it over to Mr. Eaton. Mr. Harrison having read the address, Mr. Eaton acknowledged with much feeling that unexpected expression of their good will towards him. There was music both before and after the speaking, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

London: Little Portland-street.—The Congregational Society held their summer excursion on Saturday, July 14, going from Dorking Station to Westcott, where tea was enjoyed on the lawn of Mr. Rowland Lawford's garden, and a photograph was taken.

London: Stamford-street.—The annual excursion of the Band of Hope and Mercy took place on Saturday last, Mr. A. H. Biggs again generously defraying the whole of the members' travelling expenses. On Sunday last, at the close of afternoon school, Mr. S. T. Kirby was presented with several volumes of books, the gift of the teachers, in token of their appreciation of his earnest labours as teacher and superintendent for several years, he having resigned in consequence of his acceptance of an educational appointment at Watford. The presentation was made by the Rev. Frederic Allen, by whom the kind wishes of the givers were fittingly expressed.

Malton.—The first of five North Riding County Council Technical Scholarships, value £60, and tenable at the Yorkshire College, has been awarded to Cecil Spiegelhalter, grandson of the late Rev. W. Sutherland, who has also passed the Victoria University Entrance Examination in the first division.

Middleton (Appointment).—The Rev. John Harrison, of West Bromwich, has accepted the pulpit of the Old-road Chapel, and will enter on his ministry on the first Sunday in September.

Moneyrea.—The annual soirée was held on July 10, and was very enjoyable and successful. After tea in the school-room an excellent programme was gone through in the meeting-house. The chair was occupied by the Rev. R. Lyttle. Interesting speeches were delivered by the Revs. J. Kennedy (Larne), J. A. Kelly (Dunmurry), W. E. Mellone (Warrenpoint), and S. Pinkerton (Newry). Songs were sung by Miss Kerr (Belfast) and the Rev. R. M. King (Newtownards), and musical selections given by Messrs. E. Worth and S. Spence. On the motion of Mr. A. K. Stewart, seconded by Mr. T. S. White, a vote of thanks was passed to the speakers, singers and tea-makers. A pleasant and profitable meeting was brought to an end by a closing address and the pronouncement of the benediction by the Rev. J. Kennedy.

Monton (Appointment).—The Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., of Chesterfield, has accepted a cordial invitation to the pulpit of Monton Church, in succession to the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., and will enter on his duties at the end of October.

Newark.—The annual flower services were held in the Free Christian Church on Sunday week, the preacher being the Rev. G. W. Price, of Hinckley. Special hymns and an anthem were sung, and the church was decorated for the occasion.

Reading.—Anniversary services were held on July 15, the preacher being the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford. The church was decorated with flowers, and the offertories were very good.

Shepton Mallett.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held in Cowl-street Chapel on July 8, the preacher being the Rev. Joseph Wain, of Trowbridge. Special hymns and anthems were rendered morning and evening, and at the afternoon service Mr. Wain gave an address to the children on "The Greatest Thing in the World is Love."

Stockton.—The annual choir excursion was made on July 12 to Hinderwell, and was much enjoyed.

Sunderland.—On Sunday, July 15, a flower service was held in the Unitarian Free Church, which had been artistically decorated with plants and cut flowers. The Rev. Francis Wood gave suitable addresses, morning and evening, to good congregations. A special Sunday-school service was held in the afternoon, when the scholars and friends were addressed by Mrs. Wood.

Tavistock.—A special interest attached to the Abbey Chapel school treat this year, which took place on Wednesday, July 11. The children were driven to Sampford Spiney, in the midst of the finest Dartmoor scenery, the place where Thomas Larkham, M.A., the first minister of the congregation, on Whit-Sunday, 1661, preached to his faithful followers on the day his successor took his place at Tavistock Parish Church.

Walthamstow.—The children's carnival flower show was held on Thursday week, when forty-four children returned plants for competition. A novel feature this year was the wild-flower competition, for which there were nearly thirty entries. Several prizes in the shape of books were given by Mr. Ginever for the best plants, and several certificates for those highly commended and for the best basket or vase of wild flowers. Mr. Toye distributed the prizes and certificates, and expressed the pleasure he felt in being present again. The band from Limehouse was also present, and played several selections. Over 100 plants were lent by friends, and they were very tastefully arranged. A great many of the children's parents were present, and altogether the show was a great success. Flower services were held on Sunday last, Mr. Galloway conducting in the morning and Mr. Ginever in the afternoon and evening.

Warrington (Resignation).—The Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., having accepted an invitation to All Souls' Church, Belfast, has resigned the pulpit of Cairo-street Chapel.

How the existence of an instinctive resentment against personal wrong, or in good men against wrong to others or moral depravity, can suspend the one all-comprehensive duty of love to men (including, of course, ourselves), is a question which will, perhaps, offer no difficulties to those philosophical moralists whose ethical system seems to consist in the mixture of a little truculent theology borrowed from primitive Judaism with a good deal of pure paganism; but which must, I think, be an embarrassing one to those Retributionists who profess any sympathy with Christian standards of Ethics. The most Christian of the Schoolmen (e.g., Wycliffe) always maintained that God's punishments were, and man's should be, the expression of love.—Hastings Rashdall.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

The late Dr. James Martineau, who recently passed away, writing some time ago to Miss F. P. Cobbe, of Vivisection, said:—"I should have been very sorry not to join in the protest against this hideous offence. . . . The simultaneous loss from the morals of our 'advanced' scientific men of all reverent sentiment towards beings above them as towards beings below is a curious and instructive phenomenon, highly significant of the process which their natures are undergoing at both ends." Since then the rage for vivisection in this country has enormously increased, and can only be met, if at all, by the most strenuous opposition. Those interested in the subject are earnestly invited to communicate at once with the Secretary of the above Society.

ON July 11 a marble statue of Professor Hase, the church historian, was unveiled in the Fürstengraben at Jena, to commemorate the centenary of his birth, which falls on Aug. 25. Hase was for sixty years professor in the University of Jena, and was honoured not only as a liberal theologian, but a good citizen. As a young man of twenty-three he was sent to the fortress of Hohen-Asperg, suspected of revolutionary tendencies. Town and University took part in the celebrations. The first wreath to be laid at the foot of the statue after the unveiling was from the Grand Duke of Sachsen-Weimar. The chief memorial address was given by Dr. Nippold, who succeeded Hase in his professorship. In the evening a festive meal was held at the Black Bear, an historic Inn, with which the names of Luther and Bismarck are connected. It is ten years since Hase's death, but the recent celebration shows how warmly he is still remembered in Jena, while he holds a permanent place among Church historians.

THE Bishop of Lahore, we learn from the Pioneer Mail of June 22, has received from a number of earnest Mohammedans of the district an appeal to meet in public controversy Mirza Ghulam Ahmad Qadiani, the chief of Qadian, "who not only lays claim to the Promised Messiahship, but has made good that claim by strong and conclusive arguments, and has proved himself to be the Promised One whose appearance has been foretold in the holy Quran and the Bible." Their desire is that the Bishop and Mirza should respectively set forth the arguments for the truth of Christianity and Islam, that they may be convinced which is the living faith, and which of the prophets, Jesus or Mohammed, they ought to follow. What answer the Bishop gave to this appeal we have not yet heard, but one of the conditions laid down for the proposed controversy is specially worthy of note:—

Each party shall bring forward proof in support of his own prophet or book, and shall not be allowed to attack the book or the prophet of the opposite party. For such attacks are not conducive to any good and often injure the feelings of the party attacked. The public on a comparison would be able to know the strength or the weakness of the arguments brought forward by each party. Each party shall, however, have the right to refute attacks which could in all likelihood be made by the other.

HIS clerical enemies are rejoicing over the discomfiture of Don Miraglia, the heretic Bishop of the Oratorio di San Paolo at Piacenza, of whom we have heard from time to time from Signor Bracciforti, of Milan. During June Miraglia gave some lectures in Rome and other of the chief cities in Italy, which called a good deal of public attention to his work, and increased the clerical bitterness against him. But unfortunately he had been misled by the story of a young girl in his congregation as to the outrageous conduct of a priest in snatching a Bible out of her hands as a heretic book, and had written a vehement article of denunciation in his paper, the Gerolamo Savonarola. This led to an action for libel, and though Miraglia frankly acknowledged that he had been misled, and expressed regret for the mistake, he was condemned by the Court of Appeal at Rome to seventeen months' imprisonment. Rather than face this he escaped from Italy, and, according to an article in the Semeur Vaudois, reprinted in more than one French Protestant paper, is now at Geneva, ministering to the Italian workmen there and still superintending his Italian work.

THE Lend a Hand Record for July contains the address of the President, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale to the annual meeting, and also the annual report of Mrs. Whitman, the secretary of the Society. This latter tells of the preparations made by the Lend a Hand Clubs towards giving a hospitable welcome to the 1,450 teacher students from Cuba, who were coming to Cambridge for a Summer School meeting in July. It also contains the following record:—

At the last annual meeting we had all been stirred by the rousing appeal of the Tsar of Russia for a Conference of the Great Powers to further the maintenance of general peace. In answer to resolutions sent from the Lend a Hand Society our president received a letter of thanks from the Tsar through the Russian Minister, Count Cassini. (This letter we have had framed, and it is here for inspection.) We continued the Peace crusade each fortnight until the end of the Conference which had been called at The Hague. We also continued to distribute copies of the manifesto of the Tsar, and the best leaflets on peace. This necessitated extra help at the office. But ere long we were recognised, and are still, as the headquarters for literature and information on arbitration and permanent peace. Though the clouds seem to have settled on the nations since then, we are strong in our belief that the work will show results later, and the sun will break through the clouds, dispersing them for ever.

REFERRING to Mr. Fripp's sermon on the "The Revival of the Sense for Nature," in our issue of July 7, a correspondent, Mr. T. W. Cole, of Wandsworth, writes:—"With regard to the causes which gave rise to the general awakening of the more or less dormant poetical sense, at the close of the eighteenth century, a trenchant analysis made by Ruskin in "Modern Painters" applies very pointedly. He insists that the sensation of beauty is neither sensual nor intellectual in its origin, but depends on a pure, right and open state of the heart. These words, simple though they may seem, cut to the the very root of the matter. We need only glance at the eighteenth century to become aware of the arid intellectuality and gross sensuality which pervaded everything. Artificiality had corrupted all that was natural or spontaneous. As a consequence, all that depended upon an open state of heart was, of necessity, ousted out of existence. In this, then, lay the cause of that deplorable stagnation of feeling with regard to natural beauty which characterised the eigthteenth century, and against which such a revul-sion was felt at the uprising of Wordsworth and his school. Finally, this danger of artificiality, at least, is not yet absent from amongst us. Now, when it has become the fashion to assume rapturous admiration for natural beauty, it has assumed a new guise in the easy-fitting garb of insincerity."

BLACKPOOL: BANKS-STREET SUNDAY SCHOOL.

THE new school buildings, which were completed about a month ago, were opened on Monday by the Rev. William Binns, formerly minister of the congregation.

The opening ceremony was to have been performed on July 11 by Mrs. Binns, whose sudden death four days before that date so sadly compelled a postponement.

There was a very large attendance at the opening, Mr. T. Holt, J.P., of Bury, presiding, and among those present, in addition to the Revs. William Binns and D. Davis, the present minister, being the Revs. J. S. Balmer and B. Dutton, ministers of other Nonconformist congregations in the town, whose presence was cordially recognised.

The CHAIRMAN, in presenting the silver key with which to perform the opening ceremony to the Rev. W. Binns, referred sympathetically to the death of Mrs. Binns. The committee had been wise in wishing to confer the honour upon her. She had worked in the school as superintendent and teacher for several years, and by her goodness and kindness she had won the affection and esteem of all. The new school would redound to her honour. He hoped that as an institution it would be the means of training and guiding the minds of children in the right direction. He wanted the school to have a great influence on the inhabitants of the town. Mr. Binns was well known to them as an able and eloquent minister, and he was pleased that he had come forward in the place of Mrs. Binns.

The speaker then presented the key to Mr. Binns, who briefly thanked him for the gift. A procession was then formed to the schoolroom, where the door was opened by Mr. Binns, who, after a dedication hymn and prayer by the Rev. D. Davis, gave the following address:—

It was, he said, with a mixture of sorrow and of joy that he stood before them that afternoon. He was sorry, as human nature must be, at the separation which had temporarily taken place. But with that sorrow there was still an unspeakable joy that the mercy of God had saved her from a lingering death, which would have been her inevitable portion. Under other circumstances he would have preferred to give his own views upon Sunday schools, but as he represented his wife, he felt he could not do anything except give the address she had partly prepared for the event. The Saturday afternoon on which she died she had been preparing the rough outlines of what she should have said to them last Wednesday week, but as they knew, last Wednesday week, when she should have spoken, her body was interred in the Blackpool Cemetery, as a few days before her immortal soul ascended to her Father and her God. Looking over her various little memoranda he found a few scrappy and imperfect notes which no doubt she had intended to develop. The speaker then read the notes, which opened with thanks to the Church for the honour conferred upon her in asking her to open the new schoolroom, and for the handsome key given to her for her labour, which she would treasure as long as she had life. After referring to the increased accommodation, the notes said that the lines on which a Sunday-school might be organised were difficult to define, but it was to be remembered that things moral and religious in such a school were of the greatest importance in training young people towards a Christian style of life. The tendency of the present time was to worship the world and the things of the world, and there was but little care for public worship and Sunday-schools, whilst spiritual matters were left to the women. But in the end the men refused to grant the political power to women on the ground that they were inclined to be priest ridden, and were not to be trusted to think individually. This erroneous, mistaken, short-sighted view had a good deal to answer for; but, happily, it was passing away. Development and growth ought to be the law of Sunday-schools as of all institutions. Now that they had a larger and more commodious room let them hope that the scholars would have a larger sympathy, greater goodness, more tender conscience, livelier imaginations, beautiful and greater thoughts, and that they might learn more and more the reverence of the aspiring soul of religion. Here, said the speaker, she came to a sudden end, and so would he, and Mr. Binns took his seat, both the speaker and the audience being much affected.

The Rev. D. DAVIS moved a hearty vote of thanks to all their friends and visitors and to Mr. Binns. The Revs. J. S. BALMER and B. DUTTON and Mr. J. CHEW also spoke.

After tea a public meeting was held, when Mr. T. HOLT again presided, supported by the Revs. W. Binns, D. Davis, H. Enfield Dowson and H. B. Smith, Messrs. J. Chew, W. Healey, J.P. (ex Mayor of Heywood) and C. C. Grundy. Addresses were given by the Chairman, Mr. Dowson and Mr. Binns, and a capital programme of vocal and instrumental music was rendered. The total donations and offertories, with the receipts from a stall, amounted to £56.

THE KHASI HILLS UNITARIANS.

THE annual meetings of the Unitarians of the Khasi Hills were held at Jowai on April 21, 22, and 23. Throughout the week there were home prayer meetings, and on Saturday evening there was a welcome meeting of friends from abroad.

On Sunday morning there was a devotional service. There were two sermon meetings during the day. The preachers were U Kat Pohrmen and U Khylláw Padu, of Nongtalang, Babu Durga Singh and U Már Singh, of Shillong, and the Rev. David Edwards. The sermon, by the Rev. David Edwards, was on "The Misuse of Love," and was a very interesting and uplifting one, and listened to with rapt attention. At the close of each meeting collections were taken in aid of the Famine Relief Fund. The attendance was about 200.

In the afternoon there was a singing procession and open addresses through the village. At 5.30 P.M. there was a women's meeting.

At seven P.M. a meeting of the Board was held, and the report of the Executive Committee was read. Among other things the following was reported:—600 copies of the Funeral Service in Khasi, compiled from the English and American Unitarian Service Books, were printed for use of the Unitarians; they will be bound together with the new Hymn-book now under preparation. Five Unitarian children passed the Government L.P. Examination in 1900, three of whom obtained scholarships of Rs. 3 each; two of these were from the Methodists' schools, and three from the Unitarian day-school at Jowai.

Reports of the work done at Nongtalang, Jowai, Raliang, Laitlyngkot, and Shillong were read by the delegates. The accounts of the Mission and the Union's funds were read by the Treasurer, Mr. Kissor Singh, and passed by the Board.

The Permanent Mission Fund has amounted to Rs.242.

On Monday morning there was a business meeting, in which, among others, the following resolutions were passed:—Resolved to send greetings to the Unitarians of Great Britain and America. Resolved to send our greetings and feelings of gratitude to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland and to the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. Resolved that this meeting of the Unitarians of the Khasi Hills do record its sense of loss at the death of Dr. James Martineau and its respectful sympathy with his family.

At 1 P.M. there was a lecture on "Organisation and Its Benefits," by the writer. At 7 P.M. another lecture was delivered by the Rev. David Edwards on "Why Should I Go to Church?"

After this there was a Board meeting, again in which appropriations of the mission fund were made for the year 1900-1901.

FAITH.

SWEET faith, who art thou? stranger or friend?
We know not thy source, and we know not thy end;
We know not thy meaning, till death's veil shall rend—
Sweet faith, who art thou? stranger or friend?

Sweet faith, who art thou? God's face made clear?
Being of brightness from Christendom's sphere?
Being of loveliness, firm to the end,
Sweet faith, who art thou? stranger or friend?

Sweet faith, whence comest thou? heaven or earth?
Who was thy first-born? who gave thee birth?
Being of brightness, influence send,
Sweet faith, we know thee, God's truest friend.

III.—The Discovery of Mediævalism.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

"Things which we have heard and known, and such as our fathers have told us."—Psalm lxxviii. 3.

In previous sermons I have spoken of the Revival of the Sense for Nature and the Awakening to the Spiritual as among the leading poetic influences of the century. A third influence, closely connected with these, has been the Discovery of the Past—the discovery of the great men, the great cities, the great faith, the great thought and writing and painting and building and sculpture of the past, and in particular of the Middle Ages. Our eyes have been opening during the last hundred years to beliefs and achievements and heroes of old time, which have revealed to us our provincial and incomplete modern culture. One of the real signs of greatness in our midst has been, through the discovery of greatness in others, the growing consciousness that we are not great. It is a mark of Lowliness, and of that which is always lowly, though weak people do not see it, Strength.

Let us continue the comparison between this century and the eighteenth. I suppose England was never more self-satisfied and never less inspired than during the reigns of Queen Anne and the first two Georges. Take a leading writer and statesman of that period, a man of gifts and deserved fame, Joseph Addison. I have already referred to his artificial taste. He disliked the Alps. Mountains and precipices distressed him. He preferred, with the Dutch subjects of William III., a good flat plain, or, with Evelyn, a French garden.† He preferred also St. Paul's Cathedral to Westminster Abbey. The former was learned and classical and pompous, the latter Gothic and barbarous. Ladies and gentlemen of that time in powdered wigs and crinolines or silk suits were rather given to calling their fathers "barbarians." Cromwell, of course, was one. Milton had something to be said in his favour because he was a good classical scholar, but the Elizabethans were rude Goths. Of Edmund Spenser Addison wrote:—

"Warmed with poetic rage,
In antic tales [he] amused a barbarous age;
But now the mystic tale that pleased of yore
Can charm an understanding age no more."

Chaucer he condemns for his "unpolished strain," whilst English writers before him, such as Alfred and Bede, were dismissed by the polite ignorance of the period as little better than savages.

We have since learnt differently. No reading man can now suppose that English history begins with the Norman Conquest. He knows that some of our greatest rulers, statesmen, and Churchmen, some of the chief makers of England and her Constitution as they are to-day, lived before William I. Our ancestry, our language, our poetry, our religion, our very geography go back centuries earlier, and link us with a noble past. Our relationship extends to the Keltic fringes of these islands, and across the sea to Norway, Denmark, and the shores of Germany; and, in itself, this affinity is in a high degree poetic and stimulating. Then, coming down to the near end of our past, to the "understanding age" Addison speaks of, we know how completely it has been eclipsed by the Elizabethan and Puritan epochs. The giants have stepped forth, and the pigmies have shrunk into insignificance. Dryden, Addison, Pope, and other "Augustans" are very small company for Milton, Shakespeare, Spenser, and Sidney; and Walpole, Marlborough, and William III. appear little men beside Cromwell, Burleigh, and Queen Elizabeth. Cromwell, in the pages of Carlyle and Gardiner, stands out among the greatest, equalled only in our history by Alfred and the Conqueror. Consider what it has meant for us to have come to a knowledge of these three glorious kings! A hundred years ago they were almost unrecognised. In the days of Swift and Gay, and more recently, the name of king stood for vice and feebleness; and to the present day government is looked upon by very many people as little better than red-tapism, bribery, and inefficiency. These monarchs teach us a different lesson. If we would know what a really great ruler can do for a nation, and what a nation can accomplish under a really great leader, let us study the lives of these men. It will throw a new light for very many of us on our national history, and give us a far truer estimate of current affairs. I venture to say to any young man or woman who may hear me this evening, that he will learn more of his country, more of its genius, its capacities, its tendencies and possible destiny, from a careful study of Freeman's "Norman Conquest" and Carlyle's "Cromwell" than from ten years' reading of the daily newspaper—just as we may see more of a city, of its origin and environment, in one afternoon from a hill-top, than by driving through its crowded streets for a fortnight. Similarly, what a debt of gratitude we owe to Coleridge and other discoverers of Shakespeare! Our immortal poet is only just coming to his own, and it is incalculable what we are beginning to learn from him. What refreshment, what noble pleasure we derive, for instance, in Belfast from seeing half a dozen of his plays well acted during the year! How wise he is, how full of common-sense, how humorous, and how deep! To the English people as a whole, and to us in Belfast in particular, this is a real discovery. Think what it will be when Shakespeare is widely known and loved among us, when a play of Shakespeare is performed here, as already in some of the towns of Germany, once or twice a week throughout the year. Those who know Shakespeare's spirit know well that Belfast would then be a happier, kinder, wiser, and more religious city to dwell in.

But I want you specially to consider the change that has been effected by the discovery of that great middle region of history, literature, art, and faith, between the Old English and Elizabethan eras, called Mediævalism.

I am not sure that this discovery is not by far the most important of the present century. Do not smile at what you may suppose my fanaticism. I say deliberately that I believe it will do more for us than the discovery of steam locomotion, electricity, evolution, or bacteria.

Walter Scott began it. At the time when Wordsworth was writing "Lyrical Ballads," and Dove Cottage poems, Scott, stirred by reading German romances, collected "Border Minstrelsy," edited the mediæval story of "Sir Tristrem," and produced his own "Lay of the Last Minstrel." The last, it has been said, came like a breath of fresh air from the hills. The old wild border life, as sung in his free verse, delighted people wearied by dull convention. He became very popular. In the days just before and after Waterloo, when John Bull was in a swaggering mood mightily pleased with himself; when the British flag and constitution were employed to silence reformers, and English Society was conservative, churchy, and starchy, and contemporary life was so dull to men with poetry in their souls that Landor and Shelley fled to Italy, and Byron to Greece, and Keats turned away to dreams of classical beauty—in such days Scott fed the imagination of England with the "Waverley Novels." These were not revolutionary, and yet they were romantic. Tory and Whig alike took pleasure in the stories of Robin Hood and Richard Cœur de Lion, in tournament and chivalry, Highland chieftains, castles, abbots, and monasteries. Here was a new way of teaching history; Shakespeare's way come in again, though in prose instead of verse, combining wonder with information, antiquities and manners with delightfulness — a method, says Newman, who recognised Scott's influence on Tractarianism, which "stimulated the mental thirst and fed the hopes of the people, setting before them visions which when once seen are not easily forgotten, and silently indoctrinating them with nobler ideas which might afterwards be appealed to as first principles."

Newman's interest in the Middle Ages sprang from a similar source. He hated revolution and Liberalism. He was against O'Connell and the Irish Catholics, against Lord Grey and the Reform Bill, against Arnold and the Broad Churchmen. But he was not satisfied with England, least of all with the religion of England. He regarded with dismay her commercial spirit, and the "detestable" doctrines of her Evangelical Protestantism. He looked back with a great yearning. He preferred the vision of church spires to that of factory chimneys, and the sound of cathedral bells to the shriek of the steam-whistle. He would rather see a procession of monks and choir-boys through the streets on a saint's day, with chant and hymn, than a procession of Orangemen beating their drums on July 12. The symbols of the old Catholic Christianity had deeper significance for him than the party-cries of modern politicians, and the picturesque humanity of the mediæval market had a charm he could not feel in the silk-hatted, black-coated crowd of the modern Stock Exchange. The one thing left in England with the possibility of poetry in it was the Church; and to the Church—the Church of Hooker and Lancelot Andrewes, Sir Thomas More and John Fisher, of Grossteste and Anselm—

* A sermon preached at All Souls' Church, Belfast, in May, 1900.

† Evelyn says:—"We passed through a forest (of Fontainebleau) so prodigiously encompassed with hideous rocks, heaped in mountainous height, that I think the like is nowhere to be found more horrid and solitary"; but he is enthusiastic about Richelieu's villa, with its walks "so accurately kept and cultivated that nothing can be more agreeable," and "large and very rare grotto of shellwork in the shape of satyrs and other wild fancies."

he turned with passionate determination to do what he could to restore it to its ancient beauty, and to put life into its venerable forms. He welcomed Keble's "Christian Year," whose music at a time, he said, when "the general tone of religious literature was nerveless and impotent," gave new meaning to the old seasons and festivals; and he himself drew up a calendar of English saints preparatory to a series of their lives. In a preface to this projected series he expressed the hope that they would "make Englishmen love their country better, and on truer grounds; that they would teach them to invest her cities and villages, her hills and springs, with sacred associations; give them insight into her present historical position; instruct them in the capabilities of the English character, and open upon them new hopes and duties."

So wrote Newman in 1843. In that year appeared the first volume of the first great work of an even more devoted lover of Mediævalism than either Scott or Newman—the "Modern Painters" of John Ruskin. All students, before or since, of the Middle Ages must yield to Ruskin. He first, and he only, has realised their supreme genius. Before him it was generally believed that the Renaissance in Europe was an almost unmitigated blessing. He has disclosed that in many ways it was a curse, that it was a rebirth largely of heathen ideas and tastes—"a return," as he says, "to Pagan systems, not to adopt them and hallow them for Christianity, but to rank it under them as an imitator and pupil"; and he has shown that Raphael and Michel Angelo, instead of initiating a new era, were survivors of a great religious past, the last ripe fruit with the worm in it—their greatness consisting in their connection with the Gothic age, their weakness in their approximation to heathen ideals. He saw this truth throughout Italy—the home of the Renaissance—especially in Florence and Venice. A large part of his writings has been given to the eloquent and, I think, convincing demonstration that Florence and Venice rose with the faith of St. Francis and St. Dominic, and fell with its decline, and that their story is typical of most European cities. He has endeavoured to prove by his study of Art—which, because it springs more purely from feeling, is more sincere, and tells more truly than words or deeds the history of nations—that five or six hundred years ago there were cities in Italy, France, Germany, and England beautiful almost beyond our dreams, cities of which our castles and cathedrals are only a remnant and a reminder; that in spite of wars and plagues the artisan population of those cities were skilful, healthy, and happy in their work, and produced in richest variety and abundance, buildings, carvings, pictures, books, armour, and fabrics which modern industry, with all its mechanical appliances, cannot rival; that in those cities were kings, preachers, poets, artists, philanthropists and saints, beside whom our great men often seem little more than children; and that underneath all this glorious life, at the heart of it, and the secret of its glory, was a Faith in God and Immortality which, notwithstanding superstitious accompaniments, almost dwarfs our modern Catholic and Protestant religion.

Thus in different ways, with divergencies in thought and temperament, Scott, Newman, and Ruskin have spread a knowledge of and reverence for Mediævalism. Others have helped them. Robert Browning was ten years older than Ruskin and published "Paracelsus" and "Sordello" before the latter had begun to write. He loved Italy, and took his wife, Elizabeth Barrett, there in 1846, to make their home in Florence until her death in 1861. Their poetry often illustrates, or is illustrated, by Ruskin's prose. "Fra Lippo Lippi," "Andrea del Sarto," "The Tomb at St. Praxed's," and others depict with dramatic energy and impressiveness the decadent features of the Renaissance in Italy. Of "St. Praxed's" Ruskin himself said, "I know no other piece of modern English, prose or poetry, in which there is so much told as in these lines of the Renaissance spirit—its worldliness, inconsistency, pride, hypocrisy, ignorance of itself, love of art, of luxury, and of good Latin." On the other hand, "Old Pictures in Florence" and "Casa Guidi Windows" express something of Ruskin's enthusiasm for the contemporaries of Dante and Fra Angelico.

The "Præ-Raphaelite Brotherhood" arose independently of Ruskin, though it owed much to him. Holman Hunt, Millais, and Dante Gabriel Rossetti, who were the founders of the movement, sought to return to the simplicity and sincerity of art before Raphael. They maintained in their work that good art is more than clever painting of faces and limbs and drapery, or skill in perspective, light and shade, or mere skill of any sort. It must have a soul. There must be a spirit behind the execution. So they went back to the conscientious fidelity, the clear lines and pure colours, and the allegorical earnestness of such painters as the Lippis and Botticelli, the Bellinis and Carpaccio, putting again religious meaning into a picture, and the saint into the human countenance. Millais wrote in 1851: "The one thought of some day turning the minds of men to good reflections, and so heightening the profession as one of unworldly usefulness to mankind, this is our great object in painting"*; and he went on: "I shall endeavour in the picture I have in contemplation—'For as in the Days that were Before the Flood,' &c.—to affect those who may look on it with the awful uncertainty of life and the necessity of always being prepared for death."†

Millais later—though he never did anything that was not noble—fell away from this high ideal; but Holman Hunt has kept faithfully to it, going his own way, working out in his own manner his deeply serious conceptions.‡ Rossetti also followed his own bent, and drawing away from Hunt and Millais, formed a kindred and almost purely mythological school with Burne-Jones, whose work, in spite of affectation, is finely imaginative and steeped in Mediævalism. Another, and one of the greatest of this company, though somewhat apart from the rest, is Watts—a Præ-Raphaelite in originality and intensity of religious purpose, mediæval in love of allegory and spiritual expression, but extraordinarily modern in his brave unyielding Faith, with an obscurity sometimes that reminds us of Browning. Lastly, there is William Morris, a mediævalist both in literature and art. He has re-shaped some of the grandest stories of the Middle Ages, and as a poet has a place with Swinburne and the great singer of the "Idylls of the King." But his influence has been even wider as an artist, as a reviver of the old handicrafts, in his beautiful attempts to bring back the penmanship, the ironwork, the tapestry, and household decoration of the Gothic time. And not in vain has been his emphasis on the social conditions in which alone such glorious work can be produced.

I need not say more. It is sufficiently clear, I think, that the mediæval world has burst upon us with surprise and delight, and has saved us from becoming, as we were in danger of becoming, worshippers of machinery and speed. I will only draw your attention to one further fact. From the midst of this picturesque and romantic Gothic civilisation, which might not have existed for all we knew and cared in the last century, stand forth, above many great ones, the exalted figures of Dante Alighieri and St. Francis of Assisi.

If an Italian of the thirteenth century were to visit our modern Europe, and saw our railways and steamships, our bridges and tunnels, our telephones, and photography and Röntgen rays, he might think he had come upon the work of gods. But on closer examination, on hearing us speak, on learning what we love and live for, on finding out what we individually

* Compare the Preamble to the Statutes of the Painter's Guild of Siena, drawn up in the year 1355: "Since we are teachers to unlearned men, who know not how to read, of the marvels done by the power and strength of Holy Religion," &c.

† Those who believe in what they call "Art for Art's sake," should read the rest of the passage: "My intention is to lay the scene at the marriage feast. The bride, elated by her happiness, will be playfully showing her wedding-ring to a young girl, who will be in the act of plighting her troth to a man wholly engrossed in his love, the parents of each uniting in congratulation at the consummation of their own and their children's happiness. A drunkard will be railing boisterously at another less intoxicated, for his cowardice in being somewhat appalled at the view the open window presents—flats of glistening water, revealing but the summits of mountains and crests of poplars. The rain will be beating in the face of the terrified attendant who is holding out the shutter, wall-stained, and running down with the wet, but slightly as yet inundating the floor. There will also be the glutton quietly indulging in his weakness, unheeding the sagacity of his grateful dog, who, thrusting his head under his hands to attract attention, instinctively feels the coming ruin. Then a woman (typical of wordly vanity), apparelled in sumptuous attire, withholding her robes from the contamination of his dripping hide. In short, all deaf to the prophecy of the Deluge which is swelling before their eyes—all but one figure in their midst, who, upright with closed eyes, prays for mercy for those around her, a patient example of belief standing with, but far from them, placidly awaiting God's will." Did not Shakespeare map out a tragedy in this way?

‡ In 1867 Millais, working in his holiday month, was "making £100 a day." Holman Hunt wrote to him in May from Florence: "Of late I have been feeling very strongly indeed the responsibility which every man, and especially remarkable and successful men, are under to do the utmost that is possible with their talents. . . . In seriousness and importance of subject we are far behind where we should be, seeing that we have about eight or ten really great painters, among whom J. E. Millais has the highest powers of all. You must not be testy with me that I revert to this subject. Remember that lately I have had many reasons to think of the perennial interests of life. In a few days we shall both be lying in our dark bed under the growing flowers, and the naked soul of us will have no riches that we have not already laid up in Heaven. . . . You have really a faculty for painting, such as perhaps no other man ever had—certainly such as none since Titian ever possessed."

are, he might be tempted to ask "But where are the gods? I have met better men than you on the hills of Umbria and in the streets of Florence."

We are beginning to realise this. It is dawning upon us what men they were on those hills and in those streets. The giant mind of Dante is being revealed. We open the "Divine Comedy" to find indeed a godlike writing. Here, we say, was a living soul that could fight a stern warfare, that could see and feel the beautiful, and understand the just, and worship the Supreme. None ever had a deeper insight into the conscience and the spirit. We hear of the Protestant sense of sin. It is, for the most part, crude and shallow compared with Dante's. If we would know the meanings of remorse and shame, and self-hatred, and of divine mercy and forgiveness, we must go to the old Catholic poet who wrought his way from earth to Paradise. Beside his manly prayer the Evangelical plea that the penalty of sin has been borne by an innocent victim is cowardly and contemptible. How strong, how inspiring is the cry of the souls in "Purgatory"—"O God, spare me not! punish me, burn me, until I may be more fit to love and see Thee!" What a different world we shall have again when this cry is once more the prayer of Christendom!

And behind Dante there is the even holier and far lovelier presence of the poor friar—the preaching, begging brother, in a brown patched cloak, who gave his riches to the poor, and loved poverty, and, reversing every maxim of the worldly wisdom, created a new ideal of love and chivalry throughout feudal Europe. Over his grave at Assisi, among the thieves and harlots, rose up the first great Gothic church in Italy; and from his life, which was probably nearer to the life of Jesus Christ than that of any other human being, sprang the regenerating influences which changed the fierce northmen into some of the finest of Christian gentlemen.

Dante and St. Francis are centuries dead; but their spirit begins to live again. And, my friends, how we need it! We want it above everything. We need more knowledge, but far more we need Conscience. We want truth, but ten thousand times more we want Pity. Give us Conscience and Pity, and our modern world would be transformed.

THE June number of this valuable "Quarterly Review of Religion, Ethics and Theology" opens with a striking article by the Rev. K. C. Anderson, of Dundee, on "The Deeper Issues of the Ritualistic Controversy in the Church of England." The real battle, Mr. Anderson says, is between the Modern Spirit and Mediævalism. The latter survives in different forms in the Anglican party in the Church of England and in dogmatic Protestant orthodoxy. Both of these rest on external authority, in the one case the Church, in the other the Bible, and have their origin in the Latin Christianity of the system of Augustin, of which the radical defect is the antagonism it sets up between God and the world, the divine and the human. The Modern Spirit in religion, on the other hand, is akin to the profounder teaching of the Greek fathers, to whom God was immanent in the world, and human nature had essential affinity with the divine. Thus the Incarnation of God in Christ is regarded as an illustration and culmination of a process continuously seen in the history of man, and revelation is "not a mechanical communication of truth from without, guaranteed by miracle, but a living spiritual process of education."

The Broad Churchmen of our century—Schleiermacher, Bushnell, Maurice, Stanley; the poets who have been also prophets of a larger faith—Coleridge, Blake, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning; the philosophers who have done so much to give a new spirit to the modern world—Schelling, Hegel, Goethe—all have more affinity with the fathers of the early Greek Church, with Justin Martyr and Origen and Clement of Alexandria, than with the Fathers of the Western Church, with Tertullian and Augustine and Calvin, the theologian of the Protestant Reformation.

Mr. Anderson fully recognises the great part played by Latin Christianity and Calvinism in the past, and the benefits derived from them, but clearly shows how they can no longer serve the needs of the modern religious world.

The Rev. W. Kirkus's article "On Preaching" should be studied by all ministers. As to method, the great preachers, in his opinion, may use any; but the average man should speak and not read his sermon, after careful preparation and from sufficient notes—if for no other reason, because a speaker will as a rule be heard, while a reader will not. At the same time, the preacher should constantly write, only not sermons (or only very seldom) in order to keep his thinking exact.

Of some of our greatest preachers Mr. Kirkus writes:—

Butler's three "Sermons on Human Nature" are among the classics of Ethical Philosophy. Newman's "Parochial and Plain Sermons" are models of an almost Greek simplicity and felicity of diction. Maurice's "Lincoln's Inn Sermons" have the pensive mystic beauty and dreamy charm of a hazy English landscape. Who shall decide whether James Martineau's sermons are poetry or prose, philosophy or theology, mysticism or asceticism—or all in one?

The Rev. Charles A. Allen writes on "The Christian Ideal," insisting that the spirit of Christ is the essence of Christianity and reveals the real character of God, and that "love to God" and "love to man" may have only a shallow and unfruitful meaning, unless the full measure of self-sacrifice in the love of Christ is understood; and the deep sense of the worth of the individual soul, which sprang from it, bringing to light a new type of character. The following articles are on "Plutarch and his Age," "Religion and the larger Universe," and "The Greek Games." Most valuable of all is perhaps the Rev. F. G. Peabody's study of "The Teaching of Jesus concerning the Rich." This is followed by the usual full supply of Book reviews.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Miss Dora Lawrence, 5s.; Miss Aiken, 5s.

LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL, LONDON.

SIR,—I should like, with your permission, to draw the attention of your readers to the effort which is being made to thoroughly restore and repair Little Portland-street Chapel, some particulars about which appear in your "News of the Churches" column. Of the £1,000 which is required to complete the scheme, over £500 has been raised by the present congregation alone; and of the remaining £500, an old member has guaranteed half, provided the other half is collected from private donors, and another member has kindly made himself responsible for a further £50. There remains, therefore, to be raised from amongst the outside friends and old members of Little Portland-street Chapel the sum of £200, in order that the chapel may be re-opened in October next, free of debt.

I feel the less hesitation in appealing for help in raising this sum, because the present small congregation has so promptly and generously done its part; and also because, in a sense, the chapel is the common property of a much wider circle than those who now regularly worship within its walls. As the scene of Dr. Martineau's London ministry for fifteen years, it is widely known and loved. As the only surviving chapel in Central London where service is regularly conducted for Unitarians, it serves a useful purpose in the general economy of our church life, and will be extremely convenient, it is hoped, for central services and meetings, as soon as the repairs have been completed. The chapel, I may add, has no endowment and receives no grant; and its entire maintenance by a small band of enthusiastic and devoted members is not so common an experience amongst us that it need go unrecognised. The repairs and improvements are being carried out under the direction of Mr. Edward Martineau, architect, and every effort will be made to maintain the architectural harmony and individuality of the building. Subscriptions towards the remaining £200 which has to be raised will be gladly received by Miss H. Busk, Hon. Treasurer, 1, Gordon-square, W.C. An announcement with regard to the services during the next two months appears in your news columns.

THE GREAT MEETING, COVENTRY.

THE congregation of the Great Meeting in Smithford-street, Coventry, propose to celebrate the bi-centenary of their fine old chapel, which falls next year, by extensive improvements and renovation of the interior and the approaches from the street. The old high-back pews are to be cut down, and five of them near the pulpit are to be removed and a platform introduced to make better space for marriages and other special services. New floors are to be laid in the aisles, and the heating and lighting are to be improved. The cost is estimated at £400, towards which the trustees have made a contribution.

The Great Meeting represents the first Nonconformist congregation in Coventry, founded by Dr. Obadiah Grew, vicar of St. Michael's, Coventry; Dr. John Bryan, vicar of Holy Trinity; and Mr. Samuel Basnett, lecturer at both churches. These three were ejected from their livings as a consequence of the Act of Uniformity in August, 1662; and Dr. Grew seems to have been particularly zealous in the continuance of his ministry, and consequently a sufferer from more than one imprisonment, once for six months "in a filthy chamber, though the best the gaol at Coventry afforded."

We are indebted for these particulars to an interesting article in the Coventry Herald of July 21, and from that article the following account is practically adopted:—

In 1672, taking advantage of the liberty granted by Charles II., Dr. Grew took out a licence and conducted public services, being received by his former people with great joy. The meetings were held in St. Nicholas' Hall, commonly called Leather Hall, on the south or left side of West Orchard, and for ten years he enjoyed this privilege, when he was forbidden to hold forth any more. He soon afterwards became blind through age, was imprisoned, and when set at liberty was forced to leave the city. Being blind, he employed an amanuensis, to whom he dictated a sermon every week, which was read to four or more shorthand writers, and by this means his messages were read at twenty different meetings. This practice he continued till the Revolution in 1688. Then he returned to the city, where he died in 1689, and was buried in St. Michael's chancel. Dr. Bryan, before coming to Coventry, held a living at Barford, near Warwick. He is described as a very learned divine, an energetic preacher, a holy man, and universally esteemed. He had three sons ejected ministers.

Following these divines, other ejected ministers came to the Hall. Rev. Samuel Wills, the next minister, was a native of Coventry. He formerly had a living at Birmingham, from which he was ejected. He was driven from Coventry by "some unquiet people" and died in Shropshire at the age of seventy-three. Afterwards came the Rev. Obadiah Musson, ejected from Church Langton in Leicestershire. "He retired to Coventry," says Dr. Calamy, "where he found God and good people kind to him till worn away by age." The congregation gradually increased until 1700 when—during the ministry of Dr. Josiah Oldfield and Mr. W. Tong—their meeting place was found to be too small, and it was determined to build a new and more commodious place of worship. This was the origin of the Great Meeting House, which, in the quaint language of the Trust Deed, "was erected with the permission and blessing of Almighty God."

On the removal of Dr. Oldfield to London, the Rev. John Warren became assistant to Mr. Tong, and for forty years retained the pastorate. He was a man peculiarly distinguished by the amiableness and kindness of his disposition, the gentleness and politeness of his manners, his liveliness and wit in conversation, his general intelligence, his Biblical knowledge, his piety as a Christian and his fidelity as a preacher and pastor. Such was the eulogy of his friend, the Rev. Joseph Carpenter, of Warwick, who preached the funeral sermon. Mr. Tong removed to London and his place was taken by the Rev. Joshua Merrel, who became co-pastor with Mr. Warren. When Mr. Merrel died in 1716 Mr. Warren became sole pastor, and continued so till his death.

It was during Mr. Warren's life that the Great Meeting House became markedly identified with that movement of thought out of which Unitarianism grew. On the removal of the Rev. R. Rogerson, from 1717 to 1723, assistant to Mr. Warren, several candidates were recommended for the vacancy. Among them was the Rev. Mr. Smith, who it was soon discovered was introducing in his candidature a more liberal type of theology than the congregation were accustomed to. The congregation resolved to resort to the ballot, and the majority was distinctly in favour of Mr. Smith. The minority were dissatisfied, left the Great Meeting House and founded Vicar-lane Chapel, which years afterwards, by the secession of a number of its members, brought about the erection of West Orchard Chapel. Warren died in 1742, from which date the ministers have been the Rev. Ebenezer Fletcher, 1742-63; the Rev. Robert Atkinson, 1744-56; the Rev. Thos. Jackson, 1756-85; the Rev. Postumous Lloyd, 1763-77; the Rev. Peter Emans, 1777-1810; the Rev. Timothy Davis, 1810-19; the Rev. J. Donoghue, 1820-23; the Rev. W. Bowen, M.A., 1823-29; the Rev. H. W. Gardner Wreford, 1830-39; the Rev. John Gordon, 1840-54; the Rev. Thomas Hunter, 1854-60; and the present minister, the Rev. G. Heaviside, B.A., F.R.G.S., who came to Coventry in 1860.

THE MESSAGE OF SUNSET.

At the meeting of the Young People's Religious Union held during the recent Unitarian anniversary week in Boston, the last speaker was to have been the Rev. Robert Collyer. In his unavoidable absence, the venerable Mary A. Livermore gave the following address on "The Unitarian Message of Sunset":—

"The day can never endure so long, but at length the evening cometh. And it is true that every day, no matter how glorious the promise of the morning, no matter how fervent the work of the noon, will have at last its sunset. Its close comes naturally. It is a precursor of the night which soon follows it, which also comes naturally. It is not a dread event, nor one that need excite apprehension or doubt. We need give ourselves no concern about it. It is a natural event. We used to be taught that the closing of the day of life—that incident of life which we call death—was a punishment, and that it came in consequence of our first great ancestor's breaking a law. But for the fact that Adam had eaten the forbidden apple, we were told, we should have lived on and on forever in this would. That would have been a punishment; and we ought to congratulate Adam and ourselves that he ate the apple, which saved us from living in this world forever.

"The evening, the sunset, is the time when we have done our work of the day. The strenuous devotion to duty, which we never can ignore, ends with the day, and brings us to a time of rest and retrospect. If we have wrought well, have not yielded to the temptation to take our ease, but have kept steadily to the task assigned us till it was completed, we shall be compensated with a sense of glad satisfaction. The evening hour will be grateful to us; and we can enjoy the gorgeous sunsets which defy the skill of the artist, and enable us almost to 'gaze through golden vista into heaven.' 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.' And the old age of any person, man or woman, will be the result of the life he had led. What we are at fifty, sixty, or seventy, is what we have been previous to sixty or seventy. If, then, we would have a happy and lovely old age, we must prepare for it, as, whatever the old age may be, it is the certain result of a lifetime. There must be a physical preparation for it, for good health is a great prerequisite to happy and useful living. Sick people form a part of the waste and burden of daily life, and hold down the brakes on the progress of friends and kindred, and add to the weight of the millstone about their neck.

"To work and live only for one's self is a fruitful source of misery, which has caused many a joyless life to go out in bitterness, insanity, or suicide. Only work that is done wisely and lovingly for others is rewarded with perennial joy. And to live in love is to live in everlasting youth. Whoever enters old age by this royal road will find the last of life to be the very best of life. Instead of finding himself descending the hill of life, he will find it up-hill all the way, into clearer air, where the vision reaches farther, where the sunsets are more golden and the twilight lasts the longer. We shall drop much that we have once valued, as we slowly climb the hill. For the passage of humanity from youth to old age is like the progress of an army on the march. It starts, burdened with its necessary equipments and much else that it proposes to take with it. But the day grows hot and dusty; and one thing after another is dropped on the march, till finally the men throw away their blankets, their knapsacks, and sometimes their guns. That is like life. For life is a series of gaining and losing, learning and unlearning, sinning and repenting, incompleteness and unrest.

"As our beloved who walk beside us drop into the silence, and we are forced to go on without them, the certainty grows clearer that they have not ceased to live, and that what is called death is but transition. In our rapt moments we are conscious of their viewless presence, and almost catch their voices across the handbredth of space between us and them. We have not lost them, and death is as natural an event as the night that ends the day. We are born to die. And so the message of Unitarianism, suggested to us by the sunset, is to trust in God, who brought us here, who had us in mind from the beginning, and, after unknown ages of evolution, has made us lords of the planet—the highest in the scale of created beings. We have been very costly to our God, and must be dear to Him, imperfect as we are, with much yet to be done for our proper fashioning. 'Death is not a blind alley,' says Victor Hugo: 'It is a thoroughfare through which all must walk.' Our trust in God shall carry us through death even; and, with the faith of Whittier, we will

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Pilgrimage to Oberammergau.—I.

I AM quite sure that most of you young folks who read "The Children's Column" in this paper will have heard of a place called Oberammergau, and of people who have either been there this year, or are going there to see the Passion Play. You, perhaps, have but a dim idea as to where Oberammergau is and what sort of a place it is, or what either a Passion Play, or this particular Passion Play is. It may be the good fortune of some of you to go there and see and know for yourself, but most of you probably will not have that pleasure. Now I should like to take all of you over sea and land to the play, for I am certain you could not but be the better for having seen it. It would help you to feel, in a way nothing else can, the beauty of the life of Christ—the Christ whom you are taught to love, whose example you strive to follow, and after whom you call yourselves little Christian men and women. But that I cannot do; there are too many of you, and the place is too far away; but I will try to do the next best thing—I will do my best to tell you about it, both what I have seen and what I have read, in the hope that when you hear any one talk about Oberammergau and its Passion Play these words may not be to you mere empty sounds, but may stand for what you know something about; and I should like, too, if it were possible, that you should understand some little of that depth of feeling with which the play itself fills the hearts of all who have the privilege of seeing it.

You will see from the title that this is to be an account of a Pilgrimage. In olden days, men and women, pious and not pious, for the good of their souls, undertook pilgrimages to holy places—the holy City of Jerusalem or the Shrine of some Saint. The pious went and came back more saintly, the sinners went and came back saints; and pilgrims and pilgrimages bring up in our minds weary journeys for duty's sake and not for pleasure. The Pilgrim, barefooted, staff in hand, wallet on back, and cockleshell in hat, going from place to place, making a long, toilsome journey to some holy spot, looking to the kindness of the faithful for food and lodging, is almost an unknown person nowadays. The modern pilgrim is not dressed differently from the ordinary mortal, and uses the ordinary means of getting about from place to place, and in the ordinary manner, bargains for his food and shelter. Still, his object is the same—to visit some spot made holy by sacred associations.

It is a modern pilgrimage, undertaken a month or two ago by a party of five pilgrims that I am going to talk to you about.

To get a clear idea where a town or a village or a river or a mountain is, there is no way so good as to find it out on a map. Keep a map of Europe before you while you are reading to the end of this "talk," and you will understand it better.

To the south of the German Empire you will find a country called Bavaria—the Kingdom of Bavaria—and again at the south of Bavaria, very near to the line dividing Germany from Austria, in a high valley surrounded on three sides by the Bavarian Alps, lies the small village of Oberammergau. You must be careful to bear in mind that the men and women, and boys and girls, who live in Bavaria do not speak English as you do, but a language called German, which has different sounds and different words from the sounds and words we use for the same things. You will have no difficulty in pronouncing the rather odd-looking name Oberammergau, if you learn that the last syllable "gau" is pronounced as it would be in English if it were written "gow"; and it will, perhaps, help you to make friends with the strange name to know that the syllable "Ober" means "over" (upper), that Ammer is the name of a river, and that "gau" answers to our syllable "ton" at the end of the name of a place. In that way "Oberammergau," when stripped of its mysterious German garment and put into plain English dress, appears as "Overammerton."

To this little village to see the Passion Play performed there, every tenth year, for more than 200 years pilgrims have flocked, first by hundreds and now by thousands from all parts of Europe and even from America.

Why every tenth year? Here is the story.

More than 250 years ago, in the year 1633, the towns and villages round about Oberammergau were afflicted by a terrible plague which killed a great many of the inhabitants. In one neighbouring village there had been so many deaths that only two married couples were left; in all the other households either the father or the mother had died and many houses were left deserted. Oberammergau being so far free from the awful pestilence, the authorities there had strict watch kept, and no person nor thing was allowed to come into the village from any place where the plague was rife. The watch was so carefully kept that for a long time the pestilence was warded off. The fatal day, however, came at last. Every year the village held a church festival, which was a holiday time when absent friends and relations came back to the old home. One of the villagers called Kaspar Schisler had gone to a village close by to work during the hay harvest, and not liking his banishment from home at the festival made up his mind, if possible, to spend that day with his wife and little ones at his cottage in Oberammergau. He crossed over the hills between the one village and the other, and taking advantage of the watchers being busy with preparations for the festival, he managed to get to his home which was a cottage just on the outskirts of the village. He must have had the plague at the time he left where he was working, for he got home on the Saturday, and by the Monday morning, the day after the festival, the poor man was dead. In a very short time after that fatal Monday six persons in the village died; the plague, which the village had taken so much trouble to ward off had gained an entrance. In their distress the heads of the little community met together to discover some ways and means of driving the enemy away, and believing that so terrible an infliction could only come through the wrath of God, they resolved to do something to please Him; and the form that something took was that they made a solemn agreement that every tenth year the villagers would perform the "Tragedy of the Sufferings and Death of Jesus Christ." The story says that from that time forth the plague ceased because the resolve was kept. We do know this; the tragedy which we call the Passion Play was performed in 1634, and since 1680 it has been played every tenth year uninterruptedly, with the melancholy exception that the war between France and Germany stopped the performance in 1870, because the actors had to join the Germany Army. And in this case the remainder of the performance was given in 1871.

It will give you a better idea as to the whereabouts of Oberammergau if I tell you how the five pilgrims went from London to the little Bavarian village. They did not all start on the same day, but going first by rail, then by boat, and then by rail again, they all met on a certain Saturday night at Cologne on the Rhine. They were not barefooted, nor had they peas in their shoes, nor did they look forward to long, weary, footsore marches. They had a bicycle apiece, and the only resemblance they bore to pilgrims of old was in the wallets of various size and shape which each pilgrim fastened to his cycle, and which contained his share of worldly goods. On the Sunday morning, one-half of the day they steamed up the Rhine to Coblenz, and from there cycled alongside the Rhine to Bingen. How lovely it was it is hard to tell you. First of all gliding up the river on a steamer full of bright holiday makers, between steep banks laden with vineyards on their sloping sides, and crowned here and there with ruined castles, passing by village after village nestling at the mouth of little valleys coming down to the river side; and then afterwards on the wheels in the afternoon and evening, watching the colours of sunset light up the water and hilltop, and passing through villages with their old gabled houses, and their men, women, and children all in Sunday attire greeting the strangers with the kindly welcome of "All Heil!"; till late at night, though divided on the way, the five met at Bingen to rest.

The Monday and Tuesday were long cycling days which brought us into the Rhine Plain, not far from Strassburg, after having halted at the little fashionable watering-place of Kreuznach, and for the night at the quiet village of Rockenhausen. Wednesday was spent in the train, crossing the Rhine plain and rushing through royal Stuttgart and Ulm, with its highest Cathedral spire in Europe, to Munich, the blue and white capital of Bavaria.

After a day's sightseeing at Munich, having travelled by rail, boat, and cycle from the flat country watered by the "Isar rolling rapidly" across the Starnberg Lake, nearer and nearer to, then deeper and deeper among the everlasting hills, pushing uphill and racing downhill, we arrived at the goal of our pilgrimage, the little Bavarian highland village of Oberammergau.

If you will take the trouble to find out all or some of the places I have named on a map, you will have a tolerably clear idea of where lies the sacred spot about which I am talking to you.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR.

THE growth of the Christian Endeavour movement, so strikingly brought before public attention last week, in the astonishing rapidity of its world-wide extension during the less than twenty years of its existence, is one more testimony, to be added to that of the Salvation Army and earlier movements, to the great fund of unused spiritual energies latent in our common human nature and requiring only a vivid appeal, to be called out into active service, for open witness to the things of GOD in the world, and for the uplifting of mankind.

The Salvation Army was first in the field, the Rev. WILLIAM BOOTH having begun his special missionary efforts in 1865, and the actual organisation of the Army dating from 1878. Three years later came the first humble beginning of a Christian Endeavour Society, and now both forms of devoted Christian service have circled the globe and count their enrolled workers by hundreds of thousands. The two organisations are very different in method and aim, but both sprang out of dissatisfaction with existing methods of Church work, the desire to break through the dulness of conventional habit and to make fresh channels for a vigorous spiritual life; and they bear witness to what may be done when once the imagination is fired and some fresh way of active beneficence is offered with the appeal from devoted leaders for whole-hearted surrender and the enthusiastic following of a high ideal.

Our conception of religious truth and of the meaning of salvation separates us widely from the Salvation Army. The Christian Endeavour Societies also are distinctly bound up with what is known as the Evangelical scheme of salvation, and no fellowship with Unitarians is allowed. But that cannot debar us from the sincerest admiration for unwearied and most self-sacrificing work in regions and by means which we cannot share, nor from genuine rejoicing over the beneficent influence thus exerted in many lands, even while it is blended with elements of teaching which we could earnestly wish were otherwise.

The example of the Christian Endeavour societies, as we noted last week, has been followed by our brethren across the Atlantic on vigorous lines of their own, and with most encouraging results, in their Young People's Religious Unions, while in this country also a beginning has been made in the formation of such societies. The advantage is felt, particularly in the appeal to young people, of some fresh method that may kindle the imagination; and it seems very evident that whatever particular form may be adopted, much benefit to the strength and activity of our churches will be derived from the gathering of our young people into societies of their own, in which an open profession of religious faith and aspiration would be asked of them, and the responsibility would be thrown upon them for special work of their own in the common cause. Thus it is hoped that the serious purpose, which rarely leaves a young life untouched on the threshold of manhood and womanhood, will find a ready means of expression, and will at once be taken up and trained in service of the highest ends, so that our young people will at once feel that they have a place of their own, that they are wanted in the completeness of our Church life, and that in this fellowship there is abundant scope for what they desire with growing joy and energy to give in self-forgetting labour for the benefit of their fellowmen.

But while we believe that there is a future of great promise for such Young People's Societies, it should not be forgotten that a "Christian Endeavour Society" for young and old alike already exists in every living Church, and where there may be no means or no desire for the formation of any fresh society there is yet always the opportunity for a full outpouring of spiritual energy and the utmost of self-sacrificing work in the Church itself as it already exists. One danger to be avoided in the formation of a new society is that it may further weaken our hold on the true ideal of the Church itself and the claim it ought to make upon the devotion and personal service of each one of its members.

Those, therefore, who thirst for a new spirit of life, a new kindling of enthusiasm in closer fellowship and more eager and strenuous activity in our Churches, must not forget that in the simple forms which already exist the truer life may always find its utterance, and must so find it, with or without the help of some fresh society. The great appeal for "Christian Endeavour" may come to all, and there may be any day a fresh stirring of life, in minister and people alike, in a new earnestness, in a simple and sincere participation in the offices of praise and prayer, stirred to new depth of feeling, bound to a new faithfulness in the sense of common life in which each one must do his own part, acknowledging the need and helping to minister to it, in communion with the Highest. And so with the new energy in every form of beneficent activity. Old methods may have seemed commonplace and conventional because we have ceased to put our life into them; but we can always begin to do that again, and where it is done together the joy of a new strength and confidence is not lacking in the Church.

Whether we are to have the stimulus of large numbers in the fellowship of our churches must not be with us the first question, nor should it trouble us over much. The chief strength and the gladness of a divine calling is always open to us through simple fidelity and utter surrender to GOD in the spirit of our worship, and at the same time a single-hearted service of humanity, in obedience to the true ideal of the Christian life, seeking in all things to minister to the common good.

"REJOICING IN THE LORD."

LIFE'S UPPERTONES.

(With apologies to J. S. Pattinson.)

WE do, and then we rejoice,
We say, and at once are glad,
For the deed is done
And the word has gone
To brighten the life of the sad.

A touch, and the hand grows warm,
A tone, and the heart grows light,
For hope is alive,
And wishes revive,
And morn replaces night.

A breath, a glance, or a smile,
And the soul looks up above,
And the golden gleam
Of the spirit's dream
Shines forth in eternal love.

OUR friend and correspondent, Professor George Boros, of Kolozsvar, who was the representative of the Unitarian Churches of Hungary at the recent anniversary meetings at Boston, has received from Harvard University the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. Bowdoin College, where Longfellow studied and was afterwards professor before his appointment at Harvard, has conferred a similar degree upon the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, recently Secretary, now President, of the American Unitarian Association. To the same honourable company the Rev. J. H. Crooker, of Ann Arbor, Mich., is to be welcomed by grace of the St. Lawrence University.

WANTED, MEN AND WOMEN.*—I.

BY JAMES L. HAIGH.

SOME men are born to face problems all their lives; some men make problems for themselves; and some men have problems thrust upon them whether they want them or not. These problems present themselves at such unexpected times. You do not want them, for instance, when you are on a holiday; and yet you cannot escape them. My last one came to me in the Mediterranean. A fellow-passenger bought a copy of Tolstoy's "Resurrection" at Malta, and straightway handed it to me for my perusal. I had the holiday task given me of reading it, and of sending my opinion of the book after my fellow-passenger who was to leave the ship at Naples. I knew, of course, that I was in for something out of the common, but I never anticipated such a fierce revelation of the horrors of civilisation as we have there given to us.

In many ways a strong book, in some ways it is a decidedly dangerous book, and to me it is not quite satisfactory or convincing. Here and there it seems to writhe in agonies. It is "realism" in its most naked and crudest form. It is the most unnatural book I have ever read. You do not get large spaces: you unconsciously yearn for what is known as "idealism"—a touch of poetry to shine like a glory round the prose of life. You are compelled to meet the deformed, the twisted in mind and body. You will look in vain for a thoroughly good woman in this book. Even the picture of the hero's mother cannot be introduced without a suggestion of something base or mean; and when the author refers to the tenderest sacrament the seamy side of the "business" is immediately brought to your notice. The book lacks the dignity of reserve. There is such a thing as manly outspokenness; but a greater than this is manly reserve; and the strongest men I know are those who have a force of reserved strength, knowledge and affection, which in some way keeps their lives above the commonplace. And it is so in literature. I said all that and a great deal more in my little attempt at criticism.

But "Resurrection" left me one problem which perhaps came to me at first from its literary side. A girl, one of the principal characters in the book, is said to have grown up "like a potato in a cellar." This is a graphic but terribly sad touch, and remained with me. She is kept in a foul atmosphere all her life—physically and morally foul—until you want to cry out, "Oh for a clean woman with a touch of human charity to take her out of it." Does it do any good, I asked myself, to keep people like sickly plants in cellars in order to scrutinise their want of wholesomeness?

But a good friend on board the steamer took the problem out of my hand—made me put the microscope on one side for the time being—by giving me a simple every day task to do instead; and I do not think I shall ever forget the great lesson he unconsciously taught me.

He was the ship's doctor during the first cruise, and an ordinary passenger like myself during the second. He was one of the most charming men I have ever met,—simple as a schoolboy, although he had something like ten letters tacked on to the end of his name. These, I should think, had never altered him in the least degree. He was a medical missionary, engaged in noble work in one of the crowded districts of London. It would take too long to tell you all about this noble man—to me he is a volume of good sermons. I can only say here that we became very close companions ashore and at sea.

Now I must give you a short description of another passenger before you will be able to understand the drift of these Mediterranean reminiscences. This second passenger was one of the most curious characters I have ever met in fact or fiction. In real life I have come in contact with men on all the rungs of the social ladder—say from model lodgers up to millionaires; and in fiction, like most of you, I have mixed with almost everybody from Monte Christo to the Little Minister. In all that wide experience I never met this man's counterpart. I have only time to give you a rough sketch: a finished study would take too long for my present purpose. He was a young man of about 27, I should say; rather low set, with bent rounded shoulders, sunken chest, long arms, big shapeless hands, and heavy flat feet. His hair was of a reddish hue, rather closely cropped and inclined to curl. Now all that would have passed as a thing unworthy one's notice, if his eyes, which are so often the redeeming feature of the face, had not been possessed by the very incarnation of the spirit of restlessness. He took hasty, hungry, frightened looks at everything and everybody. He even smoked his pipe or cigar in the same nervous hurry, stealing furtive, restless glances to right and left as he did so. He was always on the alert as though he expected a calamity. He never dreamed by day, and star-gazing was an unknown luxury to him.

When you spoke to him, he uttered a hasty monosyllable in reply. Nothing ever seemed to fix his attention, and I never once saw him absorbed in a book or paper. He merely glanced at them. I watched him over and over again, and wondered what all this meant—what was the secret of it. It seemed to me something very different from that excessive self-consciousness which troubles many people at times, and of which they are ashamed. He never looked ashamed, and never seemed to be conscious of his self-consciousness—if it were that. I made up my mind that this young man must have suffered from sudden nervous shock at some time, or, that he had been brought up under a tyrant of whom he stood in constant dread. While I pitied him I could not help theorising about the reason of his great affliction. You must remember that I had the big "Resurrection" problem troubling me at the time, and so was ready with my quick hypothesis. Most of the passengers ignored him completely; and life on board ship is like life ashore—you are readily attracted to men of taste and temperament corresponding with your own. Cliques and groups soon form. But this was not the way the doctor treated this strange passenger. He would not leave the man to himself. He tried to make him talk: he made him play the ordinary deck-games, ship's quoits, bullboard, and so on. Sometimes I joined in these, or marked the score for the other two players: very often I simply watched them. The man played as though he were suffering agonies: his face twitched, his eyes shot quicker glances than ever, and his short jerky throws made it utterly impossible for him to approach anything near success. But this patient doctor persevered. He made room for the afflicted man at his table, and over the meals endeavoured to find out what he was most interested in, to make make him talk about it. But the good man failed completely, and he confessed his failure to me.

"He doesn't read anything," the doctor said. "He's no opinion about anything: he's not interested in anything, and he won't try to get interested. "I do not think God notices our failures if we only try our very best. But that man won't even try. The greatest sin in the world, I think, is not to try. God will not forgive that. Do help me to bring him out, he'll listen to you. You know how to talk to a man calmly and quietly," and so on.

That was the doctor's text or motto: "The greatest sin in the world is not to try!" I did not want to commit the greatest sin in the world just then—and so I tried to help the doctor. I became his disciple, and would have done a great deal more for the simple good-hearted fellow. The encouragement I received as a reward for my little efforts was most touching:—"I saw you talking to —— this morning. I think we'll bring him out yet." I once spent a whole day ashore with the poor fellow, and honestly I do not think I got more than a dozen words out of him the whole of that time. But the doctor thought I had done splendidly. And so it went on. I do not know whether I did —— any good or not: I only know the doctor did me a lot of good. That was the doctor's strong point: he not only took an interest in the weak and the afflicted, he wanted to try and do something for them, and make others do something for them. He pulled me together. I was too busy just then studying the why and wherefore of Tolstoy's last book, but this good man gave me the practical task of trying to steady the restless hungry eyes of my fellow-passenger. He brought me down from a troublesome piece of fiction to the duty of a living fact. One was a problem—perhaps only a literary problem—the other was a little bit straight out of the heart and mind of the Man who went about doing good.

It is a curious thing to notice how many men pride themselves on their platform work, or their pulpit eloquence—they think their real strength lies there; when, if they only knew it, they are doing more real good by coming into close contact with a single individual than by all their mighty efforts, laboured and confounded up on high. I stood on a shaky metaphysical sort of platform, weaving theories and trying to make a fine discriminating analysis of character, and wondering whether I was correct or not when I pointed out for the edification of my friend that the key-note to Tolstoy's "Resurrection" lay in the sentence: "She grew up like a potato in a cellar"; but the doctor practically said, "Come down, sir; here is a little bit of work for you to do. See if you can do this man any good."

Now I should like to step down from my pulpit and platform and say to all good men and women:—Here is a little bit of good work for you to do in our

* An Address delivered at the Summer School for Teachers, in Manchester College, Oxford, July 9.

Sunday-schools. Come into close touch with these boys and girls around us. You see them with the restless eyes, the misshapen moral characters standing at the street corners? Unhappy degenerates—and why? Often and often because they have not been fortunate enough to come into immediate contact with a wholesome-hearted man or woman. They need a moral physician as their friend. You may have learning, you may have fine literary taste, you may take a keen delight in art, you may revel in the luxury of philosophical disquisitions, and be ready to walk ten miles to hear a preacher like Stopford Brooke (and so would I); but a pleasure exceeding all these, and to which these will be added with greater delight, is the pleasure of coming face to face with young struggling souls. Come down to them. Come down to them in your manly simplicity, in your happy abandonment, in your noble self-forgetfulness, and great will be your reward. Talk to them in a spirit of calm persuasiveness; yea, and in red hot passion if need be.

What is it boys admire the most in a man? They admire his genuineness, his manliness, his directness, his generosity, his true nobility. His worldly position, his wealth, his learning are quite secondary with them. His character is the thing that tells. They do not analyse all this, and there is no need for them to do so. But they are drawn by that subtle magnetism of sterling character unto every true man, and held there; and they revel in their bondage. He goes out to them to win them. His sympathy gives him insight, and makes him quick to note and seize the appropriate occasion.

Again, what do you admire the most in a boy? You admire his transparency, his simplicity, his innocence, sometimes even his impudence—but always his honesty. That impudence can be disciplined into confidence with fine restraint, and that exuberance of vitality be made to flow in the right channel. And you can do it, helped by the grace of God. It is not an impossible task for the genuine man to undertake. You and the boy meet on common ground, for instance, if you are fond of humour. Healthy men of Shakespeare's land should hold it as a priceless gift. Do not be afraid of it. It is a great purifier, and tests sometimes with the swiftness and intensity of the fires of God. Cant very often shrivels up at its approach, and sickly sentimentality cannot stand the heat thereof.

You may have a soul-seaching indignation against the wrongs and follies of the world. But see to it that it be soul-searching. A righteous indignation is a whip with the keenest sting in the hands of an honest man. Let it go against rottenness and meanness and falsehood in high and low places. You may be

Dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn,
The love of love.

You may have the instinct of hero worship. A small man in a small place when you weigh yourself up with all modesty—but with a great reverence for the strong sons of God the wide world through and in all spheres of influence. I dare to call upon you in the name of God to make use of these rich endowments. You have the will, here is the way; you have the best of all material, the method will shape itself.

And added to these you may have pity: Pity for the weak and oppressed, for the sad and lonely, for the fatherless and the afflicted, for the neglected and down-trodden. If you feel the pull at your heart-strings, if you have experienced the rush of bitter sweet tears scalding your eyes at some tale of woe and desolation, let not this be forgotten as an idle dream: be not ashamed of it, rejoice in it: push back the tears to their source, and go forth nerved and thrilled to redress all wrong, to soothe all sadness, so far as in you lies. For this is an indication that you are alive—that you are a man, gifted with a man's strength made sublime by tenderness.

What sad waste there is in the world—not only waste of our substance, but waste of our talents, our noble spiritual powers.

Dare we let these lie idle any longer?

If after this, the weak stereotyped question, which is almost an anti-climax, is put to me, "What can we teach?" what can I say except exclaim, Teach! Teach what you have and are: your genuineness, your sense of humour, your manliness, your large generosity, your charity, your true nobility; teach them in every way, in all ways: through your scorn of scorn, your love of love, your hate of hate, your hero-worship, your sympathy. You have all this ready now—and more, you have the manliness of Christ to help you; you have the glorious gospel of the living God as an inspiration. This will enlarge you and edify you; this will lift you out of the valley of despondency, and set your feet upon the hills of holy exultation. Thank God that you are alive, that you have the power of showing to others how beautiful a thing it is to be alive. If we need more passion in our preaching, we need more life in our teaching. Everywhere the cry is for life, life—not for death. We serve the living God. Believe me, this is true for ever, "A man never knows what freedom is until he becomes bond-servant unto God." Rejoice in your strength, rejoice in your life, in your holy freedom, and again I say rejoice.

NOTES FROM DARJEELING.—III.

Darjeeling, May 30, 1900.

The third class of people one meets with in Darjeeling are the Nepaulese, from the Western Mountains. They are a pushing, thriving race, very prolific, and great colonisers. Many have settled as crofters and cultivators, and make excellent agriculturists. They excel, also, as carpenters, blacksmiths, and tailors. Others are engaged in the numerous tea-gardens in the district, where they make the best hands. Still others are good table servants, bearers, cooks, syces, &c. In feature they are far less Mongolian than the other races mentioned. In physique they are wiry, light, agile, short, and slim, wonderfully active and hardy, warlike and brave. They wear close-fitting coats, curious trousers—very free above the knee and very tight below—and small, tight-fitting caps. With few exceptions they carry in their girdle their national "khukri," or curved knife, a well-balanced but deadly-looking instrument, which they know full well how to use with great effect. Fortunately, however, they are not a quarrelsome race, or it would be used in warfare. It is generally used for domestic purposes. They have a heavier one for slaughtering buffaloes, and they have been known to sever a buffalo's neck at a single blow with such a knife.

The Nepaulese women are easily recognised by the smart jackets they wear, and a full-pleated petticoat, which, together with a gaudy handkerchief, forms their clothing. They use only Indian ornaments of silver and gold; flowers decorate their hair; and strings of coin worn round the neck indicate the absence of poverty among them. Like the Bhutian women they carry their babes in small baskets on their backs; and are easily distinguished from other hill races, not only by their dress, as I have said, but also by having their heads covered with cloth, often of bright and rich texture.

The Nepaulese will live in the same village with the Lepchas, but they occupy a separate quarter to themselves. They are divided into almost innumerable tribes or clans. The ruling clan are the Ghoorkas, who make soldiers second to none all the world over. The British Ghoorka regiments are one of the great elements of strength in the Native Army. They have given noteworthy instances of their pluck and general hardiness in several expeditions, notably in the march to Kandahar, in the last expedition to Afghanistan, and more recently in Chitral.

The religion of the Nepaulese is a strange mixture of Buddhism, Hinduism, and Brahminism, with traces of Paganism pure and simple. They have Brahman priests, and for meat eat only the flesh of goats. They do not intermarry with the Buddhist races, but are allowed to marry several wives. These wives, however, are not kept locked up, like their Hindu sisters of the plains. At Darjeeling the Nepaulese worship in the Hindu temple in the bazar, or in the one on the grounds of the Rajah of Burdwan.

It is a universal habit among the men, women and children of the Lepchas, Bhutians, and Nepaulese, even among the very young children from two to three years of age, to smoke cigarettes.

The Thibetans proper come into Darjeeling only in the cold season, and therefore I am not able to speak of them, as of the other races, from personal observation. I am indebted to the authors of Guide Books for descriptions of them. They come into Darjeeling to trade, bringing with them ponies, yaks, sheep, goats, rock-salt, musk, and other commodities. They take back with them tobacco, broadcloth, piece-goods and other articles. When in the district they usually camp out in small light tents on the Lebong Spur, 1,000 feet below Darjeeling. They are polyandrous. It is not uncommon to find one woman occupying a tent with six or seven men. Their features are Mongolian. The men are an uncouth, wild-looking lot, middle-sized, squarely built, and evidently strong and hardy. They do not wear beard, whiskers, or moustache, removing every hair from their faces by means of tweezers. The men wear their hair either in pigtails or flowing, as fancy dictates. Their dress consists of a long, thick blanket robe, fastened round their waists by a leathern belt. In this belt they stick their iron or brass pipes, and to it they suspend their long knives, chop-sticks, tobacco-pouch, tweezers, tinder-box, wooden cup, and a miscellaneous assortment of other useful articles. They are distinguished by their boots. The boots, with thick soles and stockings, are made of some woollen material, very similar to what Chinamen wear. The head-gear is also rather of the Chinese build, and is made of felt; and caps like these were made centuries before Europe knew anything about felt.

The dress of the women is somewhat similar to that of the men, but they wear in addition a short sleeveless coat over the robe, drawn round the waist by a girdle of brass or silver links. Their hair is braided into two tails, and they have a peculiar habit, when travelling, of smearing their faces with a black, sticky mass of coal-tar consistency.

This pigment of grease, say Mr. Edmund Mitchell and Mr. T. Hutton Taylor, is not intended to conceal their charms, as some travellers have supposed, but to protect the skin against the biting mountain winds. Both sexes wear silver rings and ear-rings, set with turquoises, and square amulets on their necks and arms, which are boxes of gold and silver, containing small idols, or the nail-parings, teeth, or other reliques of some sainted Lama, accompanied with musk, written prayers, and charms. The Thibetan method of salute, say the authors just mentioned, is to loll out the tongue, grin, nod, and scratch the ear; but this procedure entails so much ridicule in the low countries that they do not practise it to strangers.

The Lepchas, Bhutias, Nepaulese, and Thibetans do not exhaust the hill tribes to be met with in Darjeeling; but they constitute the chief and most important portion of the heterogeneous population of the town. I pass over the minor races without mention. Writing on the mixed nature of the community, Dr. Hooker remarks:—"That six or seven different tribes, without any feudal system or coercive head, with different languages and customs, should dwell in close proximity and in peace and unity within the confined territory of Sikkim, even for a limited period, is an anomaly; the more so especially when it is considered that, with the exception of a tincture of the Buddhist religion among some few of the people, they are all but savages, as low in the scale of intellect as the New Zealander or the Thibetan, and beneath those races in ingenuity and skill as craftsmen. Wars have been waged among them, but they have been neither sanguinary nor destructive, and the fact remains no less remarkable that at the period of our occupying Darjeeling (1835) friendship and unanimity reigned amongst all these tribes, from the Thibetan at 14,000 feet to the Mechi of the plains, under a sovereign whose temporal power was wholly unsupported by even the semblance of arms, and whose spiritual supremacy was acknowledged by very few."

It will thus be seen that Darjeeling is one of the most polyglot places on the face of the earth. The vernaculars spoken are Lepcha, Bhutia, Nepauli, Thibetan, Hindi, Bengali, and Hindustani. There is further a hill patois, called Pahari, written in Hindi or Devanagri ("Language of the Gods"), and used in all official police reports. Sanscrit is also understood and written by the Lamas.

Before passing away from the subject of these hill people, I may mention that the time and place to see these, and the other races of natives that inhabit the district, is on Sunday, about midday, in the market-place at Darjeeling. It is then that the hillmen from considerable distances and labourers from the surrounding plantations come in in large numbers. The scene on these occasions is varied, curious—almost unique. There will be seen Lepchas, Limboos, Bhutians, and Nepaulese, mixed up with Hindoo, Mahomedan, and Eurasian servants of European gentlemen. Every conceivable article is on sale from praying-wheels and local curios down to much-advertised English hair-dyes and soothing syrups for infants. Sheep, goats, pigs, poultry, eggs, butter, vegetables, and tea, together with European pickles, jams, sardines, tinned meats, and other stores, are the chief edible constituents of the heterogeneous assortment of articles offered for purchase.

The vending and purchasing proceed amidst much noise, the light-hearted hil people, men and women, laughing, singing, shouting, playing practical jokes on each other, every broad face shining with good temper and mirth. The rosy-cheeked women, some of them with handsome faces, are quite unlike their Hindoo sisters in the plains: they enjoy the most perfect freedom, and laugh and romp about like veritable children. Many of them have their youngest born, little yellow chubby morsels of humanity, strapped to their back in the inevitable bamboo basket. Altogether, this bright and merry Sunday scene affords one of the most interesting and curious sights which a visitor to Darjeeling can see there.

S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

OXFORD NOTES.

WARS and rumours of war have had less effect on Manchester College and her activities than on much of the College and University life this memorable year; her students have continued to equip themselves for the peaceful battle against evil to which they are to devote their future lives; but except for a courageous voice now and then lifted up in the pulpit on behalf of what seemed to make for peace and justice, the walls have heard but little of the turmoil which has so stirred the country. Lectures, coaching, and essay-writing have taken their usual course. Mr. Carpenter has taken his hearers far a-field during the two terms of his lectures on the History of Religion in India — Early Brahmanism and Buddhism; the professor of philosophy has had a devoted following; Professor Gilman, of Meadville, U.S.A., interested his hearers on the subject of "Social Psychology"; and the Principal and his staff have pursued their labours undisturbed by the loss of any of their flock except one, an American brother who desired to travel—but not to the seat of war. The Martineau Club, the debating and other societies, met as usual, and the men gratefully discussed their tennis and their tea in the hospitable garden thrown open to them by one of the professors. One of the chief events, perhaps, is that the library has been enriched by two large and valuable gifts of books from the collections of the late Dr. Martineau and of his son Mr. Russell Martineau, works chiefly bearing on philosophy and on the Oriental languages; the library is the recipient of many valuable donations it is true, but these naturally stand out on account of the honoured names of those who gathered together these materials for their labours, and companions of thought.

The college has, too, its lighter moments; all is not gravity; the meetings of the Social Union, for bringing together congregation, students, and friends, are well attended, and this year were even rounded off by an enjoyable water-picnic; while "eights" week was marked by a charming dance given by Mrs. Carpenter to her friends, and the annual reception held by the Principal and Mrs. Drummond in the closing week of the session was the last festivity of a pleasant term.

The effects of the war have made themselves felt more perhaps in Oxford University than in Cambridge; the expenses attending the raising a large body of University (home) volunteers, with its cycling corps, to be seen out on regular practice, and the withdrawal of numerous undergraduates as commissioned officers for South Africa—to say nothing of due feeling—determined the authorities, as was fitting, to reduce opportunities for unnecessary expenditure. Oxford hardly knew itself without the ceremonies in the Sheldonian, the attendant festivities and college balls and fêtes of commemoration week, and Encænia itself (the Creweian oration) passed off quietly in the Old Divinity school. The new degrees to be conferred in Science and Literature have, after much discussion, and the shaping of gowns that should not interfere with those already worn (the "outward visible sign") by holders of other degrees, been established, another worthy goal for students in subjects which Oxford cannot longer neglect to acknowledge. It is pleasant to think that the first of these honours to be conferred was upon an American, Professor J. M. Baldwin, of Princeton, receiving the degree of Science at the same time that Professor C. E. Norton, late of Harvard, was presented with the D.C.L.

Several eminent men have given Oxford the privilege of public utterances during the early summer. Mr. Beerbohm Tree's address at the Union seems to have attracted more discussion on his views as to the right way of presenting Shakespeare's plays on the stage than Mr. Herkomer's well-appreciated lecture on "England, lovable, and paintable"; the art of this gentleman is sometimes adversely criticised, but none could have heard this fine and poetical expression of feeling for the best English ideals without knowing that he has the root of the matter in him, and without being grateful to the talented artist who has so thoroughly made himself one with his adopted country. The Romanes lecture on June 29, by Dr. J. A. H. Murray, on "The Evolution of English Lexicography," is accounted to have been one of the best since the foundation of this lectureship; dry as the title may sound, it was a very interesting history, enlivened with sallies of humour amidst much learning. And among others must not be forgotten the Rev. Stopford Brooke's address to students at Manchester College at the end of the term—an address of rare distinction (notwithstanding his satirical remarks upon old age), combining kindly adjuration with ripe wisdom that sank into the hearts of his hearers.

These notes may be closed with a tributory word to one of no common order recently passed away. Miss Mary Kingsley, who lectured in Manchester College on June 5, 1897, for the Hibbert Trustees, on "African Religion and Law," and again at Somerville College in May, 1899, died in the pursuit of duty to her country, at the Palace Hospital, Simons Town (Cape Town), of enteric fever, taken while nursing sick Boers, which, seizing upon a system overtaxed by her strong energy, cut off a most valuable life in its thirty-eighth year. Her explorations and studies of native life, related in her delightful books, are well known; what are not so well known were her womanly and tender heart, her fidelity and unselfishness; it was these which enabled her to put forth her genius for insight, and her extraordinary abilities on behalf of the right and of suffering humanity wherever she saw need. The deep sea, her beloved, received her earthly remains; her calm resignation at the last is a lesson needed to be learned by the grieving friends to whom she endeared herself far and wide.

THE OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS.

A RETROSPECT.

"Is it practical?" was the question asked by one of our most practical of Sunday-school teachers when the suggestion to hold a short summer school at Oxford was first mooted, and it is good to record that, after due consideration, he answered his own question in a hearty affirmative. And the event has justified his verdict. Now that the meeting has been held for the second time, we may perhaps be allowed, not only to generalise a little about it, but also to express the belief that the success which has hitherto attended our efforts may be expected to be maintained in these ventures in the future.

If I were asked to say to what the undeniable charm of the Summer Session has been due, I should not hesitate to ascribe it to the presence, in equal proportions, of joyousness and of earnestness among those who gathered each day within the walls of Manchester College. Everybody seemed to have come provided with a determination to be pleased and a determination to learn as much as possible; and this being so, the leaders had a comparatively easy task before them.

It is not my province to give a report of the lectures; that has been done by others; but in taking a retrospective glance over the ten days, my thoughts naturally go first of all to the splendid series of eight lectures by Mr. J. Estlin Carpenter, on the great development in the thought and ideas concerning the Bible, which has taken place during the century. It was, indeed, a privilege to hear something of the history of this eventful period in respect to the attitude of scholars to the Book of Books; and we are glad to know that arrangements will probably be made to repeat these lectures in London, for everyone interested in this subject will find inspiration as well as instruction from Mr. Carpenter's words.

One evening the subject of a Young People's Religious Union was discussed, the teachers on that occasion changing their rôle and speaking as members of the churches. Although there was a general desire expressed that some means might be found for cultivating the higher life, and for helping the "undergraduates" of our churches to learn to give a reason for the faith they profess, yet the organisation so successful at Sheffield, was not felt to be quite fitted to the needs of the country at large, and it was decided not to take any definite action for the present. Of the bright and suggestive evening when the teachers again changed their places and became for the time "average Sunday-school children," listening to five minutes' addresses from various school visitors, with the Rev. Ceredig Jones as superintendent, every one present will retain a delightful memory, and I shall not soon forget the triumphant look of one superintendent who exclaimed afterwards, "I was able to get suggestions from everyone of the addresses; see, I have notes of them all here."

But it was not only with lectures and discussions that we were concerned at Oxford; we, too, did our best to complete the all roundness of the members, by appealing to the physical and social side of human nature; boating parties were fitted in, both in early morning and late evening; excursions were made, colleges were visited; and thanks to the kindness of the Principal and Mrs. Drummond, Mr. and the Misses Upton, and Miss Davenport Hill the whole party were invited to various At Homes. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Woods again won the grateful thanks of all for their excellent overseering, and untiring efforts in making the local arrangements, while Mr. and Mrs. Soundy catered for the common midday meal in a way that was warmly appreciated by all who partook of it each day.

In a word the whole session was marked by the spirit of true optimism, that spirit which seems the only possible one for those of us who believe that this world is under the control of a wise, loving, and good Power, and that, therefore, "all is well" if only we do our best; and that, as Mr. Haigh told us in his inspiring lecture, "the worst sin is not to try." Curiously enough, I heard the following anecdote which bears on this point, just after my return home. There were once two frogs, one an optimist, the other a pessimist; and one day they both fell into a bowl of cream. The pessimist frog, feeling the hopelessness of the position, sank to the bottom and died; but the little optimist frog struggled and battled and, buoyed up with hope, struck out with hind legs and front legs until—behold, she found herself supported on a firm pat of butter which her efforts had converted out of the cream. And someone—reading a second parable into the first—added that, in the centre of the pat of butter, was the little dead frog!

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

HINTS FOR TEACHERS.

AT the recent Summer School for Teachers at Oxford, a conference was held on "Subject that have been actually taken in Class," the Rev. J. J. Wright in the chair. The following are notes of the Conference.

Miss Lawrence (London) told how she had taken the chairman's booklet "The Story of the Sunday School," and interested and instructed two or three classes combined. She found it a good thing to vary her subjects, and also to ask the class from time to time if there was any subject they would like her to take. When a subject was suggested she would, of course, prepare for it and deal with it on some succeeding Sunday. She found it well sometimes to prepare a list of subjects, read this to her scholars and ask them to select a subject from the list. She found biographical subjects nearly always acceptable, and spoke highly of Miss Cooke's "Dorothea Dix" and "Whittier."

Mr. Hillier (Oxford) believed in taking any current event, such as "A Lifeboat Procession," and use that to interest the boys or girls in the heroes of lifeboat work. Just now he intended to take Gordon's work in China as a subject. Generally he could find something in the newspapers which would arouse the interests of the boys at once.

Miss Brown (Leeds) also had found biography very useful. Texts and moral maxims by themselves were too abstract. They needed embodying in real lives. This you get in biographical teaching. She spoke highly of the life of Mrs. Fry and the life of George Smith, of Colevillc. She also spoke of the wonderful power of the Bible, if reverently used.

Mr. Ballantyne told how the boys in his class had been interested in a series of lessons on "The Breakfast Table," taking each thing, such as bread, tea, sugar, &c., as the separate topic of a lesson from Sunday to Sunday.

Miss Youngerman (Birmingham), after considerable experience as a teacher, and more recently as a visitor of Sunday-schools, gave it as her opinion that nothing was so interesting to her scholars or had so much influence on their minds and lives as incidents or stories about real men and women. It was good to ask the girls what woman must we talk about or the boys what man must we talk about. The speaker also pleaded for more systematic teaching in our Sunday-schools, if only for part of the year. She had made this plea to some practical effect in a few of the schools she visited, and found on visiting them again the greater good done by a little more continuity in the lessons given.

Mr. Thompson (London) explained how he had made the travels of St. Paul growingly interesting to his class of boys. Instead of beginning with a complete map he began with a large blank sheet of paper. On this he and the boys made their map as they went along and filled in important details with coloured crayons. The knowledge of the boys grew as their map grew.

Mr. J. Ellis Mace (Tenterden) said a good word for the little book "Do the Right," recently published (6d.) by the S.S.A. He also spoke of the Christian Freeman as being a storehouse of good things, and mentioned that in the summer time a lesson on grasses might be given.

Mr. Ion Pritchard (London) told how a class of young men had been deeply interested in Miss Cooke's "Dorothea Dix," and had written essays upon the subject, which had been sent to the authoress. More particularly, Mr. Pritchard told about Mr. John Dendy's book for young men, entitled "Successful Life." His class had greatly benefited by the study of this book, and he, the speaker, had never come across a better book for the young men in our Sunday-schools.

Miss Piper (Evesham) thought she herself had had most success in Bible lessons, which, however, she always made short, and so had time to give a second lesson which was generally biographical. Lloyd Garrison she had found a capital subject; the "Story of Religion in England," in its earlier parts, her scholars had been interested in. She had also interested them in "Philo-Christus," but in using such a book great care must be taken on the part of the teacher. "Pilgrim's Progress" she had also taken, and that linked itself on very well to the Bible lesson. Poetry, also, she had found the scholars interested in if the poetry was not too imaginative. "Evangeline" had proved a success.

Mr. Embury (Birkenhead) spoke highly of the chart of graduated lessons which Dr. Klein, Mr. Armstrong, and others had prepared for the schools in the Liverpool Sunday School Society, and which might be had from the S.S.A., London.

Miss Patterson (Belfast) told how she had taken "Baxter's Second Innings," by the late Professor Drummond, and Miss Andrews (Cumber, co. Down) also said a word or two about the teaching in the Irish Sunday-schools.

Miss Pritchard showed how by asking a class of young men each to write down his own account of a tea-party at which all had been present, and then by comparing these accounts together, which might agree in the main, but differed greatly in detail, taught them a lesson as to how the Bible grew.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherton (Chowbent).—The eight Nonconformist Sunday-schools, of which the Unitarian in this place happens to be the oldest and largest, had their annual united procession through the township on Saturday afternoon last. Five bands and the various school banners accompanied the processionists, who numbered nearly 4,000. The younger children rode in gayly decorated vehicles. After the procession each contingent went for tea and recreation to its own school and field. Fine weather prevailed the whole of the afternoon and evening.

Blackley (Stone-laying).—On Saturday, July 21, foundation stones of the new Sunday-school at Blackley were laid by Mrs. Simister, Mr. Charles Eckersley, and Mr. Thomas Knott. At 3.15 P.M. a procession of scholars and friends, headed by the Salford Silver Band, and the school banner flying, marched round the village, arriving on the site about four o'clock. A goodly number of people were present. The Rev. W. Holmshaw was chairman of the proceedings, and the Rev. Charles Roper conducted the short devotional service which preceded the stone-laying. Just as the prayer commenced a perfect deluge of rain came down suddenly, and drove everybody into the church, which, happily, is adjoining, and there the service was completed. The Chairman made a brief statement of their aims, and the progress made in securing funds. He said that only half of the necessary money had yet been received; but the new premises were so essential that operations had to be commenced. Mr. Newton Smith presented the mallets and trowels with a felicitous little speech. He said that Mrs. Simister was one of the most staunch supporters they had had; she had taught their scholars in the Mechanics' Institute before the old school was built. Mr. Eckersley's father had, together with the late Mr. Bennett, done much in founding the old school, and Mr. Charles Eckersley himself had been connected with the place for some years. Mr. Knott for many years had been an earnest and persistent worker in all that pertained to the welfare of both church and school. Mr. Smith stated that the cases containing the trowels were made of oak which was in the old chapel, and which was, therefore, at least 200 years old. The recipients having suitably expressed their acknowledgments, the assembly which quite filled the chapel again went to the site—the rain meantime having ceased—and the actual stone-laying was proceeded with, the stones being declared to be "well and truly laid." It is hoped that the structure will be completed by October, and it is then intended to hold a bazaar in it in November, to raise whatever sum may still be lacking. Mr. Tom Cook is the architect of the building. It is to stand upon the site of the old school, with a portion of the parsonage garden added.

Bolton: Bank-street.—On Wednesday evening, 18th inst., the members of the school choir, with their honorary teacher, Miss Ethel Haselden, met at the school by invitation of Mr. and Mrs. John Harwood. The Rev. C. J. Street was called to the chair. Mr. Harwood explained that Mrs. Harwood and he desired to mark their sense of the great progress which had been made by the school choir under the able tuition of Miss Haselden, as particularly evidenced in the fact that the Silver Challenge Shield, given by himself to the Bolton Sunday Schools' League, had been won three years in succession. Mrs. Harwood then gave as a memento to each of the girls a gold brooch, and to each of the boys a gold pin. Two members of the choir suitably acknowledged the gifts in the name of all the recipients.

Dean-row.—Through the kindness of Mr. Thos. Worthington, chairman of the Chapel Committee, and Mrs. Worthington, the members of the congregation were afforded the opportunity of meeting and welcoming at a garden party at Broomfield, Alderley Edge, on Saturday last, their new minister, the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., and Mrs. Thomas, late of Scarborough. Notwithstanding a thundery atmosphere and heavy rain in the early afternoon, a majority of the members were present, and spent an hour or two in pleasant social intercourse.

Horsham.—By the kind invitation of Mr. A. P. Busch, several of the members of the Museum Society met at South Grove on Thursday week, and had a very pleasant reunion. During the afternoon and evening readings from Romeo and Juliet were given on the lawn. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the host, whose beautiful garden and grounds had been so thoroughly enjoyed.

Ilminster.—At the Old Meeting House, on Sunday, July 15, sermons were preached and collections taken in aid of the Indian Famine Fund. In the afternoon a floral service was held, and a collection taken for the same object, the offerings of flowers being sent to the Bristol Mission. The total amount raised and sent, without deduction, to the Brahmo Somaj Famine Fund was £17 4s. 11d.

Leeds: Holbeck.—On Monday, July 16, a meeting was held in the schoolroom of the Domestic-street Chapel, to welcome the Rev. Charles Harvey Cook (formerly Congregational minister in Dorsetshire) on his appointment as minister. After tea the meeting was most successful and enthusiastic. A large and influential body of Unitarian ministers and friends were present on the platform, while in the body of the hall a large number of members and friends of the church were present. The following were the resolutions passed:—(1) Proposed by Mr. W. Westerman, seconded by Mr. W. Holgate, and supported by Mr. J. S. Kitchen and others, "That the members of the Holbeck Unitarian Chapel congregation here assembled, assure the Rev. Charles Harvey Cook of a most hearty welcome to their pulpit and brotherhood, and trust that, with God's help and blessing, and the earnest co-operation of the congregation, his ministry may for many years to come be a healthy, happy, and successful one amongst them." (2) Proposed by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., seconded by the Rev. E. C. Jones, M.A., supported by the Revs. Andrew Chalmers, J. G. Slater, John Fox, and others, "That the ministers of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union give the Rev. Charles Harvey Cook a most hearty reception into their ministry, and pray that, with the blessing of God, he may be spared for many years to preach the Gospel of Christ, the Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man."

London: Bermondsey.—The teachers offer cordial thanks to the friends who so liberally responded to the appeal for funds towards the combined Bermondsey and Deptford Sunday-schools' excursion, which was successfully carried out on July 18, to Cheam Park.

London: George's-row.—The annual flower show was held at this Mission on the 18th inst. Mrs. Freeston gave away the prizes. Mr. F. Nettlefold kindly allowed his head gardener to act as judge and also presented the Mission with about 100 plants for distribution to those who obtained honourable mention. A decided improvement was disclosed as to the quality of the plants in competition, and 430 plants were sent in by the competitors. The evening meeting was well attended, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, who took the chair, being supported by the Rev. F. K. Freeston and Mr. Alfred Preston, whilst Mrs. Sargent and Mrs. Savage Cooper enlivened the proceedings with music and singing. At the conclusion of the proceedings the Rev. F. Summers thanked all who had assisted in the arrangements.

London: Highgate.—At the morning service last Sunday, the following resolution was passed by the congregation:—"That the members of the Highgate congregation, assembled on the last Sunday prior to his departure for America, record their feelings of heartfelt personal gratitude to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, and their warm appreciation of the earnest Christian spirit that has characterised his brief ministry among them. They desire also to express their sincere sympathy with him in the anxious time through which he has lately passed, and their earnest hope for Mrs. Sunderland's speedy and complete restoration to health. The congregation request him to convey to Mrs. Sunderland their affectionate greetings, and their assurance of the hearty welcome which awaits them, alike from the congregation and from London Unitarians generally, should they find themselves able to accept the invitation, which has already been offered, to return to the permanent pastorate of the church." Mr. Sunderland had preached that morning on "Hope," and towards the close of his sermon referred to his departure for America, and the uncertainty whether he would be able to return. He gratefully acknowledged the kindness with which he had been received at Highgate, and expressed his sense of the fine equipment and the great opportunity of the church for a faithful ministry and growing work of public usefulness. He should be very thankful if it were permitted to him to return to undertake that work. He thought that nowhere else in the world was the responsibility of individual Unitarians or of Unitarian churches quite so great as in London, because that was the most influential and conspicuous city in the world. If the cause of Unitarianism was weak there, not only all England but all the world felt the weakness; if it were strong, all England and all the world was strengthened. London Unitarians should bear that in mind. He concluded with the prayer that divine blessing might rest upon that church, and that it might be truly as a city set on a hill, whose light could not be hid.

London: Little Portland-street.—At a meeting of the congregation on Sunday, July 22, a scheme for repairing and redecorating the building, which has for some time past occupied the attention of the committee, was adopted. The improvements include the installation of the electric light and the provision of new seats in the body of the chapel, in addition to necessary repairs to roof, skylight, and windows, and repainting the walls both internally and externally, and when carried out will render the chapel worthy of its unique position as the only Unitarian place of worship in Central London. Towards the necessary expenses, the congregation has already contributed a sum of over £500, which is rather more than half the total required. An anonymous subscriber has generously offered to make good half the further expenses, on condition that the other half is collected from private donors. With their task thus lightened, the congregation hope to reopen their chapel in the autumn free from debt, believing, as they do, that its maintenance affects the needs of a wider public than that which regularly worships within it. Morning services will be held at University Hall, Gordon-square, on Aug. 26 and Sept. 2; and at the Portland Schools, Little Titchfield-street, W., on Sept. 9 and 16.

London: Stoke Newington.—At the June examination for honours of candidates for admission on the roll of solicitors of the Supreme Court, Mr. Russell Asquith Wooding, LL.B. (London), eldest son of the Rev. W. Wooding, B.A., was placed in the second class.

Rhondda Valley.—A number of successful meetings for open-air preaching have recently been held, with audiences ranging from 80 to 200, and a considerable amount of literature, both English and Welsh, has been distributed. Sometimes the addresses were heard in silence, but at other times were followed by a considerable amount of questioning. On June 22, at Penygraig, Mr. D. Rees spoke in English, and Dr. Griffiths in Welsh. When the meeting was half over, orders were received from the police to move on. On July 10, at Treherbert-square, and again on July 17, when many questions in English and Welsh were asked. On July 13, at Penygraig, a number of Dr. Griffiths's Welsh pamphlet on "Modern Views of the Old Testament" were sold; again on July 20, Mr. Rees spoke on "The Fall and the Ascent of Man," and Dr. Griffiths, in Welsh, on "Universal Truths of Unitarian Christianity."

Stockport.—On Thursday, July 5, a very successful garden party was held at Bramall Grange, in connection with the Ladies' Auxiliary, by the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Hollins. Nearly a hundred friends sat down to tea, and all were delighted with the genial and hospitable reception given by the host and hostess. On Thursday, July 12, the annual congregational picnic was held, when friends went by wagonettes to Gawsworth. Unfortunately the weather turned out to be very wet, and spoilt what would have been a very enjoyable outing. On Sunday afternoon, July 15, a special flower service was held in the church, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion. The service was conducted by the Rev. B. C. Constable, but twelve little girls took part in it by reciting prose pieces appropriate to flowers and fruit. The training of the young people had been undertaken by Mr. G. L. Halsall, a teacher in the Sunday-school, and it was generally felt that the service had been an interesting and successful one. A collection amounting to £1 15s. 6d. was made for the Blackpool Convalescent Home. On Thursday, July 19, the monthly social meeting was held, but instead of having it in the schoolroom, the friends went by wagonette to Middlewood, and had tea in the open air. Including friends and children, fifty-five persons were present, and the outing was much enjoyed.

Whitby.—The Charity Commissioners have sealed an order authorising the sale of the landed estate of "Leonard Wilde's Charity for the Minister of Flowergate Old Chapel." The estate, which was originally purchased for less than £500, has now realised £5,000, which will be invested in guaranteed railway stock. The Rev. F. Haydn Williams commenced last Sunday, on the Abbey Plain, a series of open-air services, with a congregation of 250. The services are to be continued in his large flagged yard on the harbour. As Mr. Williams lives right in the midst of the poorest part of the town, his neighbours come to him for advice in all sorts of troubles, and thus will attend his services on ground familiar to them, but will not cross the bridge and enter the chapel.

WILLASTON SCHOOL is on the Estate bequeathed by the Founder, consisting of about 24 acres. It is one mile from Nantwich Station. There are frequent trains between Nantwich and Crewe (G. W. R. and L. N. W. R.), and the School is, therefore, readily accessible from all parts of England. It is quite in the country.

The situation is healthy, and there is good water supply.

The drainage has been carried out by Messrs. William Bailey and Co., Sanitary Engineers, and has been inspected and approved by the North Eastern Sanitary Association.

The sub-soil upon which the School stands is gravel and sand.

The Buildings comprise :—

I.—The School-house, including the Head Master's house, four class rooms, a dining hall, three dormitories (for twenty, ten, and ten boys respectively), a library and reading room, and studies for the senior boys.

II.—Two fives courts and a gymnasium.

III.—A Sanatorium for infectious cases of illness detached from the buildings, and on the opposite side of the road. The sick room in the School is right away from the dormitories, and adjoins the Head Master's house.

Dormitory accommodation has been provided at the outset for 40 boys. In other respects the buildings are sufficient for 50 or more, and by utilising additional dormitory space, which at first will not be called into requisition, ample room can be provided for the larger number. For increase beyond the number of 50 a second house will be built in a separate portion of the School grounds. The dormitories are without cubicles.

The School is planned on the system of residence in separate houses, and will not, therefore, be in any sense a hostel.

The lady matron is Miss E. F. Wicksteed. The household arrangements are in her hands, under the supervision of the Head Master.

Willaston School provides a liberal education on public school lines. Provision made for teaching:—Religious Knowledge, Classics, Modern Languages, History and Geography, English Language and Literature, Mathematics, Natural Science, Music and Drawing.

There is daily Morning Prayer, and a Religious Service in the School on Sunday.

The aim of the Religious teaching is to instil a simple Christian faith and personal religion. The history of Religious liberty and rational faith will receive attention. This instruction will be in the hands of teachers free from tests of religious belief.

The Upper School is divided into :—

I.—A Classical Side.—The subjects are Religious Knowledge, English Language and Literature, History, Geography, Latin, Greek, French, German, and Mathematics. Boys are prepared for the Universities and a Professional career.

II.—A Modern Side.—The subjects are Religious Knowledge, English Language and Literature, History, Geography, Latin, German, French, Mathematics, Physical Science. Boys are prepared for Professional or Commercial life.

In the Lower Forms the course of instruction is the same for all, and in these Elementary Science will be taught chiefly by object and diagram lessons, dealing with chemistry, physics, and natural history, and illustrated in daily life by familiar objects. Boys who at an early age show under this training a taste for observation and experiment may, with advantage, pursue scientific study on the modern side.

Special attention is attached to the teaching of History, and of Geography, Physical, Political, and Commercial.

In the English Literature Classes the principles of literary criticism are kept before the boys. The books in the School Library are selected with the utmost care, due consideration being given to literary worth. The pupils are carefully advised and helped in their reading, and an honest and systematic effort is made to cultivate an appreciation of what is good, and a sound literary judgment.

Careful and individual attention is given to the physical training and development of the boys.

The whole system of school recreation is compulsory. The playing fields surround the School buildings, and offer ample space for Cricket and Football.

The changing rooms are on the ground floor, and include shower baths (hot and cold water).

The gymnasium is 50 feet long and 32 feet broad. An instructor is in attendance.

The single fives court is 16 feet by 32. The double court is 18 feet by 32. The courts are roofed, lighted from above, and have a spectators' gallery. They are available in all states of the weather.

Boys are encouraged to bring bicycles to the School—the county offering great facilities for riding. A cycle house, for the proper accommodation of machines, is provided.

A kitchen and fruit and flower garden, left in admirable order by the Founder of the School, has been retained. There is also some glass and a vinery. Boys are taught practical gardening, in the grounds, under the School head gardener. This forms a regular part of the School course for all, and is supplemented by instruction in botany, including plant life and classification.

Until a separate building is completed as a workshop, Carpenter's benches are placed in the gymnasium, for manual instruction.

Photography is encouraged. A properly-equipped dark room is at the disposal of the boys.

Examinations will take place at Christmas and Midsummer. The latter will be conducted by an examiner appointed by the Oxford and Cambridge Board, who will inspect the School and report upon its work.

Parents will be furnished with reports of the progress and conduct of the boys three times a year.

FEES.

For Boarders - - -	£100 per annum (inclusive)* or £33 6s. 8d. a term (inclusive)*
For Day Boys - - -	£12 12s. per term.

* This does not include the teaching of instrumental music.

FOUNDATIONERS.

In accordance with the wishes of the Founder, provision will be made for a certain number of boys as Foundationers, for whom the fees will only be one-half the full fees. These Founder's Exhibitions are available in the case of a boy whose parent or guardian was, at the time of the boy's admission to the School, a minister or a member of some congregation in England statedly assembling for the public worship of God, and imposing no obligation upon any member thereof (whether minister, member, or otherwise) to subscribe or assent to any articles or article of religious belief or to submit to any test of religious doctrine. But the Governing Body in all cases to have power to decide, in their absolute and uncontrollable discretion, whether any parent or guardian was or was not a member of any such congregation as aforesaid; with power also to admit the sons or wards of persons who might be personally in full sympathy with, although they respectively might not actually be members for the time being of any such congregation as aforesaid.

Tenure.—The Foundation Exhibitions are granted from year to year, but are renewable as long as the Foundationer's conduct and progress are satisfactory, until the end of the Summer Term which shall be nearest to his 19th birthday.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams writes from Calcutta on July 5:—"On Tuesday evening at a meeting of the joint Brahmo Committee, Professor B. N. Sen, the hon. secretary, read a detailed report of the work done with the Famine Relief Fund, from the beginning of the operations in April to June 26. He was requested to send a summary of the report to the Brahmo papers and to Mr. Pritchard. There can be no doubt that the fund is being most wisely and usefully administered by the Brahmo workers." Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations :—Amount already acknowledged, £2,125 15s. 7d.; E. G., 3s.; W., £5; Miss E. Hibbert (second donation), 10s.; Larne Old Presbyterian Congregation, £10; Dr. Courtney Kenny, £25; Northgate End Chapel Sunday-school, Halifax, £5; From Padiham, £20; Mr. U. Pritchard, £2 2s.; Newhall Hill Church, Birmingham (second donation), 10s.; Mrs. Thorpe, 10s.; Miss C. Smith, 10s.; Total, £2,195 0s. 7d. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

A FORTNIGHT ago there seemed no longer any ground for hope that any of the Europeans besieged in the buildings of the British Legation at Peking had escaped massacre, and many papers published circumstantial accounts of the horrible catastrophe; but during the last few days messages have been received, which show that although the besieged had been hard pressed and there had been considerable loss, the women and children at least were safe, and since July 17 the firing had ceased. Anxiety must still be very acute, and yet the worst fear is relieved. Whatever may be the course of events in the near future, it is to be hoped that the action of the Great Powers of civilised and Christian Europe may not be dominated by the spirit which found such extraordinary utterance in the speech of the Emperor of Germany to some of his troops on their leaving for service in China.

WITH the more hopeful news from China the week has brought the shock of the assassination of the King of Italy at Monza on Sunday evening, and to our Queen the sorrow of the death on the following evening of her second son, Prince Alfred, Duke of Edinburgh, and since 1893 Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. It was at the castle of Rosenau, near Coburg, where his father, Prince Albert, was born, that the Duke passed away, suddenly and without pain, happily spared from the increasing sufferings of a fatal malady. In the case of King Humbert there is no such alleviating thought. In the prime of life he has fallen a victim to the mad passion of the anarchist, leaving to his people the memory of a brave and conscientious ruler, with strong popular sympathies, notably shown during the terrible visitation of cholera at Naples in 1884. "A man," as Lord Salisbury said, "who loved his people above all things, and spent his life for them; a man whose family had given themselves to the fostering of the Italian nationality with a hearty and devoted continuance which led to constant success."

THE Wesleyan Conference, meeting this year at Burslem, under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Allen, received on Tuesday a report as to the position of the Twentieth Century Million Guineas Fund. Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., who moved the adoption of the report, expressed his belief that when the Conference met next year at Newcastle-on-Tyne, they would be able to rejoice over the accomplishment of their undertaking. Up to that time 769,000 guineas had been promised, and 317,500 guineas paid. Further large gifts were announced at the meeting, and at its close the Fund stood at 771,500 guineas.

THE Rev. C. M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," who has been in this country taking part in the recent Christian Endeavour Convention, sailed for home by the White Star s.s. Teutonic on Wednesday. On the previous evening a reception was held at Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, on the invitation of the Rev. C. F. Aked and his deacons, at which Mr. Sheldon made an interesting speech, giving his impressions of Church life in this country. He said, as reported in the Christian World, that he found here more formality in the relations between minister and people than in America. The position of the pulpit seemed to remove the minister to a great distance from his people, and often after service he disappeared into the vestry and went away without speaking to any of his hearers. He himself was not accustomed to that, but liked to be close to his people to know them all intimately, and to be able to speak to them individually both before and after service. English ministers, he thought, preached too much. People generally knew what was right, but they wanted to be trained to do it. It was of the utmost importance that Churches should work in the slums of great cities. If the Churches, forgetting their differences, would so work together in the worst quarters of their cities, it was difficult to picture the great effect that would be produced.

To the August Cornhill Mr. Frederic Harrison contributes an article in review of Mr. Charles Firth's "Oliver Cromwell and the Rule of the Puritans in England," of which he speaks as an excellent, a fascinating, a decisive book.

He tells the life-history of our mighty Puritan hero with all the fulness and accuracy which so many years of original research have made the privilege of the writer. It tells the story with a lucid vigour which must hold the interest of every reader, and it will pass with historians as the final estimate of the character and achievements of the Protector. It is a book to study, a book to enjoy, a book to live.

Mr. Firth contributed the articles on Cromwell and other Civil War leaders and notables to the "Dictionary of National Biography," and is known as the editor of historical documents for the Camden Society, and the Royal Historical Society. He has now proved that he can also write an admirable popular history. "Mr. Firth's Oliver," says Mr. Harrison, "is by no means the divinely inspired hero who can do no wrong, and whose commands mere men are bound to obey without reasoning or delay, as he appears to Carlyle and some Puritan zealots in England and America. Mr. Firth shows us the defects of the Protector's great qualities, his inevitable limitations, his slow enlargement of purpose, and his anxious hesitations and changes of mind. On the other hand, he proves Oliver to have been a consummate soldier, a profoundly conscientious spirit, and a born statesman above all statesmen of his age, if not in our English history."

ON Tuesday the second annual Fine Art Exhibition was opened at Sayes Court Hall, Deptford, under the presidency of Mr. A. H. A. Morton, M.P. Sir William Richmond, K.C.B., R.A., delivered an admirable address on Art.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

The exhibits are numerous, and the success of the exhibition was attributed by most of the speakers to the labours of the hon. secretary, Mr. J. G. King, who is also the esteemed secretary of the old Deptford Chapel, of which the Rev. A. J. Marchant is minister.

An illustrated history of "Matthew Henry and his Chapel" is announced by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, who is just relinquishing his ministry at Chester to undertake work for the Liverpool District Missionary Association. His book will appeal to all who are interested in the history of our churches, and will include in the record of more than two hundred years of Nonconformity the reprint of some quaint old documents.

THE GREAT HUCKLOW HOLIDAY HOME.

The Holiday Home was last week occupied by a mixed party, composed chiefly of teachers and scholars from the Hindley and Swinton Sunday-schools, with small detachments also from Horwich and Stalybridge, numbering altogether about eighty. That they thoroughly enjoyed themselves will be seen from the fact that they have only one serious complaint to make against the M.D.S.S.A., which is that it allows only seven days to the week, and those days remarkably short ones. To the members of the party whom last year's holiday has made familiar with the landscape, a new feature presented itself in the palatial structure of corrugated iron recently erected for the day accommodation of young holiday-makers. To complete the scheme of the association there are still two dormitories to be built on the adjacent land when the necessary funds are forthcoming. And our week's experience has shown us that the sooner this is done the better for the comfort and convenience of all concerned, and especially of those on whom falls the burden of management.

The directors of the Home have, with an acuteness characteristic of Manchester men, seized upon the best possible site in the neighbourhood for their buildings, with a splendidly open view of green fields and rolling hills. There is a good playing field; but, not satisfied with this, with true British instinct our cricketers promptly annexed another.

The week was full of activity, in spite of its tropical weather. There was an afternoon's visit to Eyam, with its pathetic reminiscences of the Great Plague. There were full-day excursions to Castleton, Monsal Dale, and Buxton, under the leadership of our "experts in botany, geology, and natural history." Then one fine morning was taken up with an exciting cricket match between Swinton and the combined forces of Hindley and Horwich. Our modesty prevents us from recording the result. And so with rambles and games out-of-doors, and songs and dances indoors, the week flew swiftly by. The presence of a venerable and genial secretary of the Association ensured decorum, and imparted a tone of respectability to all the proceedings. He knows a short cut to Castleton. We do not regard a charge of 6s. 6d. (5s. for juniors) for twenty-eight meals as in any way extortionate.

A WEEK-END IN PARIS.

I have just returned from Paris and its wonderful exhibition, after a short five days' visit. I suppose not many Sunday-school teachers have had the experience and pleasure of taking a class of young men on such an expedition, and so some account of it may be interesting.

Three or four months ago the proposal was made, and an invitation given to the class to accompany me to Paris, with a strong recommendation that in the meantime the young men should learn up as much of the language as possible and about the sights they would probably see, and this advice, I may say, they have certainly followed. Our party of eight started on Thursday morning, July 19, from London Bridge, just comfortably filling a compartment of the carriage, and travelled on through Newhaven and Dieppe to Paris. Nine hours most enjoyable travel, the sea passage being the pleasantest, and our destination was reached. We were not encumbered with much luggage, indeed this mainly consisted of a few extra collars, so that the walk of about three miles to our lodgings, a small boarding house near the Luxembourg gardens, was easily accomplished. A splendid walk it is too, past the grand opera house, through the Louvre, and by the river Seine, a wonderful series of sights at all times, but more especially when seen for the first time. As we came along, my companions were greatly surprised at seeing the people seated at tables all over the pavement, and said that the police and County Council were very remiss to allow the way to be so blocked up. Before the end of the next day, however, they had got used to this open air custom, and themselves had joined the trespassers on the pathway.

We had a comfortable little flat all to ourselves, joining for meals with the other boarders, four of whom were Chinamen sent by their Government to learn the language. French only was spoken at meal times, my young companions being silent and impressed by the vivacity and loudness of tone of three students who kept the conversation mainly to themselves. They were rather out in the cold at first, but the gestures and facial expressions of the speakers amused them, especially after I had assured them that in spite of the loud speech and occasional fierce looks nothing very serious was being discussed.

We had four whole days to spend in Paris, two of which were reserved for the exhibition. A bath in the Seine was one of the treats promised, and this proved so attractive that every morning we went for a swim in the bath where the river was clearest. It meant a longer walk, but it was worth it. The days were fully filled up with sightseeing — the Pantheon, churches, the Louvre, Zoological Gardens, Boulevards, Palais Royal, the Arc de Triomphe and Bois de Boulogne. The sight, however, which, after the exhibition, made the deepest impression was Napoleon's Tomb, its grandeur and the wonderful lighting effects, and many were the questions put as to the man in whose honour so splendid a monument had been raised. A further effect was created when, in the midst of almost a dead silence, drums began to beat, filling the whole place with resounding echoes. It was the signal for closing, and at once in obedience to the sound the crowd turned towards the drummers and followed them as they marched out of the building and through the long passages of the Invalides into the street. Never have I seen a more orderly and effective means of clearing. One of my companions suggested that something of the kind should be used for closing school on a Sunday afternoon to secure an orderly dismissal. He is to bring the proposal forward at the next teacher's meeting.

I am not going to describe the exhibition and will only say that I have seen nothing in its way so magnificent, that all who can should visit it, and certainly not miss the illumination of the whole of the buildings at night. As sight succeeded sight, the marvellous creations of men's brains and hands, England's work and productions among the rest, the impression gradually grew upon us that our country's place was not the all-important and overshadowing one that we had learnt to believe, but that other countries were quite as capable of doing excellent work, and, indeed, in some ways were ahead of us. A question or two from my companions would show me what was passing in their mind, and it was sometimes almost pathetic to note their wonder at the setting back of the Englishman to his place in line with the other nations. The young men did some shopping on their own account, showing me their purchases and change on their return, and I am bound to say that I never found they had made any mistake, even when they had received change out of English money.

As to expense, £4 was the cost for each of us, going with no organised party and getting the advantage of no reduced fare. Knowledge of the language and of the city on the part of the leader are, of course, necessary to obtain such a result. The excursion arrangements I found were all for night travelling, and as I looked upon the journey itself as one of the main features of the trip, we went by day service to see all we could. The sea passage alone, when midway between England and France, and with nothing but the wide expanse of water in view, was a revelation in itself.

We all of us enjoyed the trip from beginning to end, in spite of the great heat, and nothing happened in any way to spoil the happiness of the party. To my knowledge not a word was spoken by our French hosts showing ill-will or unpleasantness; on the contrary, we were treated with every courtesy, and on several occasions met with exceptionally good-natured treatment.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

"He showed me that Great City, the New Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven from God."—Rev. xxi. 10.

I have spoken of the Revival of the Sense for Nature, of the Awakening to the Spiritual in the Universe and in the Soul, and of the Discovery of the Greatness of the Middle Ages. My subject to-night is a fourth influence which deserves to be called Poetic, very intimately connected with these, and the outcome, in different ways, of each of them—namely, the New Sense of Citizenship.

It is quite as marked as the others, and very inspiring.

Let us go back once more to Addison. As I have said, Addison deserves our respect. He was a man of fine literary gifts. The choice English and quiet humour of his papers in the Spectator give him a permanent place in English literature. His hymns, too, will be remembered. But he had the Queen Anne limitations. He had no feeling for mountains nor for wild scenery of any sort, none for Gothic architecture nor for Chaucer. And though he liked our old ballads, and dared to say on their behalf that he had found some Virgilian and Horatian beauties in them, he looked down, with all the polite people of his time, on the Elizabethans. His one exception was the classical Milton, in whose defence he had to withstand an army of hostile critics.

His ideas on Citizenship were similarly restricted.

Take his immortal sketch of "Sir Roger de Coverley." It is a humorous and, of course, exaggerated picture of an old-fashioned Tory. We see in the old knight the principles and prejudices on which Addison as a Whig threw his kindly satire. He is a typical representative of the landed-interest—whose memory still lingers in some of our remote country-towns and villages. He is an old squire, devoted to the Stuarts, proud of his family and estate, fatherly and condescending to his tenants, fond of his old retainers and servants and horses—and of his parson also, if he does not know too much Latin and will read a sermon of his patron's choosing! Beyond an affable interest in his labourers and farmers, courtesy to neighbours, due regard for the drowsy pieties of the Established Church, and attendance on the magisterial bench, he has no sense of public duty. He dislikes London—except for an occasional visit—and denounces its whiggery and commercial uppishness. He does not doubt that the landed gentleman is the basis of the State and the safeguard of property, nor that without him the people would starve and the nation go to the dogs. It could never enter his head that others besides himself had a right to their native soil, or that the country might dispense with his valuable services. Such notions, if hinted to him, would be in his eyes sheer treason and Atheism.

Now Addison, as an Hanoverian and a Londoner, laughs good-humouredly at this Stuart country gentleman. Yet it is obvious that his own ideal as a citizen is not very much higher. He belonged to the party of reform, was a leading public man, was a recognised censor of manners and morals. But he strikes us as painfully wanting in public spirit. He accepts the world about him—which was a very corrupt world—as an established fact, and is content with a gentle, satirical persuasion. He did good in certain circles of society without one spark of what we are accustomed to call reformer's zeal. He is the embodiment of discretion. His great virtue in the eyes of himself and his contemporaries is that he can hold his tongue and keep out of scrapes. It is amusing how anxious he is to disassociate himself from Milton's republicanism, and painful to hear him speak of his outspoken friend, Steele, as "poor Dick." He himself never spoke out, never gave offence, always stood well with the majority, never lost a penny for principle, and died "the great Mister Addison." Such was the Court whiggery which resisted the landed party in politics by means of Government offices and moneys and bribes.

But let us pass over some seventy or eighty years. We find now a very different state of things. London is a great merchant city, and not the only great city. Manufactures have sprung up or developed in many parts of the country. Dissent flourishes. And the old landed gentry are confronted by a sturdy, trading, non-conforming middle-class, who are not content that the legislation shall be in the hands of and for the interest only of the agricultural nobility. The House of Commons has changed its complexion. Business has grown respectable. Literature, voiced by Dr. Johnson, has defied the lordly patron and thrown itself on middle-class support. A middle-class journalism also gives employment to independent thinkers. And the rights of the trader are emphatically asserted in Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." Benjamin Franklin lives in a different age from Addison's. We see in him a new liberality, a new plainness of speech, a new vigour of thought, a new sense of citizenship.

Yet in such a man as Franklin we meet with limitations as marked in their way as Sir Roger de Coverley's. He is the city man as opposed to the landowner, and is as convinced of his indispensableness to the State as Sir Roger was of his. He regards the manufacturing and Dissenting interests as the mainstay of national prosperity and liberty. Without them the towns could make no progress, and the country would fall back into feudalism. Nor has he the least suspicion of his right to his profits—as Sir Roger had none of his right to his rents. That the nation might become its own employer would have seemed to him and the leading men of that time as foolish or wicked speculation.

But let us move on again, some forty or fifty years. What is now the condition of England? We are in a corn-law agitation. The trader has got the upper hand of the landed gentleman. He obtains free trade for his goods, and cheap corn and bread for his employés, and pushes railways through the parks of the nobles. What is known as the Manchester School of politicians demands freedom of contract between masters and men, non-interference in private business and foreign affairs, and, in the interest of commerce, international peace and the abolition of armaments. And, though an essentially middle-class movement, it recognises the working class as a necessity, and as to be benefited for its own sake as well as in the interest of the employer. John Bright, for instance, who always took a middle-class point of view, was not content, with Benjamin Franklin, to be "a considerate master." He advocated peace, and free trade, and freedom of contract on behalf of the working man himself.

Once more, pass over a series of years. Come down to the eighties and nineties. Two movements have sprung from the Manchester School—one in opposition, the other as a development out of it. These are Imperialism and Socialism. I use both words in a wide sense, and not necessarily in an antagonistic sense. As Lord Salisbury said the other day, Imperialism has succeeded to and triumphed over the Manchester Liberalism. It was a protest against non-interference in foreign affairs, and against "peace at any price," while England was growing into a Greater England all over the world. Our Government, trade, capital, and fellow-countrymen abroad must be protected by active vigilance at home and by military and naval efficiency. Disraeli was alive to this. He kept an eye on Russia, bought the Suez Canal, and made the Queen Empress of India. And since his death his Imperialistic policy has steadily gained favour, until of late years it has carried everything before it. It has bolstered up Turkey and China against the Northern Bear, defeated Home Rule for Ireland, federalised, to some extent, the Colonies, and wrested independence from Soudanese and Dutch in bringing closer English North and South Africa. Imperialism is the distinguishing feature of our politics and literature at the present moment. Lord Salisbury, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Rhodes, and Mr. Kipling are our representative Englishmen; and, to judge from appearances, they are likely to be so for a long time to come.

Nevertheless, even these gentlemen have their limitations—as John Bright, Benjamin Franklin, Addison, and Sir Roger de Coverley had theirs. When the Imperialist speaks of freedom and justice he means such as we now enjoy under the English flag—that is, such as our landed gentlemen have wrung from the Crown, and our trading classes from the landed gentlemen, and our working people from the trading classes. It does not seem to occur to him that possibly a more civilised world might even dispense with the English flag; or that the working men and women of the different nations may join hands in obtaining from their rulers such a measure of freedom and justice as the English constitution at present may have no room for.

I am not going to indulge in useless prognostications. I only ask you to go back with me a little, and to note certain phenomena which may not be without their influence in the future. Let us return for a moment to the French Revolution. As you know, that great upheaval was looked upon with horror by the respectable people of England. You are aware how Burke shrieked against it. But its ideas were welcomed by the poets. Burns threw up his cap and sent a cannon to help the revolutionists. Cowper rejoiced, and Blake rejoiced, and Wordsworth and Coleridge thought they saw a new era dawn for humanity. Without the least sympathy for bloodshed—though they recognised that brutal excess was inevitable in the revolt of an outraged and maddened people — Wordsworth and Coleridge welcomed the Republican principles. These principles were—I quote Mr. Stopford Brooke—as follows:—"Man was one. What was true for one man was true for all. What was right for one was right for all. There were no class distinctions, no privileges. There were no national divisions, no national enmities. There was only one class—the class of man. There was only one nation—the nation of mankind. All men had equal rights—I wish they had said that all men had equal duties. All men were equally free. All men were brothers." These conceptions were seized upon by the few, including, as I have said, the poets—who in our history especially have been the prophets—and some radicals like Price and Priestley. Priestley, to his honour—and it should redeem him much in our eyes: I think it was by far the best thing about him—suffered for his Republicanism: had his house burnt down in Birmingham and then was compelled to go to America. Unconsciously a great change came over English thought and feeling. A new republican pity entered into our national culture—pity for children, for the poor, for the over-worked, for the suffering, and for the lower animals. We feel it in Burns' poems, in Cowper's verse and letters, in Blake's "Songs of Innocence" and his frontispieces, in Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," in Reynolds' paintings of children, in the homely themes of Gainsborough and the English landscapists, and, above all, in Wordsworth's poems—particularly in the "Prelude." The "Prelude" was not published until many years later, but it was written at the beginning of the century and sprang directly out of the hopes and disappointments of the Revolution. Read the "Prelude," my friends. It is one of the noblest books in the English tongue. Read it, every bit of it, many times. I could not ask you, in my last sermon, to read anything nobler in this present connection. It came to me as a revelation, and so I believe it would to some of you. It leads up, from first to last, to this grand, democratic hope, in the poet's own words, "What one is, why may not millions be?"

Yes, the millions — the mass of the population in any country, are the problem. For them, not for a privileged few, the world exists. For them the sun shines and the earth yields its increase. For them the Church of God was founded. For them Government legislates. For them are reform, education, culture, and religion. For all, not for some. This is the new thought, the new light which has dawned on men's souls never to set.

There have been years, whole decades, when it has been hid. It was so in the days of Waterloo. There was then much boasting of the English arms, the English constitution, the English Church, the English nobility; and the millions were content to be uneducated, drunken, voteless, and to cry "Down with the French." In such days poets fled from England, or wrote of the past. But in the thirties and forties the new dream reappeared and stirred noble energy. The millions began to ask for bread, for the franchise, for education, for newspapers, for railways, for education, for temperance, and for religion.

Shelley, whose gentle, wayward spirit had been outraged by English narrowness, was honoured after his death, and his poems were sung at Chartist meetings. Dickens opened the eyes of the reading public to the condition of the poor in "Oliver Twist." He always wrote for the millions. He himself was of the people, and he worked for the people. In all his novels he strikes hard at middle-class corruption—at middle-class indifference and ignorance and affectation and selfishness and bumbledom. And to promote reform he started the Daily News and Household Words. Then there were the two men whose names are connected in so many ways with what is really and deeply poetic among us—Carlyle and Ruskin. Impressed by the evil in all classes, and avoiding party names and cries, they spoke in prophetic language which very many still cannot understand. Carlyle's "Past and Present," and Ruskin's "Unto this last," for instance, are radical beyond any party radicalism, and conservative in a manner dumbfounding to the ordinary Tory. They contrast our modern civilisation with Mediævalism, denouncing aristocratic privileges, the self-interest Individualism of the Manchester political economists, and the greed of democratic agitators. Carlyle said, "With our present system of individual Mammonism and Government by Laissez faire, this nation cannot live. The problem of the whole future in Government is the Organising of Labour; how to deal with the actual labouring millions of England is the imperatively pressing problem of the present, pressing with a truly fearful intensity and imminence in these very years and days. No Government can longer neglect it." Ruskin spoke in the same way against the current theory of Wealth. Let us not be misled, he urged, by income tax statistics. The accumulation of things which fetch money is not growing richer. Drink, racehorses, opium, slaves, harlots, command a terrible price, but their increase is not increase of wealth. On the other hand, the most precious things in the world—sunshine, the air, life, and immortality—are God's free gifts to all. There is no wealth but well-being, and well-being is life—life, including all its powers of love and joy and admiration. "That country is richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings; and that man is richest who having perfected the functions of his own life to the utmost has also the widest, helpful influence, both personal and by means of his possessions, over the lives of others." With passionate contempt he denounced the idea, which is still accepted by very many, that "self-interest is the soul of business." Quoting Adam Smith that "It is the fear of losing his employment which restrains the worker's frauds and corrects his negligence," Ruskin said "Let any Christian reader think within himself what an entirely damned state of soul any human creature must have got into who could read with acceptance such a sentence as this." From his knowledge of Art, and through Art of History, he was able to bring forth overwhelming evidence that pictures, buildings, sculptures, and all works of beauty, were the works of love in proportion as they were beautiful, and that mere self-interest never produced a single work of art worth possessing. Belief in God, love for Christ and Mary, delight in Nature, patriotism, friendship and honour—not desire for gold nor fear of losing employment—have been the motives that raised cathedrals and city halls, and covered them with carving, mosaic or fresco, shaped iron and bronze, and painted the Word of God in undying colours. "And woe," he cried, "on all labour whatsoever that is done in greed or fear! Woe to the nations where such work is done! Let it beware of the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah!"

Carlyle and Ruskin complained that they stood alone, and were merely a pair of voices crying in the wilderness. Yet their influence has been very great. Nearly all the startling conclusions of such writers as William Morris, Karl Marx, and Henry George are to be found in their works, and such Socialistic efforts and measures as land nationalisation, State mines and railways and telegraphs, municipalisation of tramways, water, gas, and electricity, and the taxation of ground values are only the application of principles which they have laid down. The outcome of Ruskin's teaching was plainly indicated by the uproar excited by "Unto this Last" when it began to appear in the Cornhill Magazine. Such pressure was brought to bear on Thackeray, who was then editor, that he stopped its continuance.

"Socialism" has still an ugly sound. It means for most people mob-rule, stump oratory, strikes, and burning of hayricks. But the Socialism I am speaking of is not far, it seems to me, from the Sermon on the Mount, and is destined to outlast and supersede Imperialism. As John Morley said recently, the coming issue will be between these two forces—between the ideal of an English Empire based on militarism and of an International Federation based on labour and fellowship. I do not wish, as I have said, to indulge in wild conjectures. I am content to believe that though Imperialism is now everywhere triumphant, Socialism, in its higher sense, has only to work and wait to have its turn. And I will, in conclusion, just draw your attention to one significant sign of it—the change, I mean, gradually coming over the word "gentleman." We have had our landed gentleman, our Court gentleman, our merchant gentleman, our national, patriotic gentleman. We are feeling, I think, after a higher type of gentleman, whose characteristics are somewhat as follows:—

First, he judges himself not by what he has, nor by what he knows, but by what he does and what he is.

Second, he estimates others not by their clothes, their possessions, nor their education, but by their character.

Third, he is ashamed to have leisure when so many are over-worked; he is ashamed to be rich when so many are poor; he is ashamed of prosperity which may involve hardship to others; he cannot enjoy culture which is not shared by his fellow-men. Leisure, riches, success, literature, art, knowledge and religion have no attraction for him as the exclusive property of the few.

Lastly, he believes in Jesus Christ. He does not accept the widespread opinion among Christians that Christianity is impracticable, and that the Sermon on the Mount is to be taken cum grano salis. He has absolute faith in Love. He believes that Love, when men trust it sufficiently, is stronger than money, stronger than brains, and stronger than guns. He believes that Love, when it is deep enough, has power to overcome everything in the world that is accursed.

Ruskin says, at the close of his great treatise, "Modern Painters":—"So far as you desire to possess rather than to give, so far as you look for power to command instead of to bless, so far as your own prosperity seems to you to issue out of contest or rivalry of any kind with other men or other nations, so long as the hope before you is for supremacy instead of love, and your desire is to be greatest instead of least—so long you are serving the Lord of all that is last and least, the last enemy that shall be destroyed—Death; and you shall have Death's crown with the worm coiled in it, and Death's wages with the worm feeding on them; kindred of the earth shall you yourself become, saying to the grave 'Thou art my Father,' and to the worm 'Thou art my mother and my sister.'" And then he adds, what shall be my last words to you as your minister, "I leave you to choose between these wages and the gift of the Morning Star, this obedience and the doing of the Will which shall enable you to claim another kindred than of the earth, and to hear another voice than that of the grave, saying 'My brother and sister and mother.'"

LITERATURE.

"THE LIFE OF LIVES."*

After more than a quarter of a century of active labour, the venerable Dean of Canterbury takes up again the theme of his best known work, "The Life of Christ," first published in 1874. The present bulky volume, containing forty-three chapters in 563 pages, is written from the same general point of view, and marked by the same characteristics. The Preface explains that it has a different object; "it deals with questions of high importance, and aims at deepening the faith and brightening the hope in Christ of all who read it honestly." The curious implication that its predecessor did not deal with questions of high importance need not be pressed; the statement is of the loose and rhetorical kind to which readers of Dr. Farrar's books grow painfully accustomed. As he has "seen no reason to correct a single conclusion of the smallest vital importance," it may be inferred that the critical labours of the last twenty-five years have made no impression on him. This is plain from the statement that the result of close and hostile criticism shows the Gospels "to be of unassailable veracity" (p. 6), or, again, that the genuineness of St. John's Gospel "may be regarded as finally established by modern criticism" (p. 429). In this airy fashion is the whole army of recent students waved off the field. How different is the cautious treatment of Professor Sanday in his suggestive article in Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible." The Dean of Canterbury disdains to mention such trifles as the inconsistencies in the narratives of the Virgin-birth. The miracle is proved by "our conviction that He whom we worship . . . came not into the world by the ordinary processes of human birth," &c. (p. 22). Historical questions are thus to be decided by emotion. When this method of assurance is applied to the Ascension, even the Dean is a little uncomfortable, but to that we will return. It is more natural that the sinlessness of Jesus should be defended on this ground; but when we are told that this was "an achieved sinlessness" (p. 74) and in the next sentence are informed that he was "truly God," we seem to have a theological counterpart to the paradox so oddly stated thus by a recent writer: "Freedom of will is only a particular instance of a general truth—namely, that all bodies whatever, under certain conditions, are free to act in certain ways and within certain limits, but not in others, and are not only free to act, but are compelled to do so!"* The man who was also "truly God" was surely under very strong direction not to sin. In other words, the sinlessness of Jesus cannot have been at the same time both natural and supernatural. Yet that is precisely what our author affirms.

The chief note of the book is thus its exaggeration. This is betrayed in the style; there is at least one sentence two whole pages long, pp. 402-404; cf. another, pp. 538-540. Dr. Farrar's extraordinary abundance of quotation is known to all readers: he has a fancy for those of similar quality to his own copiousness: what can be more objectionable than this description of John the Baptist, "His work was to preach the 'pure, unsophisticated, dephlegmated, defæcated' moral law" (p. 234)! The colours, therefore, are laid on very thick: the condition of the heathen world is depicted in the utmost gloom: and though the writer can easily justify each single statement (and the student may find his references here, and elsewhere, useful), the total omission to present anything on the other side produces an unjustifiable impression. It is the same with Dean Farrar's estimates of the Law and the Pharisees. Everything is judged at its worst, to set off Christianity in heightened splendour by contrast. Here and there (see the citations on pp. 358, 374, 379) a glimpse is offered into some fairer judgment, but the author soon relapses again, and paints everything around Jesus in the darkest hues. Of a writer who stands just where he did five-and-twenty years ago, it is needless to say that one of the main problems of modern gospel-study—their eschatology—does not enter into his view. The chapter on the "Messianic Hope" is exceedingly inadequate, and the writer glides over the great discourse on the Mount of Olives without a hint of its difficulties (p. 471). In his interpretations the Dean is refreshingly anti-sacerdotalist; he leans a good deal theologically on Bishop Westcott; and he is manfully true to his own teachings on the "Eternal Hope" in the suggestion that even Judas, after he had "gone to his own place," may "have been reached by the Divine tenderness and pardoning compassion of his Lord" (p. 434).

Dean Farrar appears, however, sometimes really unable to face the facts. Oddly enough, the Transfiguration is not discussed in the volume. But the Ascension receives an entire chapter. The language of the New Testament is, of course, founded on the well-known Jewish view that there was a series of heavens one above another through which Jesus passed. That necessarily implies that he was carried up through the visible sky. Dean Farrar, however, converts the plural "heavens" (e.g., Eph. iv. 10, Hebr. iv. 14) into the singular "heaven," and then remarks that the language is necessarily "anthropomorphic," because heaven is a state, not a locality: "When we speak, therefore, of Christ's Ascension, we mean primarily that He withdrew Himself from physical manifestations to His servants on earth, in order to bestow on them that nearer, more intense, more spiritual presence," &c. (p. 545). This is, however, no ascension at all; and the author is driven to concede that "besides this belief in the Ascension, it is regarded, by many, as the termination of Christ's ministry by the visible rising from earth upwards through the air in the presence of His disciples." This belief is held "by many," of whom Dean Farrar plainly is not one, though the band includes the writers of the apostolic age. The evidence of the New Testament must, however, be faced. In the account in Luke xxiv. 51, the phrase "and was carried up into heaven" is shown by textual criticism to be an early insertion. In the Epistles, as the Dean justly remarks, "the actual rising heavenwards is nowhere narrated," but he does not see that the use of the plural "heavens" is really decisive. There remains the account at the opening of the Acts, "he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight." "If we interpret the first word in the general sense," says Dr. Farrar, "and combine it with the 'stood apart from them' of the Gospel, we might suppose that Christ simply vanished from the present of His loved ones into an overshadowing and shining cloud." But this interpretation—the thin end (very thin) of the rationalist wedge—is really rendered impossible by the language of the "two men in white apparel," who ask the disciples "Why stand ye looking up into the sky? This Jesus, which was received up from you into the sky, shall so come in like manner as ye beheld him going into the sky." These words are final, why are they not quoted? The best illustration of them is found in the language of Paul which describes the corresponding Descension of the Lord himself from Heaven with a shout, where he adds the significant words, "then we that are alive, and are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." This was, of course, written before a line of the Gospels or of the Book of Acts. It is decisive as to the meaning attached to the story in the early Church. The simple fact is that no study of the life of Jesus can hope to succeed until the atmosphere of belief and expectation in which the Gospels took their rise has been thoroughly realised. There is no trace in this book of any serious effort for this end. Those who start from the author's premises will naturally not miss it. But this method of treating the greatest of historical inquiries will only satisfy those who are convinced already.

"Les verités mystiques ne peuvent ni vieillir ni mourir. . . . Une œuvre ne vieillit qu'en proportion de son anti-mysticisme."—Maeterlinck.

Few of the long line of Bampton lecturers have had a more interesting or attractive subject than Mr. Inge. In choosing to write upon Christian Mysticism he was evidently following the bent of his own mind, but he has also shown a true instinct for seizing upon a special need and opportunity. There is on the one hand a close relation of sympathy between Christian mysticism regarded as an intellectual movement and the spiritual philosophy which has given new meaning and a modern setting to the Greek doctrine of the anima mundi. On the other hand there is a brilliant group of historical scholars, Harnack, Hermann, and others of the neo-Ritschlian school who have done their best to pour scorn upon the whole subject of mysticism as an aberration of Christian piety, an abandonment of secure historical foundations for the quicksands of self-delusion. In these circumstances a special importance attaches to a survey of the whole subject like the one before us, full as it is of fine criticism and delicate religious sympathy.

Perhaps the central fact which emerges most clearly from Mr. Inge's pages is the continuity of the mystical movement in Christian history. St. John, Origen, Meister Eckhart, Ruysbroek, the Cambridge Platonists, and Wordsworth are shown to have a deep affinity of intellectual attitude. They are the unwavering opponents of every legalist interpretation of Christianity, whether it take the form of high sacerdotal doctrine or of deistic rationalism; and they combine to teach the immanence of God in the human soul and the world as the central truth of their theology.

Many attempts have been made to classify mystics according to the particular form assumed by the rapture of thought or emotion. Mr. Inge is content with one broad and very suggestive division. On the one side are those who regard the whole world of sensible objects as a barrier placed between the soul and God. The way of perfection consists in escaping from all images and sensible forms till the impassioned soul in its upward flight loses itself in the formless and viewless light of God. The secrets of such a life are all within. The beauty of Nature has no ministry for it, and it regards the witness of the Church and its daily multiplied grace with the indifference of those who have other bread to eat. It is the feeling which Coleridge has put into the following lines:—

It were a vain endeavour,
Though I should gaze for ever
On that green light that lingers in the West;
I may not hope from outward forms to win
The passion and the life whose fountains are within.

Mr. Inge has some good and discriminating criticism of this attitude of mind. He is aware of its grave dangers. He shows how it encouraged what is known as the via negativa in mystical speculation, leaving the mind with a thought of God which is simply the negation of all positive meaning, void, passionless, uncreated. He makes the suggestive observation that "nearly all that repels us in mediæval religious life — its 'other-worldliness' and passive hostility to civilisation, the emptiness of its ideal life, its maltreatment of the body, its disparagement of family life, the respect which it paid to indolent contemplation—springs from this one root." But then, with the perception of a true critic, he proceeds to point out that the negative road is not all pure error. "There is a negative side in religion, both in thought and practice. We are first impelled to seek the Infinite by the limitations of the finite, which appear to the soul as bonds and prison walls. It is natural, first, to think of the Infinite as that in which these barriers are done away. And in practice we must die daily, if our inward man is to be daily renewed."

The class of mystics to which we have just referred have often received an almost exclusive attention from students of the subject, and we are glad to find that Mr. Inge devotes so much space to the other great school, who may be aptly described as symbolists. It is they who bear such an extraordinary likeness to the great poets and spiritual thinkers of our own time. In their thought the whole world of material forms is a translucent veil through which the Divine is revealed to the pure spirit. It is not Wordsworth, or T. H. Green, but John the Scot who tells us that "every visible and invisible creature is a theophany or appearance of God." The author's own sympathy with this attitude of mind gives special interest to the two closing lectures on Nature-Mysticism and Symbolism. Like Mr. Illingworth, in his recent book on Divine Immanence, he seeks to combine his love for the sacramental system of the Church with his Platonic idealism; but in doing so he seems to us to come dangerously near to re-introducing some of the ideas of Deism, of special and limited channels of grace, of external and legal relations between the soul and God, which are abhorrent to the thought of the true mystic. The truth is that the mystic of whatever school, even when he is a strict conformist to ecclesiastical rule, is little influenced by history or historical revelation. He is the extreme instance of the individualist in religion. He can tell us what he has felt of the everlasting reality of God, but his witness is only valid for other men in so far as they feel the same. This forms but an uncertain foundation for a common loyalty, or even for the fellowship of common worship. "Mystics," it has been finely said, "arise in every church and form none." We accordingly agree with Mr. Inge when he says that "every religion must have an institutional, as well as a mystical, element." The neo-Ritschlian with his contempt for the mystic is self-exiled from one of the great sources of religious renewal; but the teacher who relies entirely on the intuitions of the solitary soul may be in no less danger of mistaking the part for the whole. Christianity needs the entire range of human need and experience in the life of the individual and the church for its manifestation of the perfect Son of God.

Perhaps, after all, the chief contribution of the mystic to our common Christianity has been not what he has discovered, but the way in which he has discovered it. It has been his part to brace the mind for severe thought and high contemplation, and by the discipline of restraint to give depth and inwardness to the affections. He may not be able to make us sharers of his vision, but he can at least teach us the method and spirit in which every divine quest must be undertaken. The writings of the mystics in all their central and most durable parts have aimed at showing how the single eye and the pure heart, "the vision and the faculty divine," may be won. It is their peculiar office to recall us to the practice of holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JAMES HARROP.

For more than thirty years a faithful minister to the poor in Manchester, Mr. Harrop had retired in 1893 from active service, and on Wednesday, July 18, entered into his final rest. A native of Macclesfield, he was born March 15, 1824, and was educated for the ministry at the Home Missionary Board, entering in 1859 upon his life work in Manchester. A Domestic Mission had already been established in that city for more than twenty years, and Mr. Harrop established a second centre of activity, which, in 1868, found a home in Embden-street, and fifteen years later removed to the present Mission buildings in Renshaw-street. The record of Mr. Harrop's devoted ministry is in the lives of the people among whom he laboured for so many years. Only failure of powers led to his relinquishment of that work, the memory of which is still warmly cherished by many friends.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Imitation of Christ.

Regard not much who is for thee, or against thee; but mind what thou art about, and take care that God may be with thee in everything thou doest.

Have a good conscience, and God will well defend thee. For whom God will help no man's perverseness shall be able to hurt.

If thou canst be silent and suffer, without doubt thou shalt see that the Lord will help thee. He knoweth the time and manner how to deliver thee, and therefore thou oughtest to resign thyself to Him. It belongs to God to help and deliver from all confusion.

It is often very profitable, to keep us more humble, that others know and rebuke our faults. When a man humbleth himself for his failings, then he easily pacifieth others and quickly satisfieth those that are offended with him.

God protecteth the humble and delivereth him; the humble He loveth and comforteth; unto the humble man He inclineth Himself; unto the humble He giveth great grace; and after his humiliation He raiseth him to glory. Unto the humble He revealeth His secrets, and sweetly draweth and inviteth him unto Himself.

The humble person, though he suffer confusion, is yet tolerably well in peace; for that he resteth on God, and not on the world.

Be careful to avoid with great diligence those things in thyself which do commonly displease thee in others.

Gather some profit to thy soul whereso-ever thou art, so as if thou seest or hearest of any good examples stir up thy-self to the imitation thereof. But if thou observe anything worthy of reproof beware thou do not the same. And if at any time thou hast done it, labour quickly to amend thyself. As thine eye observeth others so art thou also noted again by others.

O how sweet and pleasant a thing it is to see brethren fervent and devout, well-mannered and well-disciplined! And on the contrary, how sad and grievous a thing it is to see them live in a dissolute and disordered sort, not applying themselves to that for which they are called! How hurtful a thing it is when they neglect the good purposes of their voca-tion, and busy themselves in that which is not committed to their care!

Remember always thy end, and how that time lost never returns. Without care and diligence thou shalt never get virtue. If thou begin to wax lukewarm, it will begin to be evil with thee. But if thou give thyself to fervour, thou shalt find much peace, and feel less labour, through the assistance of God's grace and the love of virtue. The fervent and diligent man is prepared for all things.

The wearing of a monk's habit, and shaving of the crown, do little profit; but change of manners and perfect mortifica-tion of passions make a true religious man.

Thou camest to serve, not to rule. Know that thou wast called to suffer and to labour, not to be idle or to spend thy time in talk.

Here, therefore, men are proved as gold in the furnace. Here no man can stand, unless he humble himself with his whole heart for the love of God.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Pilgrimage to Oberammergau.—II.

We left our five pilgrims last week just in sight of the village of Oberammergau. Imagine that you have joined the party, and that you have climbed up from the lower valley in which the small village of Oberau—which we may call "Overton"—lies. A stiff climb up it is, but we are amply rewarded for the trouble by the magnificent view that bursts on our sight. We pass from a narrow ravine into a broad expanse of valley, with high walls of mountains on each side of us, and in front, at the end of the plain, dim distant hills. To our left stands out erect and steep, crowned with a metal-covered cross, the pointed rock of the Kofel, like a sentinel keeping watch and ward over the village of Oberammergau, whose church tower, surmounted by a chocolate-coloured spire, for all the world like a huge onion bulb, soon comes into view. We cross the clear noisy stream of the Ammer, which rushes along its stony bed behind the village street, and are at once in the village itself.

The sun is shining brightly, and the pure white walls of the houses would be quite dazzling were it not for the green shutters thrown back on each side of the windows, and the paintings on the walls themselves. Most picturesque is the appearance of the village street, so different from what we see in an English village. The houses are large compared with English cottages, the sides or gable ends are to the front, and very often they are built askew, not on a line with the street. The patches of pure whitewash on the walls are filled in with brightly coloured pictures of scenes from the Old and New Testaments, or from lives of saints, and the cleanliness is wonderful. It is along a street of such houses—most quaint and beautiful—that we pass in search of that which is to be our house of shelter. These large houses, looking more like town houses than village cottages, often shelter several homes, and in order to give board and bed to the thousands of visitors who come each week-end to see the play, every cottager and house-owner puts at the disposal of the village autho-rities all the available space he has.

As we pass along we cannot help notic-ing that the boys and men, in large numbers, wear their hair long, falling down to their shoulders; that means that the owners of the flowing locks either are or hope to be some time or other players in the Passion Play. That is the great ambition of all—men, women, and children—some time in their lives to take a part in the wonderful performance. I do not think we were much struck by the beauty of the faces of the little children, but there was an earnestness in the tanned features and blue eyes which was very pleasant to look upon, and the long hair of all shades of brown gave an unusually tender and gentle expression to the little boys.

The play takes place during only six months of every tenth year, and another six months are taken up in preparation for it, and the rest of the nine years the actors who are all taken altogether from the villagers go on with their ordinary work. They have field work to do, in which both men and women join; but the chief work in the village is wood-carving, and for this they are famous. Wood-carving of all sorts is to be seen in the shop windows, from the elaborate wood work for churches and public buildings to the ornamental match-boxes and little crucifixes. And to keep up the beauty and skill of the village work there is a very excellent drawing and pattern-making school. It is not a village of rich people; they have few wants, and the ways in which they can spend their money are few too.

I said just now that the Passion Play was played entirely by the villagers them-selves; no grand town actors are brought in; and there is hardly a household to-day but has either a member engaged in the play in some part or other, or can speak of what they or their fathers have done in the plays of former years.

Only every tenth year is the play per-formed. What changes must take place in the interval between one performance and another! What gaps and changes in the last list of performers would there not be if the roll-call were read over after a ten years' interval! And what changes in these who answered to their names! Those who had been acting as little children would then be young men and young women!

As soon as the year's Passion Play is over the villagers go back to their ordi-nary work, but the boys and men still keep their long hair, so as to be able to take part again at the end of the next ten years, and the little children all grow up with the next performance in view, hoping they may have their hearts' desire fulfilled of taking their part some day or other.

About 400 actors are wanted altogether; 200 of these are children, and selection has to be made out of the 2,000 inhabit-ants. The day when their selection is made is a most important day in the life of the village. A village committee is appointed to take the matter into con-sideration and settle the fitness of each person for his part. On a day in December the final selection is made—after the com-mittee have attended service in the parish church. The decision come to brings joy or disappointment to many a household. The disappointment is soon forgotten, how-ever, or at any rate is not allowed to spoil the willingness to help, and the whole village works together to make the play the best offering of thanks they can for the salvation of the village from the awful plague. When the parts are chosen, working for the play occupies the atten-tion of the whole village. The parts have to be learned, rehearsal after rehearsal of both actors and music is held, and the new dresses are cut out and then taken home to be made up in the winter evenings. Everything must be ready and perfect by Whitsunday, when the first performance takes place. The perfection to which everything is brought, even the acting of the little children in the crowds, shows what care and attention were given by all to the rehearsals.

We found our way along the long street, and through the open space in front of the Post Office, which seems to be the centre of Oberammergau life, to our shelter, which was in the house of one whom the next day we saw on the stage in the character of a Merchant in the Temple. But before settling in for the night we will look round the little village. We see over the shops names of those who are to take part in the play; and through the window of a shop full of wood-carving, which has the name "Peter Rendl" over it, we recognise the fine-cut, thoughtful features of to-morrow's "John."

About half a mile from the village, on rising ground overlooking it, is a large life-sized marble group of the Crucifixion: an object of deep veneration to all the faithful who come to Oberammergau, as well as to the villagers. It is a lovely piece of sculpture—Christ on the Cross, with his beloved disciple John on one side, and his mother on the other; and beneath the foot of the Cross are, in German words, the two sentences which are known to us as: "Woman, behold thy Son," "Son, behold thy mother."

With hearts made serious by the beauty of the evening, the loveliness of the landscape, and the tenderness which the Crucifixion threw over us and all around us, we go back to the village and see the little unpretentious out-of-the-way Bava-rian hamlet, with its street and little open squares, full of folk from all parts of the world, as various in look and dress as in language, all excited by the fulfilled joy of being there, and looking forward, full of wondering hope, to the early wakening on the morrow and the Play that is to be.

FIRST AS CURATE.

THE interest both of ministers and congregations is closely concerned with the question as to the way by which a young man dedicated to the ministry of religion may best enter upon the practical work of his life. The usual way at present, not because it is clearly recognised as best, but because of necessity it has become the custom, is for a young man, on the completion of his college course, to be invited to the charge of a congregation as sole responsible minister. On the other hand, it has often been urged that it would be far better for a young man, and for any congregation to which he is to minister, that he should first have some practical training, in addition to the theoretical instruction received at college, before he is left with so grave a responsibility on his hands.

To secure this advantage more than one method has been occasionally adopted, when circumstances have been specially favourable, in our religious community. The most obvious is the method of the Church of England, by which curates share in the work of a parish under the guidance of their vicar. The late JOHN JAMES TAYLER was, we believe, strongly of opinion that this should, as far as possible, be the practice among our churches, and it has occasionally been followed with the happiest results, as most recently at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, where at present a second Manchester College student has entered upon a share of the growing work of that congregation as assistant to the Rev. C. J. STREET. The understanding is that there shall be successive appointments, and only for a short, definite period, at the end of which the young minister will be ready, with fuller equipment, to enter upon the sole charge of a church. Thus the congregation is enabled to render completer service, while a great benefit is conferred upon the young man who has such an opportunity of completer training.

In this connection it should be noted that the idea is not to afford support to the failing powers of an aged minister, to fill up the measure of work which by degrees he is obliged to leave undone, although the appointment of an assistant or second minister under such circumstances is fully justified, and may lead to very happy relations between the senior and junior ministers, and with most fruitful results; but the idea of the curacy for men coming from college is not to supply what is lacking through the inevitable waning of strength in the senior; it is rather to add to the full strength of a man in his prime additional energies by which the work of the Church may be extended and more be accomplished than is possible for one man by himself, while the added energies are used under the direction of his riper experience and with his sympathetic encouragement.

A somewhat different plan, though of similar advantages, is that which has been advocated by Mr. WILLIAM RATHBONE, and by his generosity more than once put into practice. By this plan a student coming from college is appointed to work in connection with an established city congregation, and at the same time at one of the Domestic Missions. Thus he has the advantage of being brought at once face to face with the fundamental social problems of our day and with Christian ministry in its most primitive form, while at the same time he gains experience of the work of a large and fully-organised congregation under the guidance of his senior.

As a third variety of method it has also been suggested that an appointment simply at a Domestic Mission is the best introduction to the work of the ministry; but unless the appointment was as assistant to an elder minister of ripe experience, it would hardly meet the difficulty which is so widely felt, and for which a remedy is sought.

We have been led to take this question up by the letter of a correspondent who does not wish to speak personally in these columns, but from the layman's point of view is strongly impressed with the importance of the subject. Our correspondent advocates the curate system, and for the following reasons :—

That a young man before entering on the full responsibilities of his office should have come in contact with some of its duties under the direction of a chief who has already experience to guide him, and who in the full vigour of his powers has initiative and judgment sufficient to cover a large field of work, must surely be favourable to the natural and steady development of the young man's capacities; while the probable surroundings to be found in a large town would give some opportunities of gaining a wider knowledge of men and life.

Then as to the effect of the plan on the congregation adopting it: the amount and range of work the minister of experience could accomplish, if assisted by one or two trained lieutenants, would, in many places, be immensely increased; much digging and preparing of the ground, as well as the sowing of good seed is required, and one pair of hands can scarcely do both fully, in an important congregation.

The greater number of our ministers being without curates may be withheld by a feeling of delicacy from publicly advocating their introduction, though admitting in private their advisability. We shall be specially indebted to the few having curates, and therefore free to speak, and who moreover can speak from experience, if they will give in detail their views on the matter.

To laymen I would appeal to consider the question in the light of analogy. Is there any other important calling on the full responsibilities of which a man enters straight from college?

We have heard much lately of the reluctance of well-to-do fathers and mothers to allow their sons to enter the ministry. A portion of this reluctance may be due to a consciousness of what a young man who has entered the ministry must generally face for the first few years, including as it does the strain of a serious and sole responsibility, and an isolation of an extreme kind, which added to the difficulties of inexperience must, for the average man, make the risk of discouragement and failure great.

We shall be glad if these suggestions lead to some further discussion of the subject. When, in one or two instances, it is seen what can be thus accomplished of better and completer service, it may well be that other of our stronger churches will grasp their opportunity, not only of extending their own operations, but of conferring a very real benefit upon our whole community by furnishing the means required, so that every student leaving college may have the way opened to him for such an entrance upon the practical work of ministry. A complete system of curacies is, of course, not to be thought of at present; there must be a gradual development with the growing life of our community, which will bring, not only the will to serve, but more abundant means to sustain the work. But as the advantage becomes more and more apparent in those churches where it is at once practicable, there can be little doubt that the fire of fresh zeal thus kindled will find material in an ever-widening field.

WE prepare ourselves for sudden deeds by the reiterated choice of good or evil that gradually determines character.—George Eliot.

WANTED, MEN AND WOMEN.*—II.

BY JAMES L. HAIGH.

We are constantly making one great mistake, as it seems to me. We are too fond of speaking of the glory of the past and the wretchedness of the present. The giants lived in olden times, the dwarfs are with us now. We are caught in a mesh of commercialism, and there is no escape, we are told. Mighty science has the masterhood, and everything is held by bold utility with brazen hand. Our old-fashioned towns and villages have almost passed away. We have cycles and motor-cars, railways and electric trams, huge advertisements, and ugliness on every hand. We are too fond of tennis and football; we indulge in too much laziness in our leisure, and too much utter foolishness in our pleasure, and there is no health in us or about us. So the indictment runs. But worse than this. We have no great poets, no great preachers, no great prophets now. They are dead and gone, and we are left to grope along in the twilight of our poor mediocrity. The children are not quite the same as we were in the days of our innocency: the boys and girls are too precocious: youths and maidens become men and women long before their time. And, saddest thing of all, we have no reverence left: our chivalry has gone: our moral tone and temper have departed. If I believed all this I would say at once: "Then it's about time we were all buried; for we are dead." But I don't believe it. This age is the best we have personally known, and when we are alive it is full of beauty, interest, and divine possibility. The men who have influenced me most are men like the ship's doctor—men who have given themselves up to the doing of some little bit of good; men who have not simply attempted to look big upon the platform of pessimism, but men who have said, "Act, act in the living present, Heart within and God o'erhead." We have these now: God will provide the genius in His own good time. To these pessimists I would say: you yourselves do not show enough reverence for the times in which you live, for the possibilities of God wrapped in the commonplace swaddling clothes of the present. Where will the next poet or prophet come from, think you? The next prophet may be that pale-faced boy in your infant class, and you have not even spoken to him yet: the next Nazareth, this ugly city in which you are compelled to pass your heavy days. Our earnest expectation and hope is ever with the young, and they are always with us.

My practical plea, therefore, is this: we want living men for teachers—young fellows who can play cricket and football and who hate deceit as they hate poison. And big, tender-hearted men with that indefinable delicacy which adds so much to true dignity. And we want to keep them faithful to the work. The biggest and the best men I ever came across are the ones who can do anything without looking clumsy. They are the ones who can even carry a baby without making it cry, and enjoy a game of rounders in such a way as to win the approval of the youngsters. The weakest men I ever came across are those who scorn cricket, look with contempt upon football, and turn the point of every pin the wrong way to the discomfort of the baby when they attempt to carry it. They sometimes try to quote Herbert Spencer. They like to make you think that they love to meander in a mazy motion through the groves of mediæval philosophy, and talk about the idiosyncracies of the psychological temperament, much to their own mystification and the muddlement of the man in the street. These may be more or less ornamental in a meeting of degenerates; but to find salvation they must step down from that platform. They can never make successful Sunday-school teachers in that mood, and they certainly never find the Sunday-school the ideal nursery ground for the spread of their "philosophy."

Sunday-school is the place for sterling, sanctified commonsense, and the humanities. Integrity always finds itself at home there. The reward is in the work itself. I never came across an earnest Sunday-school teacher yet who could be called a fool in the worldly sense, and never one who was sorry for the time he had spent in the place. In the spiritual sense his gain is a gain to the glory of God: in that there is always gladness.

Sunday-school teachers are ever kept in a state of sanity and clearness of vision. Why? Because their scholars force them to hold closely to the simplicities of life—and in these are salvation. The ten commandants are not dead—we need them every day—and the two great commandments have had such life poured into them that they must live for ever. Pity, humour, honesty, trust in God are always edifying. Rectitude and right-mindedness are always wanted in the Sunday-school—and these ever make daily duty a pleasure, and even put a halo round the head of common drudgery.

"Is this work worth doing?" some who have never attempted it may ask. I answer "Yes, it's the best possible work any man or woman could undertake." You hesitate about trying it. Remember what the doctor said: "The greatest sin in the world is not to try." There are so many of these little ones—ay, and youths and maidens—growing up like "potatoes in a cellar." The good strong men and women of the Sunday-school want to bring them out of darkness into light, and make them like trees planted by the streams of water. But we need more help, more practical sympathy. We want more comrades to work with us shoulder to shoulder. Nearly all our Sunday-schools are hungering and thirsting for the life and inspiration of healthy men and women. We cry for the fresh breeze of new vigour and energy, the delight of self-sacrifice, the courage of sanity, the simplicity of straightforwardness. We want the steady hand of the strong man to be pressed in loving kindness upon the shoulder of the restless city lad, to make him look with steadfast eyes towards the man he ought to be and can be with the help of God. There is nothing in the wide world that touches me more than a sight like that—because there is nothing holier than the holiness of helpfulness.

Men and women belonging to the Church of Humanity, the Church of the Divine Love, must take to heart that cry of the good doctor, "The greatest sin in the world is not to try." The world needs constant personal help, devoted service in all efforts for the redemption of mankind, Yes, and I would say the salvation of England needs it. Tolstoy may expose the wretchedness of Russian society: some stern prophets would say we are no better in this happy land of ours. But we have one way of salvation—and I know none better. It goes to the root of the question. Our Sunday-school, if properly equipped and worked, if made to hum with the fire of human enthusiasm, the radiance of the heart red-hot with the passion of high sincerity and true devotion—our Sunday-school, if the noble men and women of England would but give themselves up mind and soul to the duties awaiting them, would prove one of the chief means of our salvation to the end of time. Platform patriotism is cheap and lasts but for a day; God's patriotism lasts for ever, founded on eternal love. Are the members—the living men and women, the gentlemen and gentlewomen of our churches, doing their duty—doing all that their own clear consciences demand—in this great question of the welfare of our Sunday-schools? Can our schools fare well when so many life-giving men and women remain religiously outside their portals?

Does it not sometimes happen that we are impressed with the thought—which we cannot, even with the help of all our charity, quite shake off—that too many of our churches are simply taken up with the infatuation of their own salvation or position? What is a successful church? Here is the picture of one given to me a few weeks ago. We were on the bank of a noble river in the north. Between the trees of a pretty park we saw the stream in all its summer glory shining in the sunlight. Across the river, beneath a heavy cloud of smoke, lies a huge city ugly as sin. Near to the largest chimney, perpetual in its vomiting of all things foul, is a spot I know too well—a dark, unwholesome spot, crowded with narrow courts and back streets, cellars, garrets and hovels hideous to behold, among which to dwell would be a hell on earth for most of us. A sluggish canal crawls along its wretched way parallel with the main thoroughfare, into which huge sugar refineries, distilleries and chemical works pour their surplus steam and waste water, in which the boys delight to bathe—if the policeman on the beat is only lazy enough to leave them alone. Even the novelty of disturbance is something in this stagnant land and may lead to an adventure. But generally the young people are left severely alone—to work out their own salvation, or fall deeper into damnation, at their own sweet will and pleasure. The place is always as heavy as lead; the lives of the people dull as ditch-water. Now the gentleman who accompanied me that day enthusiastically pointed out the many improvements on his side of the river: the new magnificent promenade, the pretty wayside park, the peeps between the trees, the noble stream, the great ocean-going steamers turning with the tide, and all the beauty of the summer sky. But my gaze rested chiefly on that heavy cloud of smoke. Why should there be such a contrast between the two banks? Why? why?

And then my companion spoke of his church, a handsome new building of which all the members were very proud; and I thought of a miserable mission more like a disused mill or warehouse than anything else. The members were highly intelligent, they appreciated the careful, eloquent, learned sermons they received from their minister week after week. They were not over-rich, but highly respectable shopkeepers, bankers and business men, with here and there a man of ampler means among them who thereby raised the happy average and made them blessed. They were delighted with their respectability. The fates had looked upon them with most favouring eyes. They enjoyed the pleasures of each other's society, they helped to establish one another in good ways, by many pleasant occasions of social intercourse among themselves, particularly during the long winter months. He drew the picture with a clear, firm touch, and made me see how thoroughly enjoyable such a life ought to be. It was almost idealistic in its beauty, a dream of what a successful church might do and be, a church of a certain character. Not my church, not yours perhaps, but still the church of the accomplished fact. It answered its purpose: God keep it clean in its respectability! But across the stream there rests the heavy cloud by night and day, and I for one had to ferry myself back from Paradise to Hades to dwell with the shades and never lose heart of hope. The song of the obscure missionary must be a glad one even in the night of his blackest despair:

Come, Kingdom of our God!
Sweet reign of light and love!
Shed peace, and hope, and joy abroad,
And wisdom from above.

Light, love, peace, hope, joy, wisdom, for whom? If for anybody, then for these poor brothers and sisters, who dwell in the dark grimy places of this Christian land, in which they cannot enjoy any social intercourse of helpfulness, surrounded as they are by the hell of ugliness and sin. And so, while my companion spoke of the beauty of the effort that entranced his thought, I remained grimly silent. Alas! we differ so widely in our ideals, and some of us are never satisfied. The members of my ideal church are not the ones who rest content upon the bright beautiful bank of the stream of their own salvation, nor are they the ones who are always finding fault with our flatness, our dulness, our deadness. They are men and women whose souls are often filled to overflowing with the bitterness of divine discontent—a medicine given for the healing of the nations—until all the dark places are open to the light of day and the sunshine of innocent gladness. Their song is "Come, labour on." Can the ideal church ever forget the children, the youths and maidens of the "slums"—who are crying for they know not what, and with no language but a cry? We know their need. They are struggling like potatoes in a cellar, struggling toward the light, the air, the sunshine. We want these good men and women to cross the river and help us—to come down from their platform of respectability and use the healing touch of brotherhood. Ought any suburban church to be allowed to sleep secure in its own happiness when a great restless city lies so near with its dens of infamy, its neglected masses, its waifs and strays, flotsam and jetsam of society waiting to be redeemed?

We don't want to be hypocrites; but most of us here do honestly say this: We have no ambition to be either a member or a minister of a suburban church bent simply on its own salvation. How can we persuade these shopkeepers, bankers, business men to come over and help us? We want them. They are good-hearted men on the whole; their wives and sisters are clothed in sweet womanliness. What made them? They are not entirely "self-made." Had they no friend to help them in their days of struggle—no good teacher to give them counsel; to take their hand, to steady their nerves—perhaps even to lift them out of the cellar in which they were groping for the light, into the green pastures of prosperity and the knowledge of the Lord? If they had, then by the memory of their great devoted friend, now dead and gone, we call upon them for their help and sympathy, their manhood and womanhood, their strength and sweetness.

Isn't it an inspiring sight to see a good man among a band of happy boys—to see a good woman on the seashore with a crowd of city urchins pressing round her? That sight always grips us; we are constrained to watch, and make a song of thanksgiving to ourselves in praise of the goodness of the human heart. Everybody stops before that altar and offers worship there. I've overheard the roughest seaman on the sand say to himself "God bless her!", while he chuckled at the original antics of the youngsters. Every woman is sacred as she stands in the centre of a ring of children; every man is dignified when he makes himself one with a band of boys.

We talk about our true democracy; how can we get it unless we make ourselves one with the weakest and the poorest—unless we are eager to take them into the atmosphere of the best and brightest that we have in our possession? "He grew up like a potato in a cellar" is one of the keenest reproaches against our so-called Christianity. That will be made impossible immediately we see our duty and do it.

Oh that these good men and women, members of our successful churches, could be made to see their duty, and forego the pleasure of their Sunday afternoon slumbers, concerts and promenades, for the sake of our common cause. Subscriptions are good; to take the chair at a concert, or open a bazaar, is a pleasant function, and happy is the man who can do it with a big result. But is that all? We think not. We want these men themselves; we want them to come into personal contact with the most important part of our labours, the many institutions connected with our Sunday-school—our cricket clubs, ramblers' clubs, social gatherings of all sorts—and chiefly with the Sunday-school itself. We talk about our elder scholars feeding the church: good, I haven't a word to say against it; but who is going to see that the Sunday-school is properly nourished? True life, if it means anything, means quick and large reciprocity—big, generous wholesome sympathy. Let the shopkeepers, bankers, business men, be eager and willing to come and have a chat with our elder lads, take a class when wanted, occupy the superintendent's place occasionally—or always, would be better—go with the scholars on their excursions and Saturday rambles, and there would be no need for the minister to urge the members of his senior class to join the church. Boys are very quick in their judgments—too quick sometimes, we think. When they say "Mr. So-and-so is the right sort of man," they give all their votes in his favour—they plump for him at once. His church is their church, and the minister is a happy man.

The superintendent of every Sunday-school should be in the proud position not only of having a working staff of teachers, he should have a reserve force on whom he can call at any moment: men and women who are ready to step off the platform of their theories, their respectability, their philosophies, from the pulpit of their beautiful platitude and poetical commonplace, their socialism and Homerism—step down into the arena of simple things, and do them willingly and graciously for the children's sake. Men and women are needed in order to transplant these struggling lives into a fairer atmosphere, to protect and nourish them by the power of human fellowship. Boys and girls, youths and maidens want to be taught how to grow up clean in thought and word and deed; and to do this they must be brought into the large, cheerful presence of honest, whole-hearted men and women who know life and enjoy it in all its fulness and beauty. There they are, these little ones, sick, hungry, thirsty, in the prison-house of ignorance; their restless eyes need the steadying power of a glad, earnest will to fill them with interest, and make them dream of high and holy things. To those who strive in any way to do this noble work there comes at some time or other their large recompense in the old sweet words: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me."

UNITARIAN AND TRINITARIAN.

Sir,—I read with much interest the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon for Trinity Sunday in your issue of June 16, in which he replies to my Eirenicon. With a view to further understanding, I should like to point out where Mr. Armstrong has failed to interpret me rightly, and where, on the other hand, real differences would seem to exist.

(1.) In the first place, in my essay I was avowedly treating a question theologically. For my own part I clearly distinguish theology and religion. Therefore, Mr. Armstrong's protest that "Religion is not a matter of balancing ones and threes; it is a matter of touch of the human soul with the living God," true enough in itself, is, I submit, not relevant. I can understand a man wishing to abolish theology from the domain of Christianity, but I distinctly invited discussion of a question in theology; I regret, therefore, the rhetorical outburst, in which Mr. Armstrong indulges, as unsuited to the subject matter.

(2.) I do not allow that my exposition of the doctrine of the Trinity "is a mere attempt to pour the new wine of present-day religion into the old wine skins of the Trinitarian formula." On the other hand, my interpretation is, I believe, the meaning and clear teaching of Athanasius and other early Greek fathers. Orthodoxy is not always the same as the popular understanding of orthodoxy. Let me add that I do not stand by the Nicene Creed because it was decreed by a Church Council, but because it has served, and, in my opinion, yet serves. To quote the words of Dr. T. K. Cheyne to me: "As a theologian I cannot, indeed, assert that I am willing to pledge myself to the 'Greek theology.' That theology came, it is clear, from the pre-critical period. But it has the germ of the theology which will one day arise and will satisfy alike the historical critic, the speculative philosopher, and the practical lay-member of the greater Christian Church."

(3.) A statement on which Mr. Armstrong bases the greater part of his instruction is "the only attribute which distinguishes the First Person is that of Maker of all things." There is here a serious misunderstanding, which I regret because it has led Mr. Armstrong off on a wrong line. The statement is a quotation. But it is evident that Dr. Martineau was referring to the Apostles' Creed. The statement is correct so far as the Apostles' Creed is concerned, and I could not but assent to the statement; but it would be a grave mistake to suppose that I acquiesced in that statement as fully representing the Christian faith. I had pointed out that the Apostles' or Western Creed was compatible with any form of Arianism, and had drawn a wide distinction. The orthodox doctrine of the Trinity is contained in the Nicene or Greek Creed. In the statement of this Creed the "Father" connotes much more. He is no longer the Maker of all things only, the remote inaccessible element of God. Here the "Father" has meaning only in relation to the "Son." They are correlative terms and ideas. The declaration is that in the one God is embraced all that is contained in the symbols Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

(4.) Another serious misunderstanding follows. I said, "When Christ is followed as a teacher, and God is worshipped," &c. The whole purport of the remark is that Christians cannot worship God apart from Christ, that one must include the Son together with the Father and the Holy Spirit in one's worship of the one God. I may illustrate my meaning by the teaching of Dr. Martineau, quoted by the Rev. Edwin Odgers in your issue of the same date in his address, "Dr. Martineau and Unitarian Christianity":—"To regard Christ as Moral Ideal may be to relapse, ethically, into Arianism. Conceive a being imposed as a pattern by God, which may be in the last resort only an economy for teaching us morals; made to set a copy for man, but perchance neither human nor divine." It is from such Arianism, and possible relapse into polytheism, that the Athanasian doctrine saved, I believe, the Christian world.

What Mr. Armstrong would call the pure Religion of Jesus in his teaching respecting his heavenly Father, I should be disposed to distinguish rather as the theology of the Synoptics. Mr. Armstrong may think to separate the pure religion of Jesus from theology, but he cannot, I think, and does not, so it would seem, separate the true knowledge of God from the personality of Christ. The symbol of "Father" does not by itself indicate the contents of the Christian faith. Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, have all believed in an Omnipotent Father. The Father is distinguished with us as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Father is known only in the Son, and the symbol has no meaning except in relation to the Son. "Neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him." Thus Dr. Martineau taught that "The Supreme revelation is not in the precept, but in the mind of Christ; we know God through him, not from what he tells us so much as from what he was." We know the Father in the Son. And so it seems to me that what Dr. Martineau said is true—namely, that the object of the worship of Unitarians is above all the Son, though they worship him under the symbol of Father; and that to them the Father is, as Starr King called God, "an infinite Christ." Thus Unitarians cannot afford, it seems to me, to deny the value of the formula of the orthodox creed, which simply guards this great truth—that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are necessary to complete the idea of God revealed in Christ, and that the Holy Spirit with the Father and the Son must be at one and the same time worshipped in our worship of the one only true God.

What Mr. Armstrong seems to me to fail sufficiently to note is that "Father" is, after all, only a symbol, and is as inadequate as any other symbol of God. We have but to ask ourselves a few simple questions to perceive at once the symbolical character of our language. God is Father; but why Father alone and not Mother? and if God has a Son, why a Son and not a daughter? The orthodox formula of the worship of the One God under the symbols of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, presents to the mind of Christendom a more complete and truer idea of the object of Christian worship than the symbol of "Father" alone. Is it not the fact, in the history of the Christian Church, that when the Athanasian doctrine was hidden beneath a superinduced Latinism, the Father, separated from the Son in Christian thought and worship, was relegated to a distant throne, and the Son became the Saviour of men from the wrath of the Father? is it not true that, in a former age, Unitarianism itself has degenerated into Deism, and men really abandoned the worship of God, and came to worship Christ apart from God, acquiescing practically in the later verdict of J. S. Mill, that the Christ of the Gospels is an infinitely higher and nobler being than the author of Creation?

There is a real difference between us, but it is not, I think, so much in the substance of our Creed. It is rather a difference as to the place of theology in the Christian Church, and the value of the traditional formula. (1) Mr. Armstrong appears to me to be impatient of theology altogether. To me, on the other hand, it seems that, estimated at its lowest function, and recognised always as symbolical and relative only, theology fulfils a providential part in our spiritual education. (2) Mr. Armstrong throws scorn on the formula, because he thinks he has reached a serene height, where he can dispense with the earthly symbol. To me the ancient formula always deserves some respect, just because it has served so long the life of Christian people. Evolution, not Revolution, is the secret. We want the patience of God. We must carry the people along with us. The influence of Unitarians extends, I know, far beyond the limits of their denomination. But, cut off from the tradition of the larger Christian fellowship, they have failed confessedly to take the people along with them. The large number of Christians continue to think under the formula of the Trinity and will, in my belief, continue to do so, because they feel that, after all, it represents a fuller, more comprehensive, and more adequate interpretation of the common faith, as it is unfolded within the pages of the whole New Testament Scriptures. CHARLES E. BEEBY.

Yardley Wood, July 21.

THE ENTHUSIASM OF PREACHING.

THE Rev. Charles E. St. John, the newly-appointed Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, has published in the Christian Register of July 5, a very earnest address to his "Comrades in a Noble Work," of which the following are the concluding passages:—

"By faith we know that, in so far as the Unitarian cause incorporates helpful truth, it will thrive under the guidance of God; but by hope we see our own responsibility in so great a cause, and understand that God's work waits for our willing aid. Though our cause succeed, though liberal and great religious conviction go sweeping over the land, softening the iron creeds, and bringing many souls to the tenderer thoughts of God and the braver ideals of life, all this will be nothing personal to us unless we personally help.

"It is, therefore, in no narrowness of spirit that we add the hope of personal service to the faith in God's achievements upon men. We rejoice, and shall more and more nobly rejoice, to hear our doctrines and ideals resounding under other names throughout the world. But we still have our peculiar opportunities, our especial strength, our own ways, methods, words, and light; and there need be no limit to our hopes of usefulness. We bid God-speed to all sincere endeavour, and at the same time we keep the field in the service of the Christian motive and the Christian life.

"The real aim of the Christian Church is the upbuilding of noble character, and there are none who state this aim as distinctly as ourselves. Yet there are many who succeed in it as well as we do. Often we are surpassed in this service of helpfulness by those whose equipment for it is far inferior to ours. When this is the case, it is because we are deficient in zeal. A splendid preaching enthusiasm is absolutely essential for the success of any church. One denomination takes a creed which seems to us heartless, and makes it a widely influential power of righteousness. Another proclaims a philosophy of life, of health and disease, which we see to be inadequate as philosophy, but which we also see to be productive of sound character in renovated bodies. The secret of it all is enthusiasm in preaching and working for the faith, No matter how poor, how illogical, how short-lived the faith, if it is magnificently proclaimed, that white heat of its advocate's moral earnestness will make of it a force that does good to many souls.

"How vast, then, the uplift of moral energy that will bless the world when at last the whole truth, the glowing truth, the intelligible theology, and heart-satisfying religion of our 'Fatherhood of God, brotherhood of man, leadership of Jesus, salvation by character, and eternal progress of all souls,' are presented to mankind with a preaching zeal that is commensurate with their possibilities of helpfulness! The better, tenderer, more reasonable a religion, the more power of moral guidance it contains, provided it has a more vital expression than the merely being printed in a book. A book is a weak thing, beside a man. There are few that read serious books, as compared with the multitude that throng to hear every intensely earnest preacher. So, while we bid God-speed to our scholars, as they search after new truth, and while we shall eagerly accept all that they find, our chief concern as a Christian Church is to uplift the present generation of men by the power of the truth we already possess. For this urgent work we need more men in whom the knowledge of truth has burst out with the flame of apostolic preaching. Bigotry and superficiality are not so inseparably yoked with zeal that it must cease when they are outgrown. On the contrary, zeal is one of the permanent elements of human power; and, in all reason, it should wax more intense as men find nobler conceptions which can be used in the higher service of the race. The enthusiasm of preaching deepens steadily in all ministers that are mastered by any vital truth. Comrades, a new era of the preacher's power, the prophet's leadership, is ours, if we are competent to enter upon it; and I believe that we are. We have truth, we have ability, we have boundless opportunity. There needs only a tidal wave of zeal to make of us what we desire to be—a body of workers who are in the world not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

OBERAMMERGAU AND THE PASSION PLAY.

I have lately had the privilege of witnessing that remarkable spectacle, the Passion Play of Oberammergau, and I have been asked to record my impressions for the benefit of the readers of The Inquirer. It is a most interesting survival of mediævalism, and yet in its present form it comes down not from the Middle Ages, but only from the seventeenth century. Its origin is traced to the pious vow of the inhabitants on the occasion of a plague in 1633. The mediæval miracle plays were too often grossly irreverent and grotesque, but everything of that kind has been carefully removed, and there is now nothing whatever in the performance which can be objected to by the most fastidious. Half-a-century ago a visit to Oberammergau must have been an undertaking of considerable difficulty, for it was then a remote and inaccessible place among the mountains. Roads were bad, and railways did not exist. In 1890 the railway was opened to Oberau, six miles from Oberammergau, and a splendid new road was made at considerable expense, winding up the mountain side from the station. Now this has been superseded by the opening of a new branch railway direct to Oberammergau, which lands passengers within a few yards of the theatre. This is much more convenient, of course, but the result inevitably is to spoil the charm of the village, which lay in its primitive simplicity. The romance evaporates, the place is vulgarised. The road between the railway station and the theatre is lined with wooden stalls, hastily fitted up for the sale of photographs, picture postcards and wood carvings, or tobacco and refreshments.

It is too much like a fair or like Hampstead Heath on a Bank Holiday. The older houses are quaint and picturesque, some of them elaborately decorated with fresco paintings, but the stream of visitors continually increases from decade to decade, so that in order to provide for their accommodation many new houses have been erected which look very spick and span with their white walls and green shutters. The play begins so early in the morning that it is necessary for visitors to spend at least one night in the village; moreover, it is a rule that no ticket for the play shall be issued to any one who does not stay two nights there, or, at any rate, pay for two nights' lodgings. So on the Saturday we saw crowds pouring into the village. Train after train emptied its load at the railway-station. Some travelled by carriage, some came on bicycles, while many country people from neighbouring villages arrived in waggons. Many Roman Catholic priests were there from various countries, and a fair sprinkling of Anglican parsons. What a polyglot place it was! At the railway booking office there were notices to the effect that English, French, and Italian were spoken. Overhearing scraps of conversation one became aware by peculiarities of accent that among the English-speaking visitors some were from Ireland and some from America, while those who occupied adjacent seats to ours in the theatre were studying books of the play in Dutch. One of the things that strikes a stranger on his first arrival is to see the number of men with long hair falling down their shoulders. All the performers wear their hair long, for the use of wigs is not permitted. The population of the village is about 1,400, more than half of whom take part in the performance. We have to rise early on Sunday morning; we are awakened by the firing of guns and the ringing of bells. The villagers flock to the parish church for mass, and some of our party, who are devout Anglicans, attend an early celebration of the Holy Communion at 6 a.m. We think it suffices to get up in time for breakfast at seven. The play begins at eight o'clock and lasts until five, with an interval of an hour and a half for dinner in the middle of the day. We accept the view of the inhabitants, that the Passion Play is not a mere dramatic entertainment, but an act of worship—it is Gottesdienst, so that it is appropriate that the performances should take place on Sundays and Saints' days. The theatre was formerly open to the sky, but it is now roofed over to shelter the spectators from sun or rain. But the stage is left uncovered; it is still an open air performance; birds fly across the stage; we feel the fresh air, and the garments of the actors flutter in the breeze. The theatre is more like a railway station than anything else. The roof is supported on curved iron girders; we might fancy ourselves in St. Pancras station, with the stage at the open end, but we look out on a background of green hills and blue sky. There are no galleries, but the floor slopes down towards the stage, and the seats are arranged across the building in straight rows. The theatre holds 4,000 persons, and every seat is occupied. There is a slight buzz of conversation before the play begins, and there is some bustle and confusion when late comers take their places. There was not much to complain of in the behaviour of the audience; but there was not the absolute stillness one would like, on the assumption that the performance is a religious service. There ought to have been the same quietness and reverence as in church. There was, of course, no applause; but the audience, though more reverent than that of an ordinary theatre, was not so perfectly quiet as that of a church. Then, as in theatres everywhere, there was the great hat trouble. Many of the ladies, and most of the gentlemen, removed their hats, or wore close-fitting caps, but not all did so. Many a time when I wanted to get a clear view of some striking scene, and raised my opera-glass to my eyes, I could see nothing whatever. My view of the stage was completely blocked by the broad-brimmed hat of the lady in front. When will ladies learn to leave such hats at home or else to take them off?

After the overture by the band, the chorus, consisting of between thirty and forty men and women, march on to the stage, half coming from one side and half from the other. They all wear coronets and gorgeous robes of varied hue; it is a most artistic blending of bright colours. The leader recites a prologue, describing the scene which is to follow; then the curtains are drawn apart, revealing a tableau of some Old Testament subject, supposed to illustrate the scene from the life of Christ which comes afterwards, though the connection is not always apparent. While the tableau is on view the chorus sing, and before the scene begins they retire to their respective sides and pass out; then, as soon as the scene is over, they return once more. There is thus no pause, no waiting between the acts; all the time is filled up, which is a good thing, since there are no fewer than eighteen acts altogether. The first act represents the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, and the driving of the traders out of the temple, and the story ends with the crucifixion, resurrection and ascension. In one respect I must confess to a slight feeling of disappointment. I had heard so often that it was not like an ordinary stage play, but was a religious service; it was not acting, but reality. Perhaps I had raised my anticipations too high, but it was certainly more theatrical and less affecting than I had expected. It was acting, but it was marvellous acting. It was acting such as one might see at the best London theatres. Not only in the case of the principal characters, but in the smallest details; the grouping of the crowds, the arrangement of the tableaux, the general stage management, would do credit to the Lyceum itself. And the remarkable thing is that the actors are not professionals, they are all amateurs. They are peasants, they are wood-carvers, painters, potters, bakers, carpenters, and masons. They are all inhabitants of the little country village, no outsider being allowed to take part. The stage manager was the burgomaster or mayor of the little community, who unhappily died a few days before our visit. The actor who impersonated Judas Iscariot did his part splendidly, he was generally acknowledged to be the finest actor of all. It is to be hoped that he does not attempt to live up to his character in real life as it is said the others do. And this is one of the beautiful features of the whole play, the simple and noble lives of these poor peasants; they seem to be elevated and refined by their participation in this performance. And if it is theatrical, it is so with a very considerable difference. We do not have the late hours and the hot stifling atmosphere too frequently connected with theatrical performances. The theatre is open to the fresh air; it is cool, too cool it may be sometimes, even chilly. There is no gas, and there are no limelight effects; it all takes place in broad daylight. There is no paint and powder, no make-up of faces, no wigs or false beards and moustaches; all the performers wear their own hair. In the tableaux they all remain perfectly motionless for quite a long time. Even a dog which appears in one of them is so still that Mr. Stead in his book suggests that it was stuffed. It proved that it was alive, however, by once turning its head and yawning.

Many of the performers are new this year, among them Anton Lang, who takes the part of Christ. Josef Mayer, who took that part on the last three occasions, is now too old, and appears as speaker of the prologue. Tall, dignified and fine-looking, he makes a splendid leader of the chorus, but his long grey hair and white beard give him quite a patriarchal appearance which would not be in keeping with the part of the Christ, and so a younger man has been chosen. Anton Lang has a sweeter and more refined face than Mayer, but, perhaps, he may be wanting in strength of character, and his manner is slightly monotonous. A little more vigour in driving the traders out of the temple would have been an improvement. But further than this I cannot compare the two, not having seen Mayer's representation of the part of Christ. Of course one is familiar with the incidents and knows what is coming; otherwise, so far as the spoken words are concerned, it might have been a dumb show to me. All is said in German, and, unfortunately, my acquaintance with that language is very imperfect. But having before one the book of the words, in German and English, one can follow the play without difficulty, and even as a spectacle it is very impressive. One can realise the course of events better when seeing it represented before our eyes; it is much more vivid and lifelike.

We see Jesus driven from pillar to post, brought successively before Caiaphas, before Annas, before Herod and before Pilate. We have all the incidents in the trial duly represented, the insults heaped upon the gentle sufferer, the cruel mockery, the scourging, and the final agony of crucifixion, and it is surely a powerful moral and religious lesson. Many of the scenes are exact reproductions of well-known pictures; thus we have the Last Supper according to Leonardo da Vinci, and similarly in the case of the Crucifixion and the Descent from the Cross. It is, I think, a great advantage to have the Christ brought before us as a real living man, not like a conventional figure in a stained-glass window, with a halo round his head, but walking about like other men. In one of the tableaux Moses is represented with horns in a very conventional fashion, but the Christ has no such materialised "glory." His manner is dignified and impressive; he shows the nobility of his character, but he is purely human. And it is just the most human incidents in the story which are the most pathetic and the most moving.

They are chiefly those in which the women appear. Who can fail to be touched by the scene of the parting of Jesus and his mother? or by the scene at Bethany where Jesus is anointed by Mary? Strangely enough Mary of Bethany, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, is identified with Mary Magdalene, and appears under the latter designation in the list of persons represented. As far as I am aware, there is not the slightest evidence for this identification. The Last Supper is an impressive scene; remembering that the performers are all Roman Catholics, one cannot help contrasting this simple ceremony with the Roman Catholic version of it in the service of the Mass. The Crucifixion is terribly realistic and harrowing; it is a very lengthy scene, and forms the real conclusion to the drama. The Resurrection and Ascension are not elaborated; they are not much more than tableaux, being briefly indicated rather than acted.

After the performance was over, there was a hasty exodus and a general rush to the railway station. We were glad to escape from the crowd and think over the events of the day during the peaceful drive home in the calm and beautiful midsummer evening, for, though the morning was wet, it had cleared up and was fine for the rest of the day. Pondering the whole matter carefully, the general impression left upon my mind is that of the humanity of Christ, which seems to be specially emphasised. I am more than ever strengthened in my conviction of the Unitarian view of our Lord as a man filled with the Spirit of God, rather than as a God walking the earth in human form. Edgar Solly Anthony.

NOTES FROM DARJEELING.—IV.

Darjeeling, June 6, 1900.

Darjeeling is by no means poor in pleasant walks. The Mall, 7,000 feet high, is considered the centre. The southern portion of it, called the Chowrasta, or "meeting of four roads," is the chief promenade. There every variety of fashion and of no fashion, European and native, may be seen; and there may be heard the remarks of the promenaders on one another, not generally tinctured with the milk of human kindness. To the north of the Chowrasta is Birch Hill Park, a place for picnics and lovers, with little nooks and comfortable seats, and occasional glimpses of the snows. Beyond this is North Point, generally considered the end of Darjeeling town. If we continue our ramble we shall pass along the eastern flank of the Park, a little lower down the spur, and eventually return to the Mall by Birch Hill-road. We shall have travelled four miles round, a pleasant walk, as the vegetation is really pretty, magnificent views of the snows are to be obtained on a clear day, and the valleys dotted over with tea plantations are to be seen with advantage.

The tea-gardens are within easy access, and a visit to one of them is interesting for two reasons: first, it enables you to see the tea in all its stages; second, it affords an opportunity for the study of the picturesque hill-people. The Nepaulese coolies are a happy-go-lucky lot. In spite of a liberal coating of dirt, they are not bad-looking. They are considered superior to the labourers from Bengal. That they are better off in the tea-gardens than in their own country is proved by their immigrating in large numbers, bringing their wives and children, and settling permanently in British territory. In a tea-garden the stunted bushes are laid out, acre beyond acre, in a regular and unromantic fashion. Still it is not devoid of picturesqueness. The planter's bungalows are almost invariably charmingly situated on some spur from the hillside, and the stranger, even without any letter of introduction, is sure of that hospitable welcome which has come to be associated with the name of planter. Every day around Darjeeling you cannot fail to observe the long strings of sturdy Bhutia coolies carrying to the railway the heavy chests of tea, supported on their backs in their peculiar manner, tough grass-bands crossing their foreheads. The immense weight these coolies—both men and women—can carry in this manner is wonderful.

One of the most pleasant spots in Darjeeling is Lloyd's Botanical Garden, the site being the gift of the proprietor of Lloyd's Bank. It stands on a slope below the Bazar. It covers an area of about 14 acres, and is very tastefully laid out. The trees and shrubs are mostly indigenous, but several Australian acacias, eucalypti, and pittosporums have found a suitable home there. English annuals thrive well, and as these are grown plentifully, and are at their best in April, May, and June, I have seen the garden in its most gaudy attire.

The Cemetery is finely laid out on a hillside in several terraces with steps communicating. Many of the gravestones are of great interest. The grave of "Rachel Preston, aged nine months," probably the infant of one of the earliest settlers, bears the date 1840—only four years after the foundation of Darjeeling. General Lloyd, to whom this hill-station owes its origin as a sanatorium for the Bengal Government, is himself resting here. Many monuments of interest show the last resting-place of Government officials, distinguished soldiers and explorers. Several of these latter are of foreign nationality. There is a tablet erected by the Asiatic Society of Bengal to the memory of H. J. Alexander Csoma de Korosie (Korös), a native of Hungary, and an eminent philologist. He compiled a Thibetan Grammar and Dictionary, and died at Darjeeling in 1842 on his way to Lhassa. Those who have "loved and lost" will leave this spot impressed with Tennyson's sadly-beautiful lines found on a newly-erected grave:—

"God gives us love. Something to love
He lends us; but, when love is grown
To ripeness, that on which it throve

Observatory Hill is the most prominent height in Darjeeling. The hill, it may be mentioned, is no longer an observatory station, this having been transferred to St. Paul's School, the observations being taken under the supervision of the Headmaster. It is the site of the Thibetan Lamaseng, which was formerly destroyed by the Ghoorkas. Though rebuilt afterwards, it was subsequently removed lower down by the Commissioner on the pretext that the Lamas had harboured some criminals, but the real reason probably was that the monastery was a nuisance to the Europeans residing near by. There are numerous tombs on Observatory Hill, and the presence in the early morning of Lamas who have come to make offerings at the shrine of their departed saint, shows that the spot is still held sacred. There is also a goodly display of votive rags hung on trees to conciliate evil spirits.

Observatory Hill is the easiest and best place from which to see the line of everlasting snows which are the glory of Darjeeling. It is not always that at this time of year their grandeur is exposed during the day. They are often veiled in mists and clouds. It is seldom that they are seen of an evening lit up by the setting sun into various tints of the most beautiful red, crimson and pink. Still more rarely are they seen on a clear night, lit up by the moon. This summer, however, in the month of May, in the day and in the evening, this magnificent sight has several times presented itself to the spectator; and the scene has been entrancing beyond description. The whole range is laid out like a map from north to east. The high peaks, towering into the sky, majestic, cold, silent and grand beyond expression, present a scene the strangeness and awfulness of which can hardly be surpassed by anything in the world. As we stand in the early morning, in silent wonder, we see the shady valleys below, showing forth their cultivations and forests in different hues of green; the dark blue outlines of the nearer hills around become more distinct, and, with the increasing brightness of the advancing day, the snows seem to come nearer and nearer, till we fancy we stand within easy distance of the peaks on whose snow-clad summits no human foot may ever tread.

The elevation of Observatory Hill is 7,168 feet, and more than 24 peaks, ranging from 10,000 to 28,000 feet high, are visible, not counting the smaller mountains. The height or which snow begins to exist is on an average at an elevation of 15,000 feet, so that every mountain over that height is covered with snow. There are 18 of these snowy peaks to be seen from the hill. They seem to form one unbroken line, but they are really at great distances from each other; it is owing to their dazzling whiteness that the perspective is not noticed. The double-pointed Kangchenjunga, easily recognised, as being the highest (28,156ft.), 45 miles from Darjeeling, is over 8 miles behind the two which are on each side of it. Chumioms, about the fifth peak farther eastward, is over 35 miles behind those with which it seems to be in line. Others will be found still farther away. Our eyes are deceived. There is really no snowy range before us. There is a jagged line of dazzling white; but it is impossible, by written description, to localise the position of each individual peak. It is when tinged by the rays of the rising or setting sun that the snowy range is seen in its grandest aspect; and then the delicate tints of pink, amber, and gold baffle description. I do not attempt to convey any adequate idea of the majestic grandeur of the "cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces" that stand forth against the horizon, calm, cold, stately, sublime in their immutability, awe-inspiring in their loneliness. It is impossible to express in words the impressions and sensations produced by the contemplation of these stupendous mountains. The most eloquent descriptions, even those of Dr. Hooker, who has pictured as graphically as words can picture this display of Nature, fail to convey to the mind's eye the magnificence of the panorama. It must be gazed upon to be appreciated. Once witnessed, the scene will remain for ever ineffaceable from the memory.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this Association was held at Poole on Wednesday, July 25. After lunch at the Temperance Hall, under the presidency of Councillor C. Carter, J.P., the business meeting was held in the chapel, the President, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, in the chair.

Mr. H. Blessley, hon. secretary, read the Committee's Report.

The Report noted that the past year had been exceptionally encouraging, owing to the success of the Twentieth Century Fund, suggested at the last annual meeting, and for which over £1,000 had been raised. The chapel property at Dorchester had been disposed of, and a fund established which would produce an income of £36 for the use of the Association. Services had been continued at Weymouth, but without a settled minister. The report concluded with references to the death of Dr. Martineau and Mr. Charles Pinnock, ex-Mayor of Newport.

Miss Spencer presented the treasurer's accounts, showing an income of £222, and a balance in hand of £14 7s. 2½d.

The Rev. C. C. Coe presented the report of the Twentieth Century Fund, showing £1,031 11s. promised, and £1,003 paid.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. G. Pinnock, the reports were adopted. Mr. W. Carter read reports of the different churches, and the officers were elected, the president and treasurer and the advisory committee being re-elected, and Mr. H. Blessley's name being added to the vice-presidents. Mr. Blessley desired, on account of increasing age, to be relieved of the office of secretary, and on the motion of Mrs. Osler, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to him for his eighteen years' service. On Mr. Blessley's motion Mr. Fred. Pinnock was elected secretary.

At the close of the business meeting, service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. C. E. Pike, the lessons being read by the Rev. E. S. Anthony, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. E. Addis, of Manchester College, Oxford.

After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Sunday-school Treats.

Successful summer treats are reported from Godalming, July 25; Guildford, July 25; London (Brixton), July 27 and 30.

Accrington.—On Sunday, July 15, the annual flower festival was held. The preacher for the day was the Rev. Arthur W. Fox, of Todmorden. Practical, helpful sermons, attentive congregations, tasteful decorations, good singing, marked the services.

Cirencester.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached, on July 15, by the minister, the Rev. H. Austin. In the morning the subject was "Jesus and Little Children"; in the evening, "The Transmission of the Influence of Jesus through the Sunday School." A number of strangers attended, and the services were brightened by the special anthems of choir and children. On 19th the children's picnic took place in the fields at Stratton, and, apart from the intense heat, the time was pleasantly spent.

Doncaster.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on 22nd ult. The Rev. H. Thomas preached afternoon and evening. For the afternoon service the children brought offerings of flowers, which were received during the singing of an appropriate hymn immediately preceding the sermon. These flowers, together with those used for the decoration of the church, were afterwards sent to sick friends of the congregation, and the remainder to the Workhouse.

Godalming.—Anniversary services were held at Meadrow Chapel on Sunday, July 29, the preacher in the morning being the Rev. Hubert Clarke, in the afternoon and evening the Rev. V. D. Davis. At the latter services the string band, organised by the minister, took a leading part, playing, in addition to the hymn tunes, several selections from Handel, Mendelssohn, and Schumann. The stormy weather no doubt was responsible for an attendance not so large as usual, but visitors from Guildford and Horsham and elsewhere were present. Tea was served in the schoolroom for the visitors between afternoon and evening service.

Gorton.—The new school buildings in connection with the Brookfield Church were opened on Saturday, July 28. The building has been erected upon land adjoining the grounds of the church, and has cost about £6,000, the whole of which has been raised. The school is a handsome stone building, lofty, airy, and well lighted. It contains a large central hall and numerous classrooms, and will afford accommodation for 800 scholars and teachers. Saturday's proceedings commenced with a service in the church, conducted by the Revs. George Evans and Dendy Agate. Afterwards there was a procession to the school grounds, and the door of the new building was opened by Mrs. G. P. Dawson with a gold key which was presented to her for the purpose by her brother, Mr. F. W. Peacock. Within the building a public meeting was held. The chair was occupied by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal (president of the Manchester District Sunday School Association), who, in the course of a short address, said that the good work done in the Gorton school had been looked upon with pride and pleasure by other schools, and they had been gratified to note its growing strength. It was satisfactory to know that as the school had grown it had become self-dependent, and that it was now able to carry on its work with efficiency and completeness. It must not be forgotten that Sunday-school work was becoming increasingly important as education took more and more hold of the people. The elementary questions which used to occupy the attention of Sunday-schools were now dealt with on week-days, and Sunday-schools, as a consequence, were left free to pursue the spiritual work, which was so necessary. That work was far higher than any mere intellectual training such as used to be given within walls such as those. Satisfactory reports were submitted by Mr. S. Rider (treasurer) and Mr. Thomas Grundy (school secretary), the latter stating that the scholars now numbered 470 and the teachers 36. Afterwards Mrs. Dawson made a few appropriate remarks, and Mr. Peacock was presented by Miss Henshall with a duplicate gold key. The choir of the church rendered a couple of glees during the proceedings. A vote of thanks was accorded to Mrs. Dawson, on the motion of the Rev. George Evans, seconded by Mr. Charles Broadhurst, and the chairman was also thanked for his services, on the proposition of the Rev. Dendy Agate. Subsequently there was a garden party, at which music was provided by the Wilton-street band.

Guildford.—On Sunday, July 22, in the absence of the minister, who was preaching at Croydon, the services were conducted in the morning by Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., C.C., and in the evening by Mr. U. J. Roberton. Mr. Ellis spoke of the influence of Nature, and particularly floral nature, in religious revelation, and of the part which should always be taken by flowers and floral decoration in our religious observances and in the adornment of our services. Mr. Roberton dwelt upon one of those Oriental themes with which study and travel have made him so familiar. During the year Science Sermons have been delivered in the Ward-street Church by Mr. Edward A Martin, F.G.S., of Croydon, and have been followed with keen appreciation.

London Domestic Mission (Appointment).—The committee have appointed Mr. William Wilson of Glasgow, as Missionary at Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, in succession to the Rev. Joseph Pollard. Mr. Wilson will enter upon his duties on Sept. 9.

Poole.—On Sunday, July 22, anniversary and flower services were held, when eloquent sermons were preached to good congregations by the Rev. Professor Addis, M.A. The collections were the largest taken for some years past.

Rhondda Valley.—The open-air meetings were continued on July 24, at Treherbert. Mr. D. Rees spoke in English on "Christ's Condition of Salvation," followed by Dr. Griffiths on the "Larger Faith of Unitarianism." The crowd numbered about 120. Many questions were asked. An official of a local colliery insisted upon haranguing the crowd. He recited old Welsh hymns, and told the people that they would lose all those dear old hymns if they embraced Unitarianism, and in a final histrionic outburst, he implored his hearers not to abandon the religion of their ancestors. The final result of the meeting was: a few score leaflets distributed, a dozen Welsh pamphlets sold, a challenge to Mr. Rees by a Christiadelphian to a public debate on the infallibility of the Bible, and it is to be hoped a few seeds of the truth sown. July 29, at Penygraig, Mr. Rees addressed a crowd of about 200 on "The Human Christ and His Humanitarian Religion." Copies of the Welsh edition of "Unitarian Christianity," by Samuel Sharpe, were distributed. A number of copies of Welsh pamphlets were sold. There were considerable interruptions and again many questions were asked.

Saffron Walden.—The eighty-first anniversary of the Sunday-school was commemorated on July 29. In the morning special hymns were sung, and the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth preached from the words—"Thou shalt be like a watered garden." Isaiah lviii. 11. In the evening a special floral service, entitled "The King's Garden," obtained from America for the occasion, was rendered by the scholars and friends with much efficiency. The chapel was very full. Collections were in advance of last year. After the benediction the congregation sang "God Save the Queen."

Stockton-on-Tees.—The annual flower service was held on Sunday afternoon, July 29, when a service of song, entitled "Summer Roses," was rendered by the teachers and scholars, and a short address was given by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle. On Wednesday, Aug. 1, the teachers, scholars, and friends spent a very pleasant day at Redcar-by-the-Sea.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. PHILIP ROSCOE writes as Treasurer of the London Domestic Mission :—"May I announce through you that the fund collected for the purchase of an annuity for the Rev. Joseph Pollard on his retirement from Rhyl-street Mission is now closed? The appeal made in THE INQUIRER a few weeks ago for subscriptions has been most successful, and the sum of £529 18s. 6d. having been received the committee do not wish to ask for more. We shall be able to buy Mr. Pollard an annuity of £50 a year."

THE Athenæum of August 4 contains a review of "The Hexateuch according to the Revised Version. Arranged in its Constituent Documents by Members of the Society of Historical Theology, Oxford. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, Marginal References and Synoptical Tables, by J. Estlin Carpenter and G. Harford Battersby." Having pointed out the reasonableness of the main positions taken up by the "higher criticism" and added a demurrer to the exactness of the parallel drawn in the Introduction between such criticism and the science of geology, the review adds :—

But having said thus much with regard to the more minute details of the literary analysis which forms the subject of the present work, we cannot praise too highly the great care and acumen with which the problem as a whole has been treated. It would, we believe, be difficult to find in any language a clearer and fuller exposition of the critical theory on the Hexateuch than is contained in the sixteen chapters of the Introduction printed in vol. i.; nor could the English reader desire a more convenient arrangement of the documents themselves than the one displayed in vol. ii. The editors treat the whole subject from an enlightened and unimpassioned point of view. They seem to leave nothing unsaid that should be said. The introductory chapters include a complete history of Biblical criticism, beginning with a Spanish rabbi of the eleventh century, and ending with practically the latest important contribution on the subject. Of archæology, too, is taken as much notice as its present state will allow. Chap. xv., contributed by Professor Cheyne, supplies an admirably clear and temporately written account of the relations at present existing between criticism and archæology.

Of this masterly work, which is published in two volumes by Messrs. Longmans (price 36s. net), we hope shortly to have a full notice from the pen of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed.

A FORTNIGHT ago we made note of a challenge offered by some Mohammedan gentlemen to the Bishop of Lahore, to meet in debate Mirza Ghulam Ahmad of Qadian, who claims to be the Messiah, and who was willing to submit the respective claims of Mohammed and Jesus, as supreme prophet, to the result of such a public controversy. The Bishop, we now learn from the Pioneer Mail, July 6, declined the invitation for reasons set forth in a lengthy letter. He cannot pretend to be in such friendly relationship to one who disputes the messianic claim with Jesus and who has repeatedly used irritating language respecting Christianity and the Gospels; and while the Episcopal office renders the Bishop a representative of the Christian community in the diocese, Mirza, who is rejected by the bulk of Mohammedans, holds no such position. But the chief reason for declining the offered debate is that the Bishop does not "consider it possible to ascertain the path of true religion and prove conclusively the superiority of one religion over another by purely intellectual controversy." "I believe," says the Bishop, "that this view is fundamentally wrong and contrary to the teaching of God's Holy Word; and that its prevalence in the minds of many in this country is doing enormous injury." He proceeds to refer to the sayings like "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," and "If any man willeth to do His will he shall know of the doctrine." It is the lowly and penitent, he believes, who arrive at a living knowledge of the true God before the "men of acute intellect who are best able to sustain well a part in religious controversy." At the same time he is glad when by studying each other's literature Mohammedans and Christians get to understand each other better.

IN the Christian Register for July 19, an account is given of the origin of a hymn which, apparently, has given rise to some adverse comment in that journal. There is certainly a tone in the opening lines which is alien to a robust religiousness abounding in health and vigour—"Oh, to be nothing, nothing, Helpless to lie at thy feet." But here again, as often, to know all is something more than to pardon all. It appears that the author was a Miss Taylor, who, fired by the example of Florence Nightingale, became a hospital nurse—it is said through Dr. Martineau's recommendation. In the course of a severe operation, at which the patient, who was but imperfectly anæsthetised, struggled violently, the poor nurse was thrown upon the surgeon's knife and her spinal column was severed. She lingered for two days, and it was in the last period of her consciousness that she dictated the four verses which make the "hymn." Their beauty under these pathetic circumstances is evident; but their appropriateness as part of a public service is quite another thing, and it cannot be a useful piety, we should think, that, in the absence of any special affliction such as came upon this poor creature, nourishes itself much in private with poetry of the kind.

THE holiday month ought to prove useful in regard to mental and spiritual refreshing as well as bodily recreation; and not merely by way of general uplift and healthier tone, though that is much, but by the change of religious atmosphere which it is possible to enjoy just now. Those who travel find themselves at unaccustomed places of worship, and those who stay at home have, as a rule, a change of preachers to listen to. In each case, we should add, these things are so if neither the travellers nor the stay-at-homes use their "liberty as an occasion to the flesh," but dutifully testify their faith and aspiration by attendance at public worship whatever the surroundings may be. On the whole, no doubt, the good Unitarian will be glad by-and-by to return to his own church, but he will learn much and effectively if he is not too unfortunate in visiting other religious communities. No doubt, too, those who hold the fort at home may very much desire the return of the familiar face into the pulpit, at least it is a poor case where some degree of this feeling does not exist; and yet the "supply" preacher is also a man, and has his message to give, and his help to render in that common worship which is, when really and heartily joined in, one of the most glorious hours of life. Wider horizons and ampler air are the programme everywhere; let them be sought in theology as well as elsewhere, and welcomed in every stimulating change of experience.

IN the August issue of the Mill Hill Pulpit, the Rev. C. Hargrove's sermon on

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

"The Ruin of an Empire" is given. The "Empire" referred to is Spain, but, as would be expected, the preacher has our own Empire in his mind. He asks whether our nation is abiding by the old ideals of right and liberty, and concludes as follows:—

We hear, indeed, much now, and from the highest authorities, of the perils by which England is beset, and many remedies are urged upon us—the increase of our Army and our Fleet, the stricter organisation of the Militia, the improvement of the Volunteer Forces, the establishment of Rifle Clubs in every school and village, and even conscription is not obscurely suggested. I have no remarks to offer upon these and such like precautions, nor do I doubt for a moment that even the severest form of conscription would be right if the country were really in danger from a foreign foe. But of this I am convinced, that not any nor all of these measures will avail to save our empire from ultimate dissolution. The only lasting strength of ours or any rule is in justice and in mercy. The sovereignty whose foundations are laid firm therein need not fear rebellion or invasion, it is strong by the very nature of things. The power of God is on its side. What the heathen philosopher says of the king in relation to his subjects is true of every form of government, republican or imperial. "Security," he writes, "is obtained only by making others feel secure. There is no need for building tall towers, or cutting the sides of mountains, or enclosing oneself within wall upon wall. Goodness will guarantee the king's safety on the open plain. One fortress is there which cannot be overthrown, it is the love of his subjects." (Seneca. Epistle to Nero Cæsar.) So if we can win the esteem of foreign nations by our courtesy and goodwill, if we can make sure of the loyalty of the many races subject to our sway by considerateness of their feelings and care for their welfare, then will our empire be at peace within and unassailable from without.

MENE, TEKEL, PERES. The sentence is over England too, but on us it depends how soon it be executed, or how long deferred. "Numbered," doubtless, are the years of our Empire, but not by decree of a blind fate, but by the measure of our faults: for we are "weighed" in the balances of divine justice, which do not swerve with the gusts of the day's enthusiasm or rage; and "divided" shall we too be, and our greatness, like that of Spain, be only in the Records of the Past. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish" is the warning of God in the history of our race; it is only by taking heed thereto, by putting from us the passions which have been the ruin of so many fair states, by exalting God and his law supreme in our hearts and in our councils, that England can be saved.

Not by increasing the number of our troops, and building ever new and mightier ironclads, and adding millions to millions on our war budget, but by Justice and Mercy shall we escape the doom of Spain, and multiply our days upon the earth.

THE Athenæum says that the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford, will shortly publish, through Messrs. Clarkson and Griffiths, of Manchester, a small volume entitled "Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford," in which will be given a good deal of information respecting that interesting Cheshire town, as well as all accessible information about Mrs. Gaskell. The illustrations will include the Richmond portrait of the author of "Cranford." An introduction will be contributed by "Edna Lyall."

JOHN BURGESS'S DIARY AND CORRESPONDENCE.—I.

AMONGST other things that were borne in upon the mind of George Fox was this: "That being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to fit and qualify men to be ministers of Christ," hence amongst the Friends, men and women of different trades and professions exercised the gift of ministry. But it was not only the Friends who acted upon this principle, the General Baptists also were accustomed to appoint from their own members one or two reliable persons to serve in the ministerial office. They were ordained elders over the Society that chose them, but at the same time they continued to pursue their ordinary business for a livelihood. This plan saved a good deal of anxiety about financial matters which often press hardly upon country congregations. Others, without being ordained to the eldership, gave help as preachers. Such a preacher amongst the General Baptists was John Burgess, of Ditchling. He was a glover and a leather breeches maker by trade, but also dealt in wool and hides, and could turn his hand to harvesting, haying, digging of graves, and other "'od jobs," as occasion demanded. He has left a "Jernel," covering the years 1785-1790, which is full of interesting details, and there are several letters of his in existence sent from America, to which country he emigrated in 1794. He tells us he "never was taught to whright," and it is manifest he never was taught to spell. He was born about 1751; his father was a farmer. In 1766 he was put to business with a Mr. Gosling, of Waldron, whom he served seven years. He joined the General Baptist Society at Waldron, and began at an early date to assist in ministerial work probably at the Heathfield Meeting, as he is spoken of as being settled at "horsmoncesex—" that is, Hurstmonceux—not far from Heathfield. In 1782 he removed to Ditchling, and was admitted a member of the church there by letter of commendation from Waldron. Up till April, 1788, he appears to have lived in the house adjoining the meeting house at Ditchling, and to have had some oversight of the graveyard, for there is frequent mention of digging graves and opening vaults. On April 2, 1788, however, he enters "Mooving Houseel Goods from hear to Hallots," and on the next day "Removed from the Meeting House up to Mr. Halletts Seting up beds, &c., all day." The entry in the Diary for the following Sunday runs as follows: "Went to Meeting the first Sunday after my Leaving the House, Smith p."—i.e., preached. I imagine the demand for leather breeches must have been on the wane, for in 1789 John Burgess extended his operations by opening a harness-making shop. This did not prove a brilliant success, and in 1794 he emigrated to America which he described as "a Land of Liberty and plenty." The conditions of business were against him in England, for it was then needful to take out licences to sell gloves and to dress hides. He had to pay duty upon the skins and hides he dressed and could not move his packs of wool to Lewes without going to "Brighthelmstone for a let pass." From America he wrote home: "In this Country we have no Licence to pay Nor duty of any kind if we Can Bye a Hide we can dress it as we please without Consulting the Divil or any of his Imps about it." Almost every Sunday in the years covered by his Diary John Burgess was engaged in preaching. A few extracts will show how the day was spent.

May 1, 1785.—"Was at Home preached both parts of ye day Acts 26—28, 29. Rom. 1—16. A few people stopd to consider of a few things relating to the Church Meeting &c Mr. Billinghurst stopd hear tea"

May 8.—"Was at home it was our full meeting day Mr. Evershed was hear Receivd in 2 members Namely Geering and Judge we had a disceplen meeting after service &c went to Mr. Brownes to tea. Smokd a pipe with several of our frends, then went up to Curtgardens to supper and smokd a pipe with Mr. Evershed, and Mr. Sanders, and Mr. Pannet, and Mr. Chatfield got home about 10 o'clock, about 52 communicants."

May 15.—"Went to Waldron Meeting. Father Edwards went with me p upon psalms 107—31 Stopd at Plumpton-Green supper, and smokd a pipe."

May 22.—"Went to Heathfield Meeting &c."

May 29.—"Went to Barkham (Barcombe) Meeting after Service went to Mr. Syflets to diner Smokd a pipe or to came home pr. both parts of ye day I. Sam. 12, 24, Mat. 28—18, 19."

June 5.—"Went to ye Purchert Meeting &c P. Rom. 14—17, 18, 19."

Saturday, June 18.—"Was diging of a grave for Wm. Billinghurst Junier who departed this Life last Wensday at Brighthelmstone Agates preachd sermon upon psalms 119—1, 2, in the evening was at Mr. Agates with Richard Burgess Smokd a pipe or too &c."

Almost every entry in the Journal ends with "&c." The "Purchert" meeting seems to have been held in the large farm kitchen of the farm known as "The Purchase," the meeting there was held with great regularity, and sometimes over fifty persons were present.

It is doubtful whether there was a proper meeting-house at Barcombe, probably the meeting was held there also in a farmhouse. On Sunday, Dec. 25, 1785, the entry runs:—"Went to Barkham meeting But we had no sermon by reason there was but 2 or 3 people and very late, it being very bad weather. mr. Drawbridge was there and Brought a New Desk with him to fix to ye table for the use of ye minister, &c."

The entries for the Christmastide of the following year are interesting:—Sunday, Dec. 24, 1786: "Was at Home Mr. Evershed was hear it was our communion day there was 2 yung women receivd into ye Church By Baptism 2 of mas peters dauters in the evening I went to Mr. Chatfield's at ye Rookery to tea Mr. Evershed and several other frends was there we stopd till about 9 o'clock." Monday 25th: "Was at Home all day, Mr. Evershed preachd hear to-day, Luke 2—10 and 11, in the evening at 6 o'clock mr. Drowly preached here upon Luke 2 and 14 before a great number of people."

Besides the subsidiary "meetings" that were kept up in connection with the Ditchling meeting-house, conferences for reading and expounding the Scripture were held from time to time, either at the meeting-house or at friends' houses. These "conferances" were held on week evenings in the winter and are mentioned as taking place at Mr. Agate's, Mr. Pannett's, and at Mr. Brumpfield's, of Plumpton. A fresh line was struck out in May, 1787. The entry for Monday, the 7th, runs as follows:—"Work in ye shop in ye forenoon, afternoon went to Mr. Drawbridge's Linfield to meet some Frends in order to Forme a Frendly Socity to Meet onc a month at his house for the improvement of our minds in useful knowledge, &c." Accordingly on June 11 they met; the record stands thus:—"In the afternoon went to Mr. Drawbridge's to spend 3 or 4 hours with some frends in conversation upon moral and religious subjects the inquiery was the most easy and natural evidences of ye existence and atributes of ye Supream Being—in discussing upon the subject we was nearly agreed and propose meeting again every first monday after the fool moon, to meet at 4 o'clock, up at 8, &c."

John Burgess represented the Ditchling congregation at the General Assembly of General Baptist Churches, both in 1784 and 1785, the latter occasion falls within the period covered by the Diary and it is thus described, May, 1785:—

"Tu. 17.—Got up about 3 o'clock, set off with Mr. and Mrs. Drawbridge to London to ye Assembly as was apointed last Church meeting, we stopd at Godstone and baited at Mrs. Days, Mrs. Drawbridge Mother, set of from there about 11 o'clock got to London about 4 eat my supper at the Spur and then went to the Talbot in to sleep, there was several of our frends sleepd there. We. 18.—Went meeting, as was apointed last year, Mr. Fenn preached upon Isai. 62, 6 and 7 (66 of us went to dinner at the coffy house Hukson Square were went last year we finished our assembly Business by Candle Light I pad for 6 Letters at 2 each slept at the Talbot as before &c.; the 0: 10: 0 I card. for ye Book fun I paid to Mr. Dobell for him to pay to Doctor Lowdal. Th. 19.—Came out of Town about 11 o'clock, got to Craydon about 2 wen it be gan to rain a little. About 3 it wet very fast. I had the uppertunity to ride in a cart over the hill to Godstone it being tilted I got no wet, stopd at Godstone all night at the Bell at Mr. Huggets &c. Fr. 20.—Came away from Godstone about 5 o'clock got to New Chappel about 7 eat my breakfast there had tea and glas of peppermint which cost me 8d. &c. then came to Grinstead &c. then to Dane Hill to Mr. Tamplings, stopd there 3 hours Eat my dinner there &c. got home about 6 in ye evening." It was no small undertaking to journey to London in those days as a delegate to May Meetings. Hukson-square no doubt stands for Hoxton-square. The letters for which 2d. was paid were probably copies of the annual circular letter to the churches from the Messenger of the Assembly.

In other articles I hope to be able to give a few more details about the places at which John Burgess preached, and also some account of his religious opinions.

THE MEANING OF PAIN.

"He shall wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death shall be no more; neither shall there be mourning, nor crying, nor pain any more."

"He that overcometh shall inherit these things."—Revelation xxi. 4, 7.

Such is the Christian's word of faith concerning pain. It is a condition of trial in our present life, something to be endured and overcome; but in the perfected life of the spirit it will cease to be—there will be only strength and joy and heavenly peace.

This faith answers to our natural feeling concerning pain. Instinctively we shrink from it, and look upon it as an evil thing to be combated at every point, and if possible driven out of our life.

And yet we must not be too ready to assume that perfect happiness would be gained by the banishment from our life, either here or hereafter, of all possibility of pain. As far as bodily suffering is concerned it may seem a very simple thing to be divested of this burdened flesh and clothed in a new spiritual body incapable of pain. But in using such language we are speaking in an image, and how it actually will be we cannot say. Our deepest conviction is that there is working in our life a purpose of unchanging good, which must prevail at last; but we must wait for the great revealing before we can know what the actual conditions of our life after death will be.

It is he that overcometh to whom the perfected spiritual life is promised, he that has been made perfect through suffering, who has gained the wisdom and the strength of pure, self-forgetting love—even the wisdom and the strength of Christ, who suffered for his brethren's sake. And when we call to mind the glory of martyrdom in a noble cause, all that we feel even here of that triumph of the spirit over pain, it may suggest to us that possibly the blessedness of heaven itself will not be found in the removal of all occasions of trial and endurance and opportunities of self-sacrificing service, but rather in the perfecting of the strength that shall make such endurance in unselfish service the purest joy.

And if that is so, we may be led also to think differently of the presence of pain in our earthly life, and may find that we cannot really wish to be freed from all possibility of suffering, since it is not altogether the enemy of our peace. We may desire rather the wisdom and strength to bear inevitable pain, and the true spirit by which to gain the victory over it.

In the actual conditions of our present life pain and pleasure are closely linked together in the very structure of our being. We cannot think of one without some experience and the constant possibility of the other, and pain has many salutary offices to fulfil for us. It comes in with necessary warning when any need of the body is too long left unsatisfied, and it is constantly a danger signal warning us to avoid what otherwise would quickly make an end of our life. And then at last come the warnings of failing strength, the pains of bodily decay and parting breath, not so terrible in fact as we often picture them, yet full of pathos, and bidding us look further afield and rest in those treasures and that strength which nothing of the earth can destroy. Such is the price we pay, by virtue of our sensitive nature, for our present life, rich in possibilities of vivid happiness.

It used to be said that pain was sent into the world as a penalty for sin. But we know now that the laws of physical pain and pleasure and of animal decay and death were written in Nature, and had been in operation for countless ages on our earth before man appeared and there was any possibility of sin. We inherit them from earlier races, and share them with the rest of the animal creation. The possibilities both of pleasure and pain are simply the conditions of our progressive life and our moral discipline—not more for the punishment of sin than for the glory of martyrdom and the nurture of the noblest manhood.

We have therefore to face pain with a good courage, and learn the lessons it has to teach.

But it is a true instinct, which bids us avoid all needless pain, and where we have received a warning use every effort that honour permits to keep from further suffering.

The self-inflicted pains of the ascetic have no justification in reason or piety, beyond the healthy rigour of self-discipline, which makes for clearer faculties and a better strength for service in the world—in keeping with that plain living and high thinking which we feel to be the best. As an offering supposed to be in itself well-pleasing to God, it can no longer be tolerated. A savage tyrant might be thought to enjoy such a sacrifice, but not the Father in Heaven. And as penalty for wrong-doing we may not wrest His judgments to ourselves. He lays His own penalties on sinful men, and we have only to be submissive to His will. Often we know that bodily suffering and painful incapacity do follow wrong-doing, particularly in the case of vicious self-indulgence. That is one of the salutary, if terrible, uses of pain in our life, as warning and discipline, to keep us in the right way. But that is for God, not for us to inflict. It is a false and dangerous superstition which supposes that through self-torture we can add something to the price paid for sin, or to our own chances of forgiveness.

Not self-destruction, but self-surrender, is our true aim; and the divine law of life and health is for our obedience, except where some higher duty demands their sacrifice.

As we think of the ideal life hereafter, so we have to strive here for the perfecting of every faculty and the harmonious development of the body fitted for the best service and the most vivid joy. It is a duty too much neglected for our whole people, to declare and to obey the laws of health, and to care for the grace and fitness of the body. It is dreadful to think how much needless suffering there is in the world, due to ignorance and neglect of these. Whatever is possible must be done to resist and guard against pain in this direction. It is part of the true ideal of service in the kingdom of God on earth. And it goes without saying that every form of cruelty inflicted by the tyranny or brutality of selfish men is to be resisted to the utmost, and as speedily as possible made an end of.

But even if all these should be perfectly accomplished there would still be pain in the world, as a condition of our life, for our true discipline. There would be hardship to endure, and accidents with many painful consequences, and the great catastrophes of Nature; while for all at last there would remain the inevitable shadows. And for many ages yet to come, very likely through the whole history of man upon this earth, there will be many other forms of imperfection and consequent suffering. All these are a part of the discipline of our life. And altogether, in judging of the presence of pain, we ought never to forget this larger scope of our life.

It is sometimes urged that pain is contrary to the goodness of God, that its presence in the world ought to destroy the faith we have in Him. But in many ways it is clear that it serves a beneficent purpose, and that without it human life could not have come to be what it is, or to hold the promise, which it does hold, of further growth in true manhood, while beyond the range of the present scene it sets no limit to the fulness of our joy.

It is fruitless to deny the heavy burden, which the thought of pain often lays upon the sensitive heart and conscience, and there remains much that we cannot understand. But then we cry with Job, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil"—or what appears to us to be evil. For our stronghold is in God, and in what He has shown us to be good. No shadows of our life can destroy the beauty and the clear shining of the heavenly light. What we know of the power of goodness and its victorious progress in the world, must compel us to a better hope, and to trust for what we cannot see and understand.

Thus all the dreary passages of human history become the shadows out of which stand the noblest lives to prophesy to us of God and his unfailing providence—and the shadow of the cross becomes a radiance of heavenly hope, the emblem of a victorious spirit. And when we are crushed down by the thought of some dreadful agony laid on an innocent sufferer, we remember how little we know of the depths of the Divine counsels, and the Infinite compassion—and how small a portion of this one human life is known to us in these earthly years. And further, we are met by this strange fact, that often it is those who have the most terrible things to bear, even in years of a long martyrdom, with no apparent reason for their pain, who are the most firmly convinced of the tenderness and unchanging love of God. It must make us at least humble in our judgment and reticent before the mysteries of life.

We cannot choose pain for ourselves—indeed, we have to use every honest effort to avoid it. But if it come to us, we can accept it from God; and what is far harder, we can learn to accept it even for others whom we love, as they teach us by their meek and patient spirit.

But on many sensitive hearts the heaviest burden of all is laid by the thought of the sufferings of other animals—not because their pain is more or keener than ours, but because, so far as we can tell, they have no deeper spiritual life in which to rise superior to their pain, and no future that might reveal to them a new meaning in it and heal the wounds of their pathetic past.

We are thankful to know that the horror of what is called the struggle for existence in the animal creation has been greatly over-drawn, and painted in too lurid colours, and to be assured that the law of prey furnishes what is perhaps the most merciful method by which the life of a sensitive creature can be swiftly ended. And we must guard ourselves against adding to the pains of other creatures our own vivid and sensitive imagination, which looks before and after and forms so large a part of what we have to endure.

As a whole, we are allowed to think of the animal world as full of eager activity and happy life, in which the sum of the enjoyment immeasurably outweighs the suffering. And yet there remains a heavy weight of pain, with no office of higher discipline as in our life, and the dreadful fact that a large part of it is inflicted on dumb and helpless creatures by the cruelty of man.

For my own part, I confess that I do not know what to say to this—except in so far as it appeals to us to keep ourselves unstained by such cruelty, and to use every effort to raise the standard of duty in regard to this most trying question of humanity towards dumb creatures.

So far as I can see, it must remain an unanswered question in regard to the good providence of God towards the other animals. We may suffer for our cruelty—but that will not help those who have been destroyed, if they can receive nothing after their intolerable pain.

But with this, as with the rest of the darker riddles of our life, I say that the light must prevail. We cannot understand. We do not see the whole range of the Divine purpose. But we have received of the Eternal Goodness, we have had some vision of the light; and in patient and silent hope we must dare to trust, and wait for the revealing of the perfect day.

A GOSSIP ABOUT SERMONS.

A philosophical history of preaching has yet to be written. The sermon, if not distinctively Christian in origin, has always had a more important place in the economy of Christianity than of any other religion. The Hebrew Prophets in their denunciation of wrong-doing and their calls to repentance and righteousness are the predecessors of the order of preachers. The Prophets were not priests, and it is still perhaps an open question whether laymen may, or may not, be allowed to preach in the consecrated buildings of the Anglican Communion. In the early Church preaching was specially the duty of the Bishop; but there were exceptions, for Origen was thus called upon even before he was ordained. This, however, led to trouble. The members of the congregation in the earlier ages of Christianity expressed their approval by clapping their hands, stamping their feet and exclamations of "Orthodox," and no doubt expressed their disapprobation when they smelt heresy. The Montanists in the second century appear to have had women preachers, as the Quakers and some few other denominations have in our own day. The sermons in the early Church appear to have been brief, sometimes not exceeding five minutes in delivery, and several were preached in succession to the same assembly. Those of Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis, at the end of the fifth and the beginning of the sixth century are longer; one of his discourses contains over 16,000 words. Newman's sermon on the usurpation of reason has about 6,000. To neither of these would Dodsley's words apply:—

If pastors more than thrice five minutes preach
Their sleepy folks begin to yawn and stretch.

The heroic age of preaching was, however, in the Puritan period. Thomas Jollie once preached for four hours, and on the same occasion Oliver Heywood prayed for two hours. Gregory Strigenicius preached 100 sermons on the "Flood," and these were published in 1613 in a folio of 1,480 pages. St. Basil's eighty-six sermons on the "Song of Solomon" end with the first verse of the third chapter. Johann Wecker's funeral sermon for "Frau Martha von Gemmingen," published in 1611, fills ninety-six pages, and includes quotations from Herodotus, Aelian, Herodian, and others to prove that the ancient heathen sorrowed for their dead.

The fulsome character of the praise bestowed upon the dead has often been remarked, but much adulation has been offered from the pulpit to the living also. Father Gaichès, in a discourse to the Soissons Academy, had the courage to speak against the compliments from the preachers that were so common in his day, but he made an exception in favour of the King!

Origen was an adept in the futile art of allegorical interpretation, but he did not stand alone. Thus St. Augustine tells us that the Pool of Bethesda, with its five porches, is the Jewish people shut in by the five books of Moses. The law only brought forth the sick, it could not heal them. Christ by his teaching which troubles the sinner, troubles the water. To descend into the water means to believe in the Lord's death. That only one was healed signifies unity; those who came after were not healed because he who is outside unity cannot be healed. Christ found in the impotent man's age the number of infirmity. The number forty is consecrated by a kind of perfection. Why should we wonder that he was weak and sick whose years fell short of forty by two? Finding the man thus lacking, Christ gave him two precepts—ordered him to do two things, "Take up thy bed, and walk"—thus filling up that which was lacking in the perfect number. From this it will be seen that forced and fanciful analogies are not novelties.

The foundation of the preaching orders was coincident with a great extension of the influence of the pulpit. The friars and monks, in order to reach the people, adopted a freer style of oratory, and interlarded their discourses with fables, apologues, and stories, some of which would not now be considered edifying, for the embellishment of their sermons. There are great collections such as the "Gesta Romanorum" and Bromyard's "Summa Predicantium," in which are preserved the matter of many sermons. Jacques de Cessoles preached several discourses on the game of chess, and these were so popular that he wrote them down in a book, which had an immense popularity all over Europe, and was translated by Caxton in "The Game and Playe of Chesse," a treatise which throws very little light on the methods of the game, but is full of anecdotes, historical and fabulous, all intended for the ethical improvement of the age.

Amongst the legends of the Middle Ages are those which represent St. Francis of Assisi as preaching to the birds, and St. Anthony of Padua as preaching to the fishes. It is easy to see how the overflowing love of St. Francis which made him see the golden thread of brotherhood in all things in the universe may have given rise to such a story.

If Cessoles preached on Chess, another favourite pastime furnished a theme to Latimer, whose "Sermons on the Card" were preached at Cambridge in 1529. "And whereas ye are wont to celebrate Christmas in playing at cards, I intend, by God's Grace, to deal unto you Christ's Cards, wherein ye shall perceive Christ's rule." It is noteworthy that Latimer expresses no disapprobation of "carding," but uses the trump card in triumph, and the rules of the game of primero, for the purpose of enforcing the doctrines of the Gospel. Latimer uses plenty of homely illustrations. Thus in his famous sermon on the "Plough," he says:—

> What ado was there made in London at a certain man, because he said, and indeed at that time, on a just cause, "Burgesses!" quoth he, "nay Butterflies." Lord, what ado there was for that word! And yet would God that they were no worse than butterflies! Butterflies do but their nature; the butterfly is not covetous, is not greedy of other men's goods; is not full of envy and hatred, is not malicious, is not cruel, is not merciless. The butterfly glorieth not in her own deeds, nor preferreth the traditions of men before God's words; it committeth not idolatry, nor worshippeth false gods. But London cannot abide to be rebuked, such is the nature of man.

At the Church of St. Katherine Cree, in Leadenhall-street, London, there is annually preached on Oct. 16 what is known as "The Lion Sermon." Sir John Gayor, an English merchant, travelling in Arabia, one night lost sight of his human companions, and in their place encountered a lion. Contrary to his expectation the king of beasts left him uninjured, and instead of his bones whitening the desert he died at home and bequeathed £200 for the foundation of a yearly thanksgiving sermon.

The Puritans were fond of striking titles. "The Black Devil," "The Spiritual Navigator bound for the Holy Land," "The White Devil," "The Devil's Banket,"* are the names given to some of his sermons by Thomas Adams, whilst Samuel Ward, of Ipswich, wrote "A Coal from the Altar to kindle the Holy Fire of Zeal," "Jethro's Justice of the Peace," and "Woe to Drunkards." John Wall was the author of a sermon entitled "Evangelical Spices, or the Incense of the Gospel," which was printed in 1627. John Williams, who was successively Bishop of Lincoln, and Archbishop of York preached a funeral sermon for James I., as "Great Britain's Solomon," and whilst the British Solomon was still living he preached before the King and the Prince at Theobalds a "Sermon of Apparell," based on Matt. xi. 8. Paul Bayne, preached a "Caveat for Cold Christians" and a "Counterbane against Earthly Carefulness" (1618). Charles Fitz-Jeffrey was the author of "The Curse of Corne-horders; with the blessing of seasonable selling" (1631). John Day, B.D., who was one of the twenty-six children of Day, the printer, was a quaint preacher of the seventeenth century, as may be supposed from the punning titles of "Day's Descent," "Day's Dyall," and and "Day's Festivals." Amongst Gataker's sermons are "A Spark towards the kindling of sorrow for Zion," and "The Spiritual Watch." Thomas Thompson, who wrote "A Diet for a Drunkard," was also the preacher of "A Friendly Farewell from a Faithful Flocke." William Loe preached before James I. "The King's Shoe made and ordained to trample on and to tread down Edomites" (Psalm lx. 8). Archibald Simson wrote "Samson's seaven locks of hair allegorically expounded and compared to the seven spirituall virtues whereby we are able to overcome all spirituall Philistines" (1621). A parishioner of St. Swithin's by London Stone having been adjudged in 1629 to do public penance, the occasion was "improved" by the minister, Richard Cooke, in a sermon entitled "The White Sheet."

The Puritans had no monopoly of odd subjects. Marten Bohemus, of Lauben, preached twenty-three sermons, which fill 455 pages, on the "Human Body" ("Von des Menschen Leib"). In these discourses, the hair, head, flesh, bones, fingers, &c., are systematically dwelt upon. Andreas Schopp in 1605 preached on "Hair," (1) its origin and nature, (2) its right use, (3) of the warnings, admonitions, and consolations which may be derived from it, (4) how to manage and use it in a Christian fashion. Carpzov devoted a whole year's sermons to the consideration of Christ as a workman. In these Jesus was pourtrayed as the best cloth weaver, lantern maker, &c. Dr. Joseph Wolff mentions hearing at Vienna "a very pathetic sermon on the utility of cultivating potatoes." This would at all events be practical divinity. And so is Dr. de Witt Talmage's discourse on the "High Crime of not Insuring," which has had an extensive circulation in the United States and has been reprinted in this country. The antipodes of the practical is afforded by Theophile Raynaud, a learned Jesuit of the seventeenth century, who preached seven sermons on the letter O—the initial of the seven anthems sung before Christmas, and we are told that "in the sterility of the subject found an infinity of beautiful things." Boulanger—"Le Petit Père André" as he was generally called—has left a reputation for pulpit jocularity. He compared the Four Great Fathers of the Latin Church to the kings of the four suits of playing cards. When a thunderbolt fell on a Carmelite monastery, André observed "God has been merciful to these fathers in only sacrificing their library, in which there was not a single monk. If the lightning had fallen upon their kitchen they must all have been in danger of perishing." One day preaching against intrigues he said he had intended to publicly name a guilty lady who was present, but on second thoughts would only throw his skull cap in the direction where she sat. As he took off his cap, says the scandalous chronicler, every woman bobbed her head down. But this false and uncharitable story has been told of others. Little Father André was a man of education, but felt that it was necessary to speak to unlearned people in a language that they would understand. He was a man of austere life, and his pulpit jocularity was not mere buffoonery, but an attempt to gain the attention and to mend the morals of his hearers. He died in 1675. "Orator" Henley adopted various eccentric tricks simply to call attention to himself. "Preacher at once and Zany of thy age," says Pope, and the phrase is not ill-applied to a divine who on one occasion devoted his discourse to the laudation of the butcher's art, and on another promised the sons of St. Crispin a new and speedy way of making shoes. They assembled in great numbers in his congregation, and were doubtless edified at being told that the novel and expeditious way of making shoes was to cut off the tops of the boots! The world would have none of Henley when he was serious and sensible, but ran after him when he made a fool of himself—and of his hearers. François Schilling, in a sermon printed at Vienna, declared that Adam was not born but taken out of the side of Eve. This curious slip escaped the notice of the censor, who, as Bayle records, gave the usual testimony that the discourse contained nothing contrary to faith or morals.

The present age has not been without curious sermons. James Wells, when minister of the Surrey Tabernacle, had detractors, one of whom observed "How can he know anything? I saw him the other day wheeling a wheelbarrow." This came to the ears of the preacher, who thereupon delivered a discourse, wherein he showed, as he puts it, "How I could know something of the Gospel, though employed in so mean an occupation; and also showed what my wheelbarrow preached to me." Its lessons were sevenfold—(1) the wheel reminded him of eternity, as it had neither beginning nor end; (2) the two sides put him "in mind of the two natures of the dear God-man"; (3) the head of the barrow "as fixed in the body to it" reminded him "of the great head and husband of the Church"; (4) the bottom of the barrow brought to his remembrance "the bottom of Solomon's Chariot" (Song iii. 10); (5) the handles of the barrow put him in mind of the Gospel promises, "these might be called handles for the believer's faith and hope"; (6) the legs made him think "of the Almighty Love, and Almighty Power of Christ: these are the legs on which he stood and fulfilled his covenant engagements," &c. (7) "I was wheeling rubbish away to make room for the erection of a new edifice, which put me in mind of my work as a labourer in the Lord's house; wheeling the rubbish of Arminianism away, to make room for the rising of the living stones in Zion." Such is an outline of the strongly Calvinistic sermon, "A Wheelbarrow Spiritualised," of which the fourth edition appeared in 1832.

A volume of sermons has been made up of passages from Shakespeare, wrenched, of course, from the context, but patched together with much ingenuity. "The Poet-Priest," by J. F. Timmins (4th Edit., Bristol, 1890), contains five sermons addressed respectively to men of business, young men, women, the clergy, and journalists. Mr. Timmins quotes the opinion of George Dawson that "there has been no sweeter preacher of the religion of Jesus Christ since Christ died than William Shakespeare." It must be confessed that these centos have a more orderly and connected appearance than might have been thought possible.

"The Bible Story of an Iron Bedstead" has an odd sound as the title of a sermon. The discourse so-called, by the Rev. W. A. Presland (London: J. Speirs, 1884) is an attempt to show a spiritual significance or symbolism in that passage of Deuteronomy (iii. 11), which describes the measurement of the arched couch on which Og, King of Bashan, was accustomed to slumber. All this is allegorised. "It is perfectly plain," we are told, "that this giant's bed represents some false and dangerous doctrine, some unsound conviction upon which pride, or greed, or hatred, or any other evil love may rest secure, but on which no good king or subject can possibly find rest."

However much judgments may vary as to his position as a theologian, few will fail to recognise the late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon as one of the first preachers of the age. In an address to the students at Stockwell College, he laid stress upon the value of illustrations, but the objection was raised that they are difficult to obtain in any great abundance. "Yes," said Mr. Spurgeon, "if you do not wake up, but go through the world asleep, you cannot see illustrations; but if your minds were thoroughly aroused, and yet you could see nothing else in the world but a single tallow candle, you might find illustrations in that luminary to last you for six months." The final result of this sally was his "Sermons in Candles" (London: Passmore and Alabaster, 1890), in which candles and candlesticks are used to point many morals. It is a book from which preachers and speakers may learn much. As a sample we may quote his last illustration:—

Here are many candles uniting their brilliance; they all hang upon one support, and shine by the same light. May they not represent the Church of Christ in its multiplicity, variety and unity? These candles are all supported upon one stem, they are all giving forth the same light, and yet they are all sorts, sizes and colours. A great way off they would seem to be but one light. They are many and yet one. I happened to say one evening that nobody could tell which was the "U. P." and which was the Free Church, or which was the Wesleyan or the Primitive, or the Salvation Army or the Baptist, and so on; but one strong old Baptist assured me that the "Dips" gave the best light. Another said that the Presbyterians were on the whole cast in the best mould; and a third thought that the Church of England was made of the truest wax. I told them that some of the Baptists would be better if they had another baptism. The Free Churches might be none the worse for being more established in the faith; and even the Methodists might improve their methods. The main question is the possession of the one light and fire of God, the flame of Divine truth. Those who shine by Divine grace are all one in Christ Jesus. What a glory will be there in the one Church when all her members shine and all are one. May such a day come quickly.

A curious department of sermon literature is that which contains what may perhaps be regarded as parodies of the genuine article. Thus under the title of "Les Homélies de Voltaire" M. Victor Poupin has published a selection from the "Philosophical Dictionary" of the sage of Ferney. The discourses of Orator Henley might find a place here, as well as the "Devil's Pulpit" of the Rev. Robert Taylor. The last contained attacks on Christianity by a clergyman who had turned Freethinker. He was imprisoned and the book suppressed, but it has several times been reprinted. In another vein of parody is the sermon on the nursery rhyme of "Old Mother Hubbard," which has not been without imitators.

The soporific effect of sermons is a commonplace both to the witty and the would be witty, and it is only to be expected that there should be a companion picture to the sleeping congregation in that of a sleeping preacher.* A boy of sixteen named Joseph Payne, who was resident at Reading in 1760, "fell into fits," in which he would deliver "a very pertinent and regular discourse," lasting for half an hour. On recovering consciousness he had no remembrance of what had happened. There was a similar case in the county of Bucks, Pennsylvania, where a young man named Job Cooper preached and prayed whilst asleep. More attention was directed to the experiences of Rachel Baker, of Marcellus, New York, whose "Remarkable Sermons delivered during sleep" were printed in 1815. These were cases of idiopathic sleep, and there is nothing remarkable about the sermons except the fact of the preacher's unconsciousness.

But we must not in our gossip about preachers imitate the long-windedness that has so often been the mark for the shaft of the satirist. That there should be curious sermons is not surprising, if we remember the amazing number of discourses that are preached in the course of a single year in churches, mission halls, and even cottages. Whatever other diversities there may be, every Christian congregation, whether for edification or propaganda, makes use, more or less of the sermon. Let us hope that our preachers will be more and more like Chaucer's parson, rich of holy thought and work, so that of each one of them we may say:—

He waited after no pompe, ne reverence
Ne maked him no spiced conscience,
But Cristes lore, and His Apostles twelve,
He taught, but first he followed it himselve.

OBITUARY.

MISS LEEK, OF BRADFORD.

On July 31, Miss Leek, the first Matron of the Bradford Eye and Ear Hospital, passed into the higher life after several weeks of intense suffering, borne with great fortitude. She was interred the following Friday at the Scholemoor Cemetery, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones officiating. At the conclusion of his discourse on Sunday morning on "A Nation's Sorrow," in which reference was made to the assassination of the King of Italy, and the death of the Duke of Coburg, Mr. Ceredig Jones said: To come nearer home, there has passed away from our midst a few days ago a saintly soul, whose whole life had been one scene of self-sacrifice. I mean the late Miss Leek who, while she was able, worshipped within these walls. In her girlhood she was greatly influenced by the example of the Unitarian heroine, Florence Nightingale, who may be said to have been the real founder of the profession of sick nursing as it is now understood. In those early Crimean days Eliza Leek resolved to follow in the steps of her heroine, and was one of the first women in England to undergo thorough training for that purpose. Her first labours were among the poor in the most squalid parts of Manchester. There she was, indeed, a ministering angel in many a poverty-stricken home; and there are those living to-day who can bear grateful testimony to her self-sacrificing devotion to her work.

She gave her all—her health, strength, and means—to the service of those whom she considered less fortunate than herself. When the Bradford Eye and Ear Hospital was opened through the instrumentality of an honoured member of this congregation, the late Dr. E. Bronner, Miss Leek was appointed matron, which office she filled with a devotion that was truly Christ-like, until her retirement a few years ago. There was no task too menial, no duty too hard for her to perform, so long as she felt that it added to the comfort of a fellow-creature. For some years previous to her retirement she spent her spare moments on Sundays reading the best religious books that she could find to those of the inmates who had been temporarily deprived of their sight. There are many men and women in this district who owe her a debt of undying gratitude for the conscientious manner in which she aided their recovery of sight or hearing. By the intelligent way in which she supplemented the surgeon's skill, she saved many from a life of utter misery. Those of us who knew her will always retain happy recollections of her cheerful spirit, her deep love of humanity, and her implicit trust in God. As I stood beside her grave on Friday the words of the Master whose example she followed, persisted in coming into my mind: "Inasmuch as ye have done it into one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Our faith bids us believe that she has already been so greeted in a fairer world than this.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Pilgrimage to Oberammergau.—III.

We woke up on a glorious Sunday morning to the lively notes of the village band. At five o'clock Oberammergau was very active; in an hour the village church would be filled with the Passion Players, who begin the day's religious service by hearing mass, as all good Catholics should. We Protestant pilgrims were not so devout and turned over to doze while the noises in the street became more and more wakeful. There must be no over-sleeping however, for we have to be in our seats in the theatre before eight o'clock, at which time, punctually, the Play begins.

It is not difficult to find our way to the theatre. The streams of pilgrims in various parts of the village are sufficiently dense, and all are making for the same point, which is just on the outskirts. Our quarters are, perhaps, two minutes' walk from the theatre, which we find to be a large plain wooden structure: a semi-circular roof, like the roof of a railway station, standing on three walls. We take our seats inside. The body of the theatre slopes down from the back to the stage and is covered overhead as far as the seats go; it is closed at the back, but open in front towards the stage, which, being uncovered, is exposed to rain, wind and sunshine.

I suppose you have been to a theatre and know what an ordinary stage is like: a small enclosed space in front called the orchestra where the band plays; a curtain which is drawn up and down as the various scenes begin and come to an end; the scenery which is moved about and changed for the various acts or divisions of the play. Here, however, we see no orchestra, for the band is under the front part of the stage; the whole width of the stage is open to the sky and there is no front curtain. The chief scenery does not change; on each side of the stage there is a verandah, reached by a short flight of steps; joining the verandah is the front of a house, the door of which is at the top of a longer flight of steps; next to this is a representation of an Eastern street, and these streets run on each side between the houses and a central building, which is really a stage upon a stage. This central stage is provided with a curtain and has movable scenery, such as we are accustomed to see in our theatres. The house on the left is Pilate's house; on the right is the house of Annas, the high priest. In the central building the living pictures or tableaux are arranged, and the scenes representing the inside of buildings—such as the inside of the Temple, the meeting of the Sanhedrim, the Last Supper—are shown; and on the rest of the stage the out-of-door scenes are played.

Now, while we are waiting patiently for the beginning of the performance, let us consider for a moment what it is that we are going to see. We are about to see some 400 Oberammergau villagers—men, women and children—represent by speech and action the scenes of suffering through which Christ passed, from his joyful entry into Jerusalem until his crucifixion and resurrection—the passion or suffering (for that is what the word "passion" means) of Christ. The players will be dressed as it is supposed Christ and his disciples and the people about him were actually dressed; but they will all talk their own native German language. It will do you no harm before reading through this talk if you would take the trouble to read the account of the Passion as it is written in the New Testament.

Now the cannon has given the signal for the play to begin, and with the blue sky above the stage and all bathed in shifting sunshine, both of which gave a feeling of intense reality, we are carried back in imagination some 1,867 years, and this is what passes before us:—

As soon as the echo of the cannon's one note, taken up by the mountains close by, had died away, from the doors on the verandah on each side, one half from one side and the other half from the other, the chorus steps with wonderful grace and dignity and arrange themselves in a semicircle across the front of the stage, with their leader and the speaker in the centre. The chorus number thirty-four; each is dressed in a white tunic, with a gilt band round the waist, and a long coloured cloak hanging from the shoulder; and there is the same order of colours on either side of the two central figures.

The chorus enters at the beginning of every scene, and by song or speech explains the subject of the coming scene, and then retires, and before most of the scenes the curtain on the central stage is drawn aside, and we see a living picture or tableau, taken from Old Testament stories, having some special bearing on which will immediately follow.

As soon as the chorus has passed out of sight through the verandah, we hear sounds of rejoicing, across the back of the stage and down towards us along the side streets on to the front of the stage passes a crowd of rejoicing folk, with a plentiful sprinkling of children, whose shrill voices sound out in their song of "Hosanna to the Son of David," and in the midst appears Christ on an ass, which is led by the beloved disciple John. This day of the entry of Christ into Jerusalem and the passing along her streets is full of brightness and joy, and the little children taking part crowd with loving eagerness round the Master with the tender earnest face and dignified steps.

The procession comes to the Temple; the money changers are there; the merchants, the buyers and sellers of doves—all at work on the very Temple court itself. Christ has seen them; the indignant words, "My house should be a house of Prayer for all folks, but you have made it a den of thieves," escape his lips; the lash is raised; the tables overturned; the doves let loose; the buyers and sellers driven out; and the seeds of bitter hate begin to sprout and grow. The merchants are full of wrath, their trade is hindered. "By what power doest thou this?" The priests are angered too. "How canst thou forbid what our holy council allows?" So the common cause—the downfall of Christ—brings the two folk, for reasons so different, together: they join hands for the overthrow of their enemy.

The priests call the people together, and soon rouse their bad and narrow feelings. The same crowd which just now cries "Hosanna" is now shouting "Away with this Prophet." No, not quite the same crowd; there are few women in it and no children; these had sympathy with the tenderness of Christ, which left room for no bigotry.

The High Council holds a sitting and schemes for the life of Christ, and a reward is offered for information as to where he can be found.

While so much ill-feeling is roused against him, Christ goes to Bethany, and we see the supper at the house of Simon, and Mary anointing the feet of Christ, and hear Judas grumble at the waste of precious ointment which could have been sold to help fill the emptiness of the common purse.

At Bethany Christ bids farewell to his beloved friends, Lazarus, Mary, and Martha before he goes to Jerusalem for the last time, One more and still sadder farewell before the journey can be taken, and that is to his mother. "Mother! Mother! For the tender love and motherly care which you have given me in the three-and-thirty years of my life receive the thanks of thy Son."

The disciples Peter and John are sent to Jerusalem to secure an upper room for the eating together with the twelve disciples of the Easter lamb.

The anxiety of Judas about the money affairs of himself and the disciples should Christ leave them, makes the temptation of the merchants to betray Christ for a sum of money too strong, and before the High Council Judas accepts and takes the bribe.

All is ready at Mark's house, and the Master desirous of doing something for those he loved, before a final parting passes from one to the other of the disciples and washes their feet. They join in a last meal together. A sad meeting for all of them, and one which we bring into remembrance now as often as we join in what we call the Lord's Supper.

The bread is broken and blessed and placed by Christ's loving hand into the mouth of each disciple; the cup is filled and blessed and offered by him to each disciple; and the sign given to the betrayer that Christ knew how he had fallen into temptation—all this we see before us.

The agony in the breast of Judas when repentance comes, but too late; the agony of Christ in the Garden when Christ felt the weight of the sacrifice he was making—the giving up of a young life; the kiss of betrayal, followed by the quiet surrender of Christ to the bitter shouting rabble, is shown with a depth of dignity which moves to tears.

Now let us stop and pause.

Four thousand of us have sat for over four hours as still as mice, looking and listening with hearts always, and eyes sometimes full, while these simple-lived peasants have shown us in word and picture those few days in the life of Christ. And at this point there is an interval which we use by having a hurried meal. Thos. Hodgetts Gordon.

AGAINST OVERWORK.

THERE is no passage in the address delivered by Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE at the close of the session at Manchester College last June that went more directly home than that in which he warned his hearers against the lamentable results of overwork. "I have observed," said Mr. BROOKE, "that many men exhaust their vitality too soon."

I have seen, both in the Church and in Nonconformity, a number of men who, at the age of thirty-five or forty, seem cut off from progress. They will go on doing their duty to the end of life, but they will not advance further. They have lost joy and animation. Life for them is set into grey uniformity. The things to be done day after day are done with grim conscientiousness, but they will never do any more. There is no originality; they are tired out. I know few things which disturb me with so much sorrow.

It was not, he proceeded to say, that these men had worked too hard and drained themselves dry, though that was sometimes the case; it was that they had worked in one monotonous groove, and had no variety in their life; and he pleaded that every man who is to be a minister—and this we may take for all, and not merely for a particular class—should see to it that he has interests beyond his special work, and should live as far as possible in the whole.

It is unhappily the fact that never before in the world's history has the danger been so great of the manifold evils which result from overwork; never before has there been such stress and strain, and so much of the weary monotony due to excessive specialisation in various occupations. Thus for the preservation of sanity, both in mental and moral life, there has never been so much need for serious and persistent efforts to secure the relief of variety of interest and occupation and seasons of quietness and rest.

In this summer time our thoughts turn naturally to one great resource, which to some extent, at least, is open to all. If we are to seek variety of interest and occupation, and of the most restful kind, to get away from self and out of the grooves of our special work, there is surely no more wholesome or delightful refuge than in the open country and in the quiet ways of Nature. And if we are bidden as far as possible to "live in the whole," we certainly must not neglect any opportunity of growing familiar with the land in which we live, its wealth of beauty and all the wonders of its manifold life.

If we speak here of ministers, as Mr. BROOKE did in his address, it is because we have one or two special things to say in regard to their work and opportunities; but the main lines of thought are applicable to all workers alike.

Summer is the special season for rest in the open country, but the true companionship with Nature is for every season, and happy indeed are they who know how to secure for themselves that constant refreshment and refuge from the cares, the monotony, and the strain of daily life. He who has a garden of his own and enjoys the constant care of it has an unfailing resource. There is not only the restful delight in beautiful things, the daily greeting of the flowers throughout the greater part of the year, but there is the quiet study of the laws of growth, friendly interests in the vicissitudes of every plant, and the linking of this little miniature world with the whole marvellous order of living things. The old legend says that EVE was first tempted in a garden, but certain it is that many evil spirits are driven out of a man who goes to dig in his garden and forgets himself in the love of his flowers. But for those dwellers in towns to whom a garden of their own is not possible, there are still the public gardens and the parks, and best of all the open country, where, if not the same active participation in the quiet life of nature, a large measure of the same intimate companionship may be enjoyed. Especially in the open country, in the search for flowers and the study of the character of a district, with the wider outlook not possible in a town, there is endless refreshment for tired and self-centred lives. There are, no doubt, many people who would say they do not care for flowers, and find little pleasure in the solitary country; but the sense of beauty can be trained, and the interest in all living things. A man may begin the study of some field of Nature simply from a sense of duty, to compel himself to different thoughts; but it will go very hard with him if it is long before the interest deepens and becomes in his life a fountain of pure joy.

Where Nature is sadly impoverished in unlovely manufacturing districts Art may bring some relief; but there are surely very few towns from which it is not possible to reach some genuine piece of open country, where quietness may be found and the secret of peace at the heart of Nature. Of recent years there has been an immense gain in this respect through the greater range put within reach of many thousands of our people by means of the bicycle. Hard things are sometimes said of it, and it is doubtless open to abuse, like every other new measure of liberty achieved by man; but, in all seriousness, we would say that in countless lives the bicycle has been a very real regenerating force. Its easy flight across the country comes as a new sense, with delightful exhilarating motion; it carries its possessor swiftly by beautiful ways out of himself and far from worry and distraction and depression, giving new thoughts, fresh interests, and a great wealth of larger vision. Freedom and power and the rest and refreshment of a new delightful exercise are what it gives: better than many medicines it has been for the health—physical, mental, and moral—of our young people, and many of their elders. A thoughtful congregation has not infrequently seen to it that the minister's library is sufficiently furnished, for his sake and their own. A benefit, hardly, if at all, less essential, would be secured, if in every case where it was practicable, this new gift, for healthier and more vigorous and cheerful life, were placed within reach of the minister and his wife.

The bicycle, like a garden, is for all seasons, if not exactly for all weathers; but now, at the height of summer, comes the further thought of the need of a proper holiday. They are not wise who persuade themselves that it does not matter. Those congregations are more than unwise who do not see to it that their ministers are set absolutely free for a season of genuine rest. What Nature has to give to secure us in the possession of sane and thoroughly effective powers may belong to the happy companionship of daily life, and yet for those whose work lies in town something more is needed, and the best gift of all is gained by those who are able for a time to leave the scenes of their habitual work and find some quiet place where they can be absolutely given up to the restfulness and joy of companionship with Nature in beautiful country. This is not a surrender of the nobility of human effort, the heroism of victory in moral strife, which makes the greatness of our humanity; it is simply a thankful acceptance of the gift of divine peace, for a completer living in the Whole, that out of rest and joy a better strength and clearer wisdom may be gained. It is for the salvation of our life, not to be neglected without grievous loss.

UNITARIAN AND TRINITARIAN.

Sir,—I have read with interest Mr. Beeby's friendly rejoinder to my comments on his previous communication to you, and I will endeavour, as concisely as I can, to notice the principal points that he makes.

I may pass over his first three paragraphs, leaving the reader to form his own judgment between Mr. Beeby and myself. In his fourth paragraph he complains that I have misunderstood the sentence in which he spoke so disparagingly—as it seemed to me—of following Christ as a teacher, and he explains that "the whole purport of the remark is that Christians cannot worship God apart from Christ, that one must include the Son together with the Father and the Holy Spirit in one's worship of the one God." But the explanation does not, in my view, make Mr. Beeby's case any better. I hold that the Christian can, and that many Christians do, worship God apart from Christ, and that in simple and direct prayer to God the inclusion of a Trinity of persons is to many most Christian minds utterly impossible. And I maintain that this view is in absolute accord with the teaching of Jesus, who gives us what we call "The Lord's Prayer" as a type of the purest worship of God, wherein we can discover no reference either to his own person or to any Trinity, but are sent direct to the Father. And at the risk of being rebuked for the preference, I am bound to say that, with a very real respect for Athanasius, I still rank Jesus above him as a teacher both of religion and of theology.

Then Mr. Beeby tells us that what I call the religion of Jesus is rather the theology of the Synoptics. "Religion" and "theology" are words attaching respectively to the emotional and the intellectual aspects of the same supreme truths, and the distinction between them at this point is not, perhaps, quite relevant. But if Mr. Beeby wishes us to distinguish between the teaching of the Synoptics and the original teaching of Jesus I am willing to do so, only I shall seek the differentiation of the teaching of Jesus from that of the Synoptics, not in the direction of a more scholastic theology, or even a more Pauline or Johannine theology, but in a still simpler, intenser, and more unadulterated sense of the communion of the human soul with God and the perfect and blessed fatherhood of God. Nor do I know of any documents in which Mr. Beeby can show us a more authentic version of the teaching of Jesus than the Synoptic Gospels.

But Mr. Beeby declares that "the symbol of 'Father' does not by itself indicate the contents of the Christian faith," and that this symbol "is as inadequate as any other symbol of God." The first contention he supports by reminding us that "Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, have all believed in an Omnipotent Father." Yes, but the Father revealed by Jesus is not only omnipotent; he is tender, sympathetic, ready to enter into closest communion with his children; and the relation of the children to the Father set forth by Jesus is something immeasurably more beautiful and holy than that of the philosophies and theologies Mr. Beeby enumerates. Hence it seems to me extraordinary that Mr. Beeby should think this symbol, as used by Jesus, "as inadequate as any other symbol of God." To me it appears to be a marvellous solvent of the problems of theology and religion, a key to unlock many mysteries, a revelation unique for its comparative adequacy—adequacy not indeed for a full account of God, but for presenting Him in His relation to us, which is the only aspect in which we can possibly know Him. Mr. Beeby's criticism on this symbol does not cut very deep. Why not "Mother" too, he asks. Simply because in the environment of Jesus the conception of motherhood had not yet reached its proper beauty and exaltation, and the mingled relation of supreme wisdom and authority with tenderness and sympathy found most natural expression in the name of the male parent. Why not daughters as well as sons? Mr. Beeby further asks. Why not indeed? I am not aware that Jesus any where draws a line excluding women from the fatherhood of God. I understand him to teach that we are all God's children, the sisters no less than the brothers.

And so when Mr. Beeby says that "the Father is distinguished with us as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and that "the symbol has no meaning except in relation to the Son," I think that in the first statement he is using language which can only be accepted if we attach to it no exclusive meaning, and that in the second he is missing the whole tenor of the religion of Jesus and the whole purport of the Christian gospel.

When Mr. Beeby tells us that Unitarians "cannot afford to deny the value of the formula of the orthodox creed" because it "guards" the "great truth" of the Trinity, he will hardly expect the ordinary Unitarian, who does not believe the doctrine of the Trinity to be a truth, to concur with him.

Mr. Beeby points out that Unitarianism has at some periods of its history degenerated into Deism; which is, perhaps, true. But Trinitarianism also has frequently degenerated into very gross forms; and we must not judge great theologies by their degenerations. Unitarianism has in our time shown a capacity to rise into an idealism of a profoundly spiritual type, and to discover the harmony between the Gospel of Christ and the highest scientific and philosophical thought of our time, which it does not seem to some of us that the orthodox theology has attained.

Finally, let me assure Mr. Beeby that I am not "impatient of theology altogether." On the contrary, it is to me the most profoundly interesting of all studies. It is only of certain theological methods that I am impatient. The material for theology appears to me to lie in the facts of human nature and the experience of the soul in its search for God; and I enter my respectful protest against the method which seeks it chiefly in the writings of men who lived before the days of critical philosophy, and who certainly had much unscientific prepossession.

It will probably be unnecessary that I should further continue this correspondence. My only wish has been that the case between our respective theologies should not go by default; and I have now stated my reasons for dissenting from Mr. Beeby as clearly as I can. The upshot is that he is a Trinitarian while I am a Unitarian, and that the two positions are by no means identical. But I can assure him of my hearty respect and goodwill. For my part I prefer to seek reconciliation and fellowship in a spirit of tolerance and sympathy rather than in any attempt to make out that two widely different lines of thought really mean the same thing.

MEDIÆVALISM.

Sir,—If I refer to Mr. Fripp's recent sermons as magnificent, I probably do but echo many of your readers' sentiments. They have been some of the most stimulating writings I have met with for a long time; and it is not easy, following where and how he leads, to allow one's own critical faculty to come into play. But was Mediævalism all that he claims it to have been? With Newman and Ruskin and Morris we may well view with dismay "the sordid commercialism of the present day"; but we need not run down railways with their capability of transferring tired city workers to scenes of natural beauty, nor is there any necessity for crediting "the worldliness, inconsistency, pride," &c., of the present age to the Renaissance. If this latter was not an unmitigated blessing (what things, however good in themselves, are?), was it not one of the greatest blessings that could befall Europe at that time? Was not thought fettered in all directions save in that of unprofitable and foolish scholasticism? Were not the peoples of Europe crushed down under a sacerdotal superstition of Pagan origin that kept them in dense ignorance and mental bondage?

Is it true that artisans were healthy and happy in their work? Skilful they were without doubt; happy in a sense they might have been—if men can be happy without freedom of thought or speech; but healthy! Who has not read of the terrible pestilences that repeatedly more than decimated those countries where "were cities beautiful almost beyond our dreams"? Nor must we think that the artisan class was either so large or important a one as is implied; its members must have been but a small proportion of the whole, and what were the lives of the larger labouring class? In those days villenage and serfdom was their lot—conditions scarcely contributive to happiness.

And if we are reminded of the "kings, preachers, poets and saints, beside whom our great men often seem little more than children," let us also remember that only the names of a few—and those the heroes—have come down to us; and, further, that very often what makes them heroes is not so much their own greatness, as the littleness that was the characteristic of their contemporaries.

Whether a faith in God and in immortality was at the heart of this heroism, at least in its higher sense, may also be questioned. The belief in God was a belief in One that had doomed to endless future woe the bulk of mankind; and the belief in immortality was confined to the wearing of golden crowns (see Signorelli's picture at Orvieto, and the various representations of Paradise by Beato Angelico, Giotto and others) by a few—and this within sight of Hell and its tortures. Of course I know this was not Dante's view, but Dante had "to eat the salt of others"; neither he nor his views were tolerated by those in authority in those "Golden days!"

And if a Savonarola arose, what was his fate? Savonarola drew no such rosy pictures of Florence, then at the full zenith of its fame. And what was the life of Francis but a protest against the iniquities of his time?

The Renaissance re-revealed to the world the classic glories of Greece; it made the Reformation possible, and laid the foundation for the grander and nobler views of the universe of later times. Do not let us charge it with the follies and hypocrisies of the present.

S., 10s.; Members of Comber Unitarian Church, £3; Kidderminster (New Meeting) Sunday School, 15s. 7d.; W. D. Fritchley, 5s.; A. R. K. (additional), £1; A. Adams, 5s.; W. J. Hands (additional), £1 1s., making altogether £2,208 4s. received, of which £2,150 has been remitted to India. The question has arisen as to whether the time has come for the closing of the Relief Fund; but after reading the following letter and report from India, I feel averse to taking this step for the present. The need is so great and likely to continue that financial help will be required for some time to come. Contributions may be sent to me as usual to Essex Hall.

By the last mail Mr. A. M. Bose writes from Calcutta, after acknowledging receipt in all of £1,900, and a cheque for Rs. 200, as follows:—"I send a brief report of the work done directly under the Brahmo Somaj Committee in the two centres at Khandwa and Mortakka, and through the agency of Brahmo volunteers who have proceeded from Bengal to devote themselves to this work of Famine Relief.

Since the date of the report, which comes down to June 26 last, a further sum of Rs. 6,000 has been assigned for the work in and about Mortakka (Central Provinces). It will also be of interest to you to know that a certain amount has been collected here by the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, and two Brahmo workers have been sent by that Somaj to Ajmere to open a new centre for Famine Relief at that place. Should the need continue, we have received promise of personal help for the work from two prominent Brahmo gentlemen of Lahore, in Punjab, who are prepared to open another centre from the beginning of next month, and to devote themselves to the work of relief. Everything now depends on the monsoon, and all India is waiting with deep anxiety its course and progress. Should, indeed, the rains be deficient, then God help poor India! In any case, and under the most favourable circumstances, much help will yet be needed to set the unhappy people of the famine-stricken tracts on their legs again, and give them seed-corn, cattle, implements of agriculture, and the barest necessaries of life, until the earth and the seasons in their bounty supply once more those necessaries. This work of even the most meagre restitution will, indeed, be a gigantic one, and it is to be hoped the Government and private charity will not fail in this dark hour of need.

One amongst the many legacies of the Famine will be the number of orphans left behind. Several of these are being fed and supported by our workers in the Central Provinces. But it seems many of these miserable waifs of humanity will be left on our hands when the famine has passed away, and we have to look forward to this contingency. Some correspondence is, in fact, already passing on this subject between our workers, and the Deputy Commissioners or the chief Government official of the district in which they are working, and inquiries are being made in respect of the matter."

Report of the Brahmo Somaj Committee's Famine Relief operations, from the last week of April to the last week of June, 1900:—It was on April 15 last that the Brahmo Somaj Committee, on receiving the first remittance from England (Rs. 7,470.13.1) for purposes of famine relief in India, decided that out of this amount Rs. 1,000 be sent to the Honourable Mr. Justice Ranade, of Bombay, Rs. 500 to Lahore (if necessary), and Rs. 6,000 be appropriated for the purpose of opening a relief centre in the Central Provinces with Brahmo workers whose services might be available. More remittances came in; later on and within the period under review Rs. 2,000 was sent to Bombay, and Rs. 7,700 was appropriated for the work in the Central Provinces. No money was sent to Lahore, as there seemed to be no immediate necessity.

For the Central Provinces work Khandwa was chosen as the centre, as being just on the borders of Rajputana and the C. P.; it would serve as a good base of operations for places in both where the distress was reported to be the severest. Babus Lalit Mohon Das, M.A., Sudhir Chunder Banerjee, B.A., and Indu Bhusan Roy, started for Khandwa on the April 21, and Babu Haralal Roy on the 22nd, and these were joined by Babu Brojogopal Neogi on the way to Bankipur. The workers arrived at Khandwa on the 26th, and work was commenced on the 27th. Later on the work was divided between Khandwa and Mortakka (only a few miles from the former), the latter being a very good base for giving relief to the famished people of the Holkar State. In the first week of June Babus Lalit Mohon Das, Sudhir Chandra Banerjee, and Indu Bhusan Roy came back, and Babus Kashi Chuder Gupta and Akhoy Kumar Lodh from Chittagong went to Mortakka to take their place. On June 21 Babu Brojogopal Neogi left Mortakka for Bankipur, and after a short interval returned to Mortakka on July 4.

The following are the methods of relief adopted during the period under review:—

At Khandwa—

(1) Distributing pice.
(2) Distributing grains.
(3) Distributing cloth.
(4) Giving regular family help.
(5) Supplying drinking water.

At Mortakka—

In addition to all the above,

(6) A free "kitchen" for daily feeding people with khichuri.
(7) Attending patients and distributing homœopathic medicines.
(8) Taking charge of a number of orphans.
(9) Disposing of dead bodies.

The total amount appropriated out of the fund for this period was Rs. 7,700, of which about Rs. 6,300 was actually spent, leaving a balance of about Rs. 1,400.

LITERATURE.

A FAITH FOR TO-DAY.†

All who have any knowledge of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's work at Brighton will gladly welcome this book of sermons. They were preached in his own church before he started on that South African tour which resulted in so severe and dangerous an illness, and they are sent out just when his many friends are rejoicing at his recovery. The very events of the past five years' history of Union-square Chapel would give an interest to this volume. That Mr. Campbell should have come to a nearly empty meeting-house in a narrow lane; that within so short a time his congregation should have felt it necessary to take over a much larger church; that Sunday after Sunday every available sitting should have been regularly occupied, and large numbers of visitors regretfully turned away; that the congregation have now decided to erect a Nonconformist Cathedral, at a cost of about twenty thousand pounds; that such things should be the outcome of a successful five years of preaching, would of itself give an attraction to this book. But it were wise not to approach these sermons with the bias that expects the fireworks of a Talmage, or the literary charm of a Newman or a Stopford Brooke. Mr. Campbell is nearer in line with his great predecessor of Trinity Chapel; there is the earnestness, though not quite the same rich sympathy, that gave Robertson his power, and the almost complete absence of regard for the finish of style.

These sermons are called "A Faith for To-day," with the sub-title, "Suggestions towards a System of Christian Belief." The young preacher recognises in the laity—at least, in the more thoughtful of them—a genuine desire to know more clearly the elements of religion. Ordinary pulpit ministrations are not always sufficiently definite; too much is taken as known, and the hearers are often left rather with vague feelings than with well-directed thoughts upon religion. So, to remedy this among his own people, Mr. Campbell determines upon a course of instruction in a series of discourses that aim at mental strengthening, convincing, building-up. So he has given mainly a book of deliberate affirmations that often read with a vigour that suggests their birth in the speaker's immediate experience, and have little of the odour of mediæval incense about them. Though, now and again, there is what almost amounts to a pedantic toying with discarded dogma or bits of ecclesiastical history, the main body of the sermons goes to express reasoned grounds for a few religious certainties. Anything that appears doubtful, or that lacks the support of our inward witness, may be safely neglected. A man's concern to-day can only be with things that really appear true, and that promise to help him. "Our theology must be in harmony with the rest of our knowledge," he says. And elsewhere, "Some persons seem to think of Christianity as a sort of supernatural revealed system, worthy of acceptation whether the human mind can grasp it and appropriate it or not." With such people he has no sympathy. Seek the true, and teach it, is his ideal; and he certainly knows how to teach. His earlier training has not been thrown away; in the far more difficult field of religion he shows himself a masterly instructor. His sermons are, each of them, admirable pieces of construction, with those useful heads and brief outlines, and wise recapitulations, that make an instructional sermon easy to remember. A congregation so led will not complain of "doctrinal sermons" for a season; they find it a healthy intellectual, as well as spiritual, exercise to follow their pastor through his well-arranged garden of teachings.

* A mixture of rice and pulse.

† "A Faith for To-Day." By the Rev. R. J. Campbell, B.A. J. Clarke and Co. 6s.

While keeping far away from any attempt at literary effect (probably because he is an extempore preacher), and making no effort at softening the short blunt sentences, or at giving a smooth connection of ideas, Mr. Campbell nevertheless is in close touch with things literary by his habit of quotation. He shows his wide and careful reading in the number of lines and verses that light up his pages, and that range over a wide field, from Omar Khayyam to Browning, from Clement of Alexandria to Miss Cobbe, and that include such varied types as Tennyson and Anselm, Theodore Parker and Canon Gore, Harnack and Spurgeon, Martineau and John Stuart Mill. And always the passages enter so naturally, not forced, or huddled out pell-mell, as in the patchwork of a preacher who lives with a commonplace book in his hand. One of the uses of these quotations is especially noticeable, and that is the page of detached sayings that precedes each sermon. These extracts go home with rare point, giving an exact outline of what is to follow, and serving as a good reminder on referring again to some particular sermon.

One weakness, incidental to all extempore preaching, is the temptation to the epigrammatic. A phrase may sometimes nail your purpose in the memory, as when Mr. Campbell says, "The proper attitude for a Christian is a solemn optimism," or "Not that God is, but what He is, is the all-important question." But one is, at first, confused by, say, "Christ is our window; self-consciousness is the eye of the soul," and simply worried by such a sentence as "Mind without morals is monstrosity," or the pseudo-Jacobean "No God, no religion."

Probably the chief readers of the book will be ministers, and for them one great recommendation of it is that it answers to Emerson's description of a true book—one that puts us in a working mood. While the reader may frequently differ from Mr. Campbell's conclusions, he finds thought stirred into activity; it is almost like a personal conference with the speaker, and the abundance of material gives the mind food to reject or to digest. Indeed, in this, Mr. Campbell is as prodigal as was another of the Union-square ministers, the well-known Paxton Hood, of whom it was said that one of his discourses gave enough material for a dozen by many other preachers. Probably it would be a good thing for many ministers if they were to take one of these sermons, say the one on the problem of Pain, and, acting on a very old practice, make a careful summary. It might surprise them to find how little padding, and what a body of matter, these clear-cut paragraphs contain.

The book and its method are one; definite and practical, both in form and essence, attempting to provide tangible ground for a modern believer in religion; not to bolster up exploded dogmas by sheer assumption, as Canon Mason does in his "The Faith of the Gospel"; nor to be narrowed to pure humanitarianism; nor to indulge in the thin phrases of a vague emotionalism or of a pietistic sentimentality. Here we have a young preacher of independent judgment, capable of making timid deacons shiver, telling out frankly what he thinks may be truthfully said on the chief points that are left for faith to-day. In the thirteen sermons he treats of the paramount reality of religion, of God, of Jesus the man, and Jesus the Saviour, of moral evil, of pain, of prayer, of the Holy Spirit, and of immortality. In all of these he has kept himself in touch with what has been held in the past, but he treats them in an entirely free and helpful fashion. He will not be bound in his thoughts either by Church or Bible. "Instead of the voice external," he says, "we now trust the voice internal, and all ideas that reach us through the medium of Church, or country, or literature, or science, or personal testimony are, if they are to be accepted as authoritative, tested by that mysterious power which we carry within ourselves, and which is a witness for the divine sacredness of human nature." Even the Bible is no longer unchallenged. It, too, must be tested by that inner power of ours. "We have to bring something to the Bible; it presumes a certain antecedent religious experience."

With as free a mind as possible, then, the preacher attacks these great questions. For the enduring reality of religion he finds not only its continuance in the race speaking for it, but the very constitution of man feels after it, seeks union with God, asserts some creed that is finally ratified, not by Bible or Church, but by the spirit in man. The idea of God he finds rather Traditional than Intuitional, and in its highest known form coming to us from the revelation in Christ. "God's nature is essentially like that of the historical Christ." Then we enter upon the problems of moral evil and pain. Here it is interesting to find how surely the conception of the Fall of Man, as an event in Time, has passed away from really living orthodoxy. Mr. Campbell has no better solution than has long been given for these mysteries of moral evil and pain: he can but find in them the needful experiences for the attainment of good, the "O felix culpa" of the Roman hymn that looks to the redemption; but he grasps the nettle boldly when he says, "Sin is the consequence of a God-ordained bias," and calls the theory Neo-Calvinism. The four sermons on the historical Christ, the Incarnation-idea, and Redemption, will be to most of us the weakest and least convincing of the series. Their main basis, that so depended on by Professor Gardner in "Exploratio Evangelica," the test of experience, is apt to be misleading, for surely like experiences have been realised by members of other faiths than the Christian—and they have usually assigned them directly to God, not to Jesus of Nazareth. The old thought of God's "loneliness" if no Trinity exists still satisfies Mr. Campbell. But in the remaining sermons, even in the major part of that on the Holy Spirit, we breathe the open air again. Throughout the book there is a sweet tenderness and deep reverence for the person of Jesus that recalls the fascinating mysticism of "Rutherford's Letters." Altogether "A Faith for To-day" is a refreshing appeal to the "average Englishman" (Mr. Campbell's pet phrase). Sometimes the daring questioning is carried to the point of danger by this man who has but reason and a reasoned faith behind him, and not that powerful Church which is at the back of the Jesuit who loves to practise such things. It reminds one of Cudworth, whose arguments for Atheism are so frankly stated in "The Intellectual System of the Universe" that he hardly disproves them afterwards. But, as with so many liberals of the "orthodox" bodies, we find some curious inconsistency. In Mr. Campbell it takes the form of a belief in "development of doctrine." For an Independent this seems so strange. It seems as though it ought to have landed him, as it did Newman, in the Catholic Church. For example, he acknowledges that "the doctrine of the Trinity does not come first in the order of experience," and fully recognises its slow growth in history, as when he says: "Far rather would I try to reproduce something of the experience of the simple Galileans who first knew and loved Jesus than begin with fourth-century propositions about the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father." Yet he accepts these conciliar decrees—with a reserve of Sabellianism, perhaps—and acknowledges that the doctrine was unknown to the Apostles. One wonders why he stopped short here and did not continue to accept the Councils right up to the Vatican. An evolutionist, even in doctrine, should be thorough. But we are all inconsistent somewhere.

So we put down the book, glad to have met with one who has the ears of the crowd and still largely thinks for himself; one, too, who will not weaken his word by obeying Dr. Horton's advice in "Verbum Dei" and leaving all learning out of the pulpit. Himself delighting in the philosophy of things, Mr. Campbell never fears to give his congregations out of his intellectual and spiritual best, and we part from his book with our sense and hope of the power of the pulpit increased, and our wish that the preacher may speedily be restored to his flock, leading them on through such high thoughts as this with which we close:—

In the hour of sorrow it is the spiritual man who is the strong man; in hours of difficulty and danger it is the man of faith who stands firm. There is something possible to saintship which is impossible to stoicism. The stoic may defy the untoward and calamitous in life, but to do so and remain tender and gentle is the achievement of the saint. It is faith in the living God that works the greatest marvels in human history.

SOME REMINISCENCES.

ON looking through "Memories,"* by C. Kegan Paul, I find several passages that bring to me some interesting reminiscences. Mr. Kegan Paul, it may be necessary to remind the younger generation, was formally Vicar of Sturminster Marshall, in Dorsetshire. He was then a Broad Churchman, but becoming first a crypto-Unitarian and afterwards an Agnostic and Positivist, he resigned his living, and entered into partnership with the late eminent publisher, Mr. King, and subsequently with Mr. Trench, a younger son of the late Archbishop Trench. By a not unusual form of reaction, Mr. Kegan Paul, not many years ago, became a Roman Catholic though of the more liberal English school.

The older readers of THE INQUIRER will remember the attempt to establish a "Free Christian Union," of which Dr. Martineau was the prime mover, and Mr. Clayden and the late Mr. Edward Enfield the secretaries. It was intended to take up a work for which it was assumed that a doctrinal society like the British and Foriegn Unitarian Association was unfitted—the representation of congregations founded on perfectly free and open Trusts—although it seems still to be an open question whether there can possibly be a free and open religious Trust which at least recognises God, Immortality, Worship, and Conscience. The initial and fundamental mistake in this laudable attempt to realise a real Catholic society was that it originated almost exclusively with well-known Unitarians, and those more or less in avowed sympathy with them, and, therefore, as the event soon showed, could unite nobody but those who were already in more or less theological agreement with each other. It was also weighted with an elaborate prospectus or statement of principles, very eloquent, very characteristic of Dr. Martineau, and, so far as I remember, bristling with disputed propositions. I cannot here attempt to give a history of this well-intentioned but entirely premature movement. The surviving secretary, Mr. Clayden, would confer a favour upon many of the readers of THE INQUIRER, if from the documents in his possession he gave an account of the short-lived Society in the formation of which he took a prominent part. The following passage from Mr. Kegan Paul's work gives at least the main outlines of a movement which at first was thought to threaten almost the existence of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, but which after publishing its first annual report, came to an end, just one year after its formation :—

The Free Christian Union.

About the year 1870, while retaining my liking for ornate services and a great deal of music in church, my opinions had become practically Unitarian. I had for some time been a pretty constant contributor to the Theological Review—an extinct quarterly, then edited by the Rev. Charles Beard. I was quite prepared to join a society, which was, in fact, Unitarian, called the Free Christian Union. The intention was to promote, if possible, a general union of all persons holding Unitarian theology within the various orthodox churches and sects. It was joined by a very few clergy of the Church of England, a few French Protestant pastors, among whom the most important was the Rev. Athanase Coquerel, fils, and a few Congregational ministers. We were all extremely in earnest, and unable to see that there was a comic side to the whole movement. . . . The Free Christian Union began and ended its operations by a service in London, at which two sermons were preached, one by Athanase Coquerel, the other by myself. To say that my sermon was one that I had preached at Eton long before I went to Sturminster, with the smallest possible alterations, is simply to say that an Unitarian theology had long been practically mine.

I well remember being present at this meeting, which was held at the Freemason's Hall, and being struck with the unreality—I will not say the insincerity—of the whole thing. A private preliminary meeting, held at University Hall, and attended by few but Unitarians and "advanced thinkers," was characterised chiefly by a vigorous discussion as to whether the new society should be called a Free Christian or a Free Religious Union, some of the promoters advocating the widest Theistic basis, while the only logical conclusion of their principles seemed to be a basis wide as humanity itself. I remember that it was chiefly Dr. Martineau, always faithful to the Christian idea in its broadest form, that settled the new society on the Christian basis.

The society lingered for one short year, gained but a very small amount of pecuniary support, voted a grant of £5 to one country congregation—King's Lynn—supposed to be established upon a perfectly open trust, and then as if exhausted by that effort gave up the ghost, and remains only in the memory of a few veterans like myself, as a well-intentioned, but premature, and as many at the time thought entirely mistaken effort to realise Catholic union on the vaguest possible principles. The threatened British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the meantime went on its way rejoicing, acquiring every year increased strength and vitality. I may add that one cause of the decease of the Free Christian Union was its publication of a pamphlet by Mr. Henry Sidgwick, advocating insincere Conformity, that is Conformity without any real belief.

There are many other pages of considerable interest in Mr. Kegan Paul's "Memories," but I must limit myself to one or two. Here is an interesting reference to a party which, if not extinct, has lost its chief leaders :—

The Broad Church Party.

I may here say that in my opinion the whole theology of the almost extinct Broad Church party is simply Unitarian. Of course when a distinction had to be made, it was possible to make it by quoting creeds and devotions which had been retained by the Church of England from the old Catholic worship. But what I mean is that the sermons preached in Broad Churches might have been delivered in any Unitarian pulpits, and that Broad Churchmen ignored as far as possible the Catholic side of the teaching of the Church of England. Unitarianism is, however, inconsistent and illogical; the true contradictory of Catholicism is Positivism, though I did not then see it.

Mr. Kegan Paul is no doubt familiar with the phrase "the falsehood of extremes," and it seems to me that more truth is often to be found in the via media than in either of the so-called logical alternatives, and that religion has a deeper root than logic and abstract argumentation, more in the "pure reason" than in reasoning.

The last extract I shall make is of a more personal character, and requires scarcely a word of introduction, as the names mentioned below still linger in the memories of many readers of this article.

Mr. and Mrs. Pike.

Another family with whom I became very intimate were Mr. and Mrs. William Pike, of Wareham. They were Unitarians and strong Liberals, and therefore quite out of the county and clerical society in which we were supposed to live; but they were clever and well-read people, and Mrs. Pike became one of my greatest friends, while I had a cordial regard for her husband. He was engaged in large clay works in the neighbourhood, paying a royalty on the china clay found near Wareham, with a little private railway from the clay pits to Poole harbour, whence it was taken to the potteries. Mr. and Mrs. Pike were friends of Miss Mulock, afterwards Mrs. Craik, the novelist, who drew them in her work "Agatha's Husband."

Mrs. Pike was daughter of an old friend of mine, the Rev. Lewis Lewis, a contemporary of the Revs. William Hincks, Dr. Hutton, Robert Wallace, and Mr. H. E. Howse, at Manchester College, York. After a ministry at Dorchester and other places in the West of England, and finally at Gateacre, near Liverpool, he retired and spent the closing years of his life in a north-western suburb of London. Mr. Pike was a very interesting character with all sorts of amiable eccentricities, and is painted to the life in Miss Mulock's book, which, by the way, is a plea for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister—one of Matthew Arnold's favourite aversions. But the great Matthew, although the ablest of literary critics, had his limitations, and was not quite so infallible as he believed himself to be.

BOOKS FOR NATURE LESSONS.

IN sending you this list of books, useful in preparation of Nature lessons for Sunday-school, I want to say that they are helps in supplementing and directing, but not in replacing, the teacher's own observations :—A. B. Buckley: 1. "Life and her Children," 6s.; 2. "Winners in Life's Race," 8s. 6d.; 3. "Fairy-land of Science," 6s.; 4. "Through Magic Glasses," 6s.; 5. "Moral Teachings of Science," 3s. All published by Edward Stanford, Charing-cross, and subject to usual discount. May be bought second-hand often. No. 1 is perhaps the best to begin with; 2 is a sequel to 1, and deals with the development of back-boned animals; 3 and 4 are physical rather than biological; 5 is an excellent book for adult classes and (in your ear!) for parsons.

Prof. L. C. Miall, F.R.S.: Object-lessons from Nature I., 1s. 6d.; do. II., 1s. 6d. (Cassell and Co.) Excellent cheap handbooks dealing with familiar subjects which, however, need to be better known—e.g. (I.), rabbit, eggs and chickens, primrose, dandelion, common shrimp, insects, &c. Part II.—Air, clouds, water, a river, how plants feed, &c. I strongly recommend these two books as written by one who knows how to teach accurately and fulfils the ideal of a teacher in loving his subject and his pupils equally well. For those who desire to enter into the true spirit of Nature-study I would also recommend — by the same author—1. "Round the Year, a Series of Short Nature Studies," 5s.; 2. "Natural History of Aquatic Insects," 6s.; both published by Macmillan and Co.

For loving appreciation of Nature, and especially of plant life, I know no books more delightful and inspiring than the following two by Eleanor Hughes Gibb: 1. "How Plants Live and Work," 2s. 6d.; 2. "The Making of a Daisy," 2s. 6d. (C. Griffin and Co.) I marvel that these two books are not more generally known and used in our schools.

Many of the books published by the S.P.C.K. are excellent—those especially in their "Romance of Science Series," of which I name Prof. George Henslow's "Making of Flowers," 2s. 6d.; Prof. J. Perry's "Spinning-tops," 2s. 6d.; Prof. C. V. Boys' "Soap-bubbles," 2s. 6d. With regard to these books I would say that teachers using them should be quite familiar with their contents and talk the matter to the children. They are perhaps better suited for week-night classes, with experiments.

In the "Library of Useful Stories," published by George Newnes, Limited, are three I will mention as excellent, though not to the exclusion of many others of the series equally good: 1. Grant Allen's "Story of the Plants"; 2. Sydney J. Hickson's "Story of Life in the Seas"; 3. W. P. Pycraft's "Story of Bird Life." The cheapness of books in this series (9d. net) is an additional recommendation.

Fearing to trespass too much on your space, I will only add a few more which I have found useful with no further note on them. M. C. Cooke's "Toilers in the Sea," 6s.; "Freaks and Marvels of Plant Life," 6s.; "Ponds and Ditches," 2s. 6d.; P. H. Gosse's "Evenings at the Microscope," 4s. (S.P.C.K.); J. E. Taylor's "Geological Stories," 4s. (Hardwicke); J. A. Thomson's "Study of Animal Life," 5s. (Murray); J. E. Taylor's "Half-hours in the Green Lanes" (W. H. Allen and Co.); "Playtime Naturalist," 5s. (Chatto and Windus); "Half-hours at the Seaside," 6s. (Hardwicke).

Probably this list, which is similar to the one I gave at Oxford, will suffice for the present. Many of the books may be bought second-hand, and nearly all are subject to usual discount off published prices. If I can be of any further service to teachers by additional lists or notes on books I will gladly avail myself, as now I do, of your courtesy in publishing them.

AN OLD CHAPEL ENDOWMENT.

The Vicar of Atherton Church v. The Minister and Trustees of Chowbent Chapel.

An Unsuccessful Attempt to Capture an Old Chapel Endowment.

The clerical action in this case, and the recent decision of the Charity Commissioners in favour of the chapel attacked, suggest that publicity may serve the useful purposes of warning other clerics similarly tempted, and of giving information to representatives of other chapels who may ever be called upon to defend their just rights. Even apart from these useful purposes, the case is somewhat interesting in itself. In brief it is this: The Vicar of Atherton in March last laid claim to a small endowment which the Unitarians and their "Presbyterian" or "Protestant Dissenting" predecessors have been in the enjoyment of from its origin, nearly 200 years ago. He appealed to the Charity Commissioners. The main ground upon which the Vicar based his claim was that his present church (the third building on the same site) now stands upon the site of the older Presbyterian chapel of 1645, and that therefore he (the Vicar) was the true successor of the Presbyterian minister to whom this little endowment of £20 was left in 1721 or earlier. In reply to the Vicar's claim, the minister and trustees of the present chapel, erected (not on the old site) in 1721, stated their case historically, legally, and equitably to the Charity Commissioners, with the result that the Commissioners, after full consideration, gave their strong, straight decision that the Vicar had no claim whatever.

For the easier understanding of the interesting documents which follow, it may be as well to explain:—1. That for all practical purposes the words Atherton and Chowbent are interchangeable terms. That is to say, Chowbent is Atherton, and Atherton is Chowbent. Atherton is the older name of the township, and is also the name now mostly used by the inhabitants and the various authorities of the district. This name, Atherton, was derived from the Lords of the Manor. At a later date a prominent farmer, named Chowe, past whose tenement the Liverpool and Manchester stage coaches daily ran, along a very stiff and, in winter time, a dangerous declivity or "bent," seems to have been the cause of the place being known as Chowe's Bent or Chow-Bent. This name appears to have "caught on," both locally and abroad. It still sticks, especially among the older inhabitants, who, however, more often call the district simply "Bent." Thus, for practical purposes, Atherton and Chowbent are one and the same place.

2. Two or three matters of history in connection with Chapel and Church here should also be known. The Presbyterian chapel was the only place of worship here for seventy-seven years before there was an Episccpalian church. In 1645 the first chapel appears to have been built. Early in 1721, young Lord Atherton, then just of age, took this 1645 chapel from its owners and builders. His only "right" for so doing was that the chapel stood on his estate, and the congregation had never had the site conveyed to them by deed; his reason for thus removing the congregation appears to have been political. Be that as it may, the old chapel, taken in this way, was, in 1723, consecrated into an Episcopalian church.

But what of the congregation that had been turned out? They seem to have set to work at once, in 1721, to build the present spacious chapel, the rich dark oak of which is still so much admired, and the historical associations of which—especially those of "General" Wood's day—are so well known in Lancashire. While this chapel was being built the congregation appear to have held worship in "Hag Fold."

One other fact needs noting. When Lord Atherton turned the congregation out of the old chapel early in 1721, the Rev. James Wood (junior) was minister of it. He became minister of the new hapel (the present one) when it was opened in 1722, and, of course, ministered to his chapel-less congregation while they worshipped in "Hag Fold." Wood's ministry of the congregation, succeeding his father of the same name, seems to have extended from 1695 to 1759. This is the famous James Wood who, at the call of his country, in 1715 (five years before he and his people were turned out of their chapel), had taken "the lusty men" of his congregation to Preston, and so ably defended his point of the river there against the "young Pretender," as to earn for himself ever after the title of "General," the grateful thanks of the Government, and a Parliamentary grant of money to cover all his outlay. This money he is said to have used in 1721 to begin the building of the new chapel on a piece of freehold land, where no ground landlord could ever again disturb the congregation.

Now just in this year (1721), two years, be it noted, before the old Chapel was consecrated to Episcopalianism, and while Mr. Wood and his congregation were worshipping in "Hag Fold," and apparently while the new Chapel was being built, the £20 endowment, over which the recent trouble has arisen, was deeded by a Mr. Sanderson, and the Rev. James Wood was the first trustee. In 1730 another deed was made, and Mr. Wood was again the first trustee.

About this period a number of small and varied charities were brought together under one set of trustees, and invested in some cottages and land at Astley, near Atherton. The largest of these charities was Whalley's, and hence the lot came to be known as "Whalley's Charity and Others." The interest on the "Sanderson" charity has been regularly paid to the chapel, at Atherton, until the present year.

Early this year, or late last year, the Vicar of Astley, who happens to be one of the trustees of these "Whalley and Other Charities" raised an objection to this "Sanderson" interest being any longer paid to the Unitarian minister. As it happened, in the month of January, this year, a Commissioner came into the district to inquire into its charities, and Mr. Thomas Smith, the acting trustee of "Whalley and Others," asked the Commissioner what he must do about this "Sanderson" interest which had, until the vicar of Astley's objection, been regularly paid to the Unitarian chapel. In answer to the Commissioner, Mr. Smith stated that the earliest deed in connection with this "Sanderson Charity" was 1721. Then the Vicar of Leigh informed the Commissioner that the Unitarian chapel was not built until 1728! No one representing the chapel was present in the room at the time, or the Vicar of Leigh would have received correction at once by being informed that the chapel was erected in 1721. The correction was given him in the local paper the week following. The Commissioner wisely declared that he could not decide such a matter without full information from both sides, and advised the acting trustee to write to the Charity Commissioners. Then it came out, for the first time, that three vicars were at work on this business, and that it was the Vicar of Atherton who was to claim this endowment! The very smallness of the thing claimed—namely, the yearly interest on £20—the neighbourly feeling which exists between Chapel and Church folk in Atherton, the various good things in which they work together in the township, and the friendly personal relationship between the vicar and the Unitarian minister—made the action all the more painful. The best construction which can be put upon the whole affair is that this is only another instance in which the State Church system tends to make its officials sometimes forget a few of the elementary virtues of life.

The following letters will now speak for themselves :—

Letter of the Secretary, Charity Commission, to Mr. Thomas Smith, the Acting Trustee of the Charity in Question.

Feb. 14, 1900.

Referring to your letter which was received at this office on the 8th inst., I am to request that the grounds on which Mr. Nuttall, the vicar of Atherton, claims to be entitled to the income of Sanderson's Charity may be stated. The Commissioners should also be informed of the denominations which had chapels at Atherton in the year 1721.

The views of the minister of the New Bent Chapel should also be stated.

The Vicar of Atherton's Claim.

Dear Sir,—In my note of last week I explained how it was that I had not replied sooner to the inquiries from the Charity Commissioners respecting the Sanderson Charity. I ought to say that, although I have now been Incumbent of Atherton for nearly thirty years, I only heard of the Charity shortly before the inquiry respecting the charities in the ancient parish of Leigh on January 30 last. The only chapel in Atherton in 1721 was that on the site of my present church. It was used generally but not exclusively by the Presbyterians of that day, for the Vicar of Leigh had the right either personally or by deputy to officiate in the chapel "a large Bible and Book of Common Prayer being provided for the purpose." In 1723 the chapel was consecrated on behalf of the Bishop of Chester by Bishop Wilson, of Sodor and Man.

In 1810 it gave place to a larger brick church, and this was replaced in 1879 by the present stone church, both having been built on the site of the original chapel. I claim, therefore, to be the legitimate successor of the minister of the original chapel.

The statement is made that "the interest of £20 is to be given to a preaching minister for the preaching a sermon every Tuesday in Easter week at the chapel in Atherton or some other place in the neighbourhood." As I am not aware that the Presbyterians in 1721 kept the seasons of the Church, and their successors, the Unitarians, of the present day certainly do not, I think, I may fairly say that the said interest should be paid to the Episcopal representative of Atherton Chapel. During the whole of my residence in Atherton I have never heard of such a sermon being preached in the Unitarian Chapel in Atherton, which was built by subscription for the use of the Presbyterians when the original chapel was consecrated.—Yours faithfully, (Signed) W. Nuttall.

Reply of Minister and Trustees of Chowbent Chapel.

The minister and trustees of the Chowbent Presbyterian (Unitarian) Chapel, Atherton—sometime known as the New Bent Chapel—state with respect to the above charities :—

1. That they have not had an opportunity of perusing the will of the donor of the sum of £20 in question, though they have made search for it, but it appears from Mr. Thomas Smith's letter to the Commissioners of Feb. 7, 1900, that a deed of May 10, 1721, states as follows :—

> "William Sanderson, Schoolmaster, by his Will, gave the interest and improvement of the other £20 to be given to a preaching minister for the preaching of a sermon or lecture yearly upon every Tuesday in Easter week at the chapel in Atherton, or some other place in the neighbourhood for ever."

2. The report of the Commissioners, after an inquiry in 1827, shows that the deed above mentioned was a conveyance from Richard and William Sanderson to certain trustees of some property in Astley in consideration of the sum of £110 of which William Sanderson's total bequest of £40 formed part.

3. It appears from the above, that the bequest was made at an earlier date than 1721 (when there was no episcopal chapel in Atherton, see par. 4), and that the donor and the William Sanderson, party to the Deed of 1721, were two different persons.

4. In answer to the Commissioner's inquiry (by letter to Mr. Smith of Feb. 14, 1900), the minister and trustees state that the only denomination which had a chapel in Atherton, in 1721, was the Presbyterian, of which the Rev. James Wood was the minister from 1699, and that he was afterwards—until the year 1759—minister of the "New Bent" Presbyterian Chapel. For this statement the following official report from the Vicar of Leigh to the Bishop of Chester in 1722-3 is relied upon :—

> "Chowbent, Atherton. Certified anno 1705, £2 15s. per annum. Vide Pap. Reg., but certified anno 1717 by the Vicar of Leigh, that nothing belongs to it that he knows of, but that he hath heard that about £2 10s. was given by Dame Mort formerly. It was built (as he hath been informed) about 1645 by the then Lord of Buisy and his tenants, they building the body of the place and he the chancel. He believes it was never consecrated, and that it hath always been possessed by Presbyterians, who, when the vicar comes to officiate, quit the place, leaving him a large Bible and Common Prayer-book ready for use.
> "Mr. Atherton, the Lord of Buisy, hath now taken it from the Dissenters, and hath proposed to the Governors of the Queen's Bounty to augment it, anno 1722."
> "Mr. Atherton, of Buisy, hath £200 towards augmenting this chapel, 1722, and it was consecrated by the Bishop of Man, anno 1723."
> ("Notitia Cestriensis," II., Part 2, p. 189, edited by the Rev. F. R. Raines, M.A. (one of the Chetham Society's publications).

5. The minister and trustees believe that the successive ministers of their chapel have, from time to time since the bequest became operative until now—a period of nearly, perhaps quite, 200 years—been the undisputed recipients of the income. In proof of this the following evidence is submitted :—

(a.) The statement in Mr. Smith's letter to the Commissioners of February 8 that "this money has been regularly paid to the Presbyterian minister (or his church) in Atherton (now commonly called New Bent or Chowbent Unitarian minister.")

(b.) Accounts of the chapel treasurer are in existence as far back as 1786, and these show that the income has been paid regularly during the whole of that period. This is confirmed by an account-book now in possession of the acting trustee of the charity, which dates back as far as the year 1806, and shows payments to the minister of this chapel from that date to the present time.

(c.) The Rev. James Wood, who was the first named of the trustees in the deeds of 1721 and 1730 (referred to in the Charity Commissioner's Report of 1827) was the minister in 1721 of the "Old Bent" Chapel, and in 1730 of the "New Bent" (the present Unitarian chapel) which was built in 1721 and opened in 1722.

Further, several other of the trustees named in the deeds of 1721, 1730, 1768, and 1798 were members of the congregation of this chapel, and their only interest in these trust funds was in that part received by their minister. For instance, Adam Mort, Benjamin and Richard Meanley, John Mort, Richard Withington, John Valentine, and Peter Withington, whose connection with the chapel is shown by the inscriptions on grave stones in the chapel-yard and mural tablets within the chapel.

Moreover the family of Sanderson have been connected with the chapel ever since its foundation.

(d.) An endorsement of the deed of Jan. 9, 1768, showing "the charities particularly mentioned, by whom left and for what use." Item No. 8 reads :—

> "And the other £20 the interest to be given and paid to the parson of 'New Bent Chapel' to preach a sermon every Tuesday in Easter week." No other chapel than that represented by the writers was ever known by this designation, and therefore it was evidently understood in 1768 that the minister of this chapel was entitled to the income in question.

6. With regard to the condition attached to the bequest we submit that though the present minister of the Atherton Chapel has held the office since Jan. 1, 1891, and has been in regular receipt of the interest of the fund in question, he had never heard, until very recently, that "a sermon or lecture" was connected with it. He had always understood that the income in question was simply the proceeds of an investment made by former trustees for the benefit of the minister of this chapel.

So far as we know "a sermon or lecture yearly upon every Tuesday in Easter week" is not an Episcopalian institution, and has certainly not obtained in the Episcopalian church at Atherton. But a "sermon or lecture" on stated week days was a peculiar institution of Protestant Dissenters in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

By change of circumstances these sermons or lectures of Protestant Dissenters on stated week days have long since fallen into disuse in all parts of the country or have taken some other form. In our own case here the minister lectures in the schoolroom adjoining the chapel, and also in the chapel periodically, but not on "Tuesday in Easter week," that being a holiday time in this district. Note that the Trust says "at the chapel or some other place in the neighbourhood."

Of course the minister is willing to comply with the strict terms of the Trust if needs be, but we are of opinion that the spirit of the Trust is already being adhered to.

7. It is submitted that on the above facts the title of the minister of this chapel to the income from Sanderson's bequest is confirmed by the Dissenters Chapels' Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., C. 45). Also that the claim of the Vicar of Atherton to this fund is barred (by the same statute) unless he can show that the fund was created by an instrument declaring that it was intended to be applied to the promotion of the particular religious doctrines or opinions of the Church of England.

The Charity Commissioners' Decision.

June 19, 1900.

Letter to the Acting Trustee.

Referring to your communication of March 23 last I am to state that in the view of the Commissioners the claim of the Vicar of Atherton to be entitled to the income of Sanderson's Charity has not been established. I am to point out that at the date of the foundation of the charity the Atherton Chapel was generally used as a Presbyterian chapel, and that the income arising from the endowment has been paid to a Presbyterian or Unitarian minister for nearly two hundred years.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Highland Place.—A farewell meeting was held Aug. 2, in connection with the departure of the Rev. E. Robinson Hughes to assume the pastoral charge of the Devonport congregation. The Rev. J. J. George presided. Cordial appreciation of Mr. Hughes's preaching and pastoral powers was shown by the numerous speakers and endorsed by the audience. Mr. Hughes expressed his thanks to his friends at Aberdare, whose kindness he would remember with much pleasure.

Ballymoney.—The members of the Unitarian Church have recently made a presentation of a purse of sovereigns to Miss Matts as a token of their esteem and appreciation of her many acts of kindness in connection with church duties.

Belfast Domestic Mission Church.—The annual excursion of the members, scholars, and friends was held on Wednesday, July 25, the place selected being Helen's Bay, a pleasant little watering-place on the shores of Belfast Lough. The party numbered about 150, which included about thirty of the York-street congregation. On Sunday, July 30, the Rev. G. J. Slipper preached an eloquent and impressive sermon on "The Indian Famine," describing in a terse and graphic manner the horrors and sufferings of our brethren in the East. At the close of the service a collection was taken up on behalf of our local (Lord Mayor's) Indian Famine Fund, a good amount being realised.

Kidderminster.—A garden fête, held on Saturday week, in aid of the church funds, was opened by Mrs. Cecil Harmsworth. Reference was made by the speakers, who included the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, Colonel Talbot, Mr. Thompson (London), and Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, to the late Mr. Richard Eve, who had for many years supported the work of the church. Mr. Thompson, whom Mr. Eve desired to be regarded as Liberal candidate for the borough in succession to himself, spoke particularly of Mr. Eve's excellent work in connection with Masonic schools, and to other philanthropic work in that district and many others.

London: Hackney.—The new Gravel Pit Church will be closed on Sundays, August 19 and 26, and Sept. 2 and 9, to allow for the execution of some repairs and decoration.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday, Aug. 5, Dr. Griffiths tendered his resignation of the pastorate of the Unitarian Church at Pontypridd, to which he succeeded in 1893. The secretary brought the matter before the Church Committee on Sunday evening, when expressions of deep regret were made by every member present. The matter will be further considered on Sunday next.

Stockport.—On Thursday, Aug. 2, a very successful garden party, in connection with the Ladies' Auxiliary, was held in the grounds of Brinnington House and Brinnington Hall, by the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Johnson, J.P., and Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Johnson, jun. Nearly 120 friends sat down to tea. Fine weather fortunately prevailed.

Whitby.—The Rev. F. Haydn Williams has been returned at the head of the poll at the School Board Election held last week. The Chairman of the late Board was rejected.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations :—Amounts already acknowledged, £2,208 4s. ; Some Friends from the Stamford-street Chapel, per the Rev. F. Allen, £1 1s. 6d. ; A. Sorby, N. Lake, S. Williamson, 1s. 6d. ; Mrs. E. Griffith (additional), £5 ; Mr. B. H. Naylor, 10s. ; Mr. J. H. Nicholson, £2 2s. ; Miss Louisa Marshall, £5 ; E. Y. L., £1 ; Mr. H. Last, 10s. ; the Rev. and Mrs. F. K. Freeston, £1 1s. ; Mr. Charles Wood, £1 ; Total, £2,225 10s. 0d. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE Bishop of Hereford has sent a letter to his clergy suggesting the appropriateness of a special appeal for the Indian Famine Fund at the time of the harvest thanksgiving. "Although many of our parishes have already sent liberal contributions, I believe that they would still desire to give additional help, and that all would welcome the opportunity of giving something at this season in aid of those suffering multitudes who are slowly dying of starvation, while we have bread enough and to spare ; and I should be glad if we could make up a substantial diocesan fund from our harvest thank-offerings. I would not ask or suggest that your annual offertory should be taken away from the good cause to which you may be in the habit of giving it, as true charity requires that our ordinary good works should go on uninterrupted and undiminished by these special appeals to which we make a special response. My hope is that if you could announce to your parishioners beforehand, either that some portion of the harvest thanksgiving offertories, or some additional offering at this thanksgiving season, would be sent to relieve the famine-stricken people of India, and if you were to explain in some detail the nature and extent of the suffering that is crying to us for relief, the hearts of your parishioners, rich and poor alike, would be so touched by the contrast between their own happier lot and the sad and sore burden of those who are perishing and seeing their children perish from starvation and cholera, that their offerings would be exceptionally generous." The Bishop's suggestion may well find a response in other circles, beyond that to which it is specially made.

THE unexpected death of the Lord Chief Justice on Friday of last week closed a career of great brilliance, and has deprived the country of services which had still the promise of much eminent usefulness, not only in the discharge of the accepted duties of an exalted office, but in fearless efforts of reform. Against corruption in the commercial world, Lord Russell had entered upon a determined campaign. As an advocate of international arbitration, one of whose greatest achievements was in connection with the Behring Sea Arbitration at Paris, his loss is to be deeply deplored. In the simplification of legal procedure, and in the matter of special legal education, there was much still hoped from his strenuous purpose and unwasted powers. Lord Russell was not yet seventy, having been born at Newry in 1832. He was always known as a devoted Irishman. Writing of him to the Manchester Guardian, an Irish correspondent says :—

> The first Irishman that was ever Lord Chief Justice of England, and the first Roman Catholic that filled that great office since the Reformation, is dead ; the greatest advocate of our time is no more. Charles Russell's illustrious and honoured career is over. England honours his memory, but Ireland will weep over his grave, for he was a true, upright, and fearless Irishman. Strange to think that the little town of Newry, the border town between north and south, between Protestant Ulster and Catholic Ireland, should have given birth in twenty years to Lord O'Hagan, the first Catholic Lord Chancellor of Ireland since the Revolution ; to Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, the first Irish Catholic Prime Minister of Victoria ; to John O'Hagan, the first President of the Land Commission in Ireland ; and to Lord Russell, with his many claims to national recognition, besides the two famous so-called rebels of 1848, John Mitchell and John Martin.

Lord Russell's fame as an advocate was made on the Northern Circuit, and he was for a number of years resident in Liverpool. In 1880 he entered Parliament, and five years later became Mr. Gladstone's Attorney-General. When, in 1894, he succeeded Lord Coleridge as Lord Chief Justice he accepted the office, as he wrote to a friend in Liverpool, feeling that his powers were fully at command, and for the sake not of dignified promotion, but of service which he could render, and for which there was great need. The brilliant advocate, as Sir E. Clarke said, became a great judge, and his death is a national loss.

THE twelfth annual exhibition of Co-operative Productions, under the auspices of the Labour Association, was opened at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday by Major-General Sir Frederick Maurice. Earl Grey, the President of the Association, who was in the chair, said that they were the successors and inheritors of the Christian Socialists of 1848, in their aim to bring nearer a state of society in which industrial peace, based on individual development, might be securely established. Sir Frederick Maurice, in declaring the exhibition open, referred to the progress of the co-partnership movement, in which his father, Frederick Denison Maurice, had been associated with Charles Kingsley, J. M. Ludlow, Tom Hughes, and Vansitart Neale. Of those pioneers Mr. Ludlow was the survivor, and took part in the meeting, proposing a vote of thanks to the opener, which was seconded by Mr. Holyoake. Earl Grey is succeeded in the presidency by Mr. Burt, M.P. The exhibition included exhibits from thirty-six workshops in different parts of the country, and showed a great development in co-operative industry.

THE fourth International Zionist Congress, which aims at the re-settlement of the Jewish people in Palestine, was opened at the Queen's Hall, Langham-place, on Monday, under the presidency of Dr. Herzl. The shameful persecution of Jews in different countries of Europe has given a strong impetus to this movement, and the first congress was held at Basle in 1897. Sir Francis Montefiore, who has thrown in his lot with the movement, protests against the lack of sympathy with the movement on the part of Jews in this country, who have none of the sufferings to endure which make life so intolerable to the majority of their fellow-Jews in other countries. He pleads that Palestine is essentially a fertile land, and that Jews, where they have the opportunity, have shown capacity for agriculture, so that there need be no fear that the movement, if it could be carried out, would end in disaster. At present, however, it is only a distant hope.

The loss of the French torpedo-boat destroyer Framée, through collision in a calm sea with the flagship Brennus, was marked by more than one instance of true heroism. Commander Mauduit, clinging to the Framée as she was sinking, refused the offer of a life-belt made by a quarter-master of the Brennus, who had come near in a boat, and left it for some of his men who were struggling in the water. "Keep up courage, men! Try to save yourselves. Farewell!" he is said to have shouted as his boat went down. The engineer of the Framée also, when he saw what was coming, helped two of his men out of the engine-room and made them put on life-belts, whilst he himself went down; and his assistant, having made his men go up on deck, similarly died at his post.

"We spent yesterday," a correspondent to the Guardian writes, "pursuing an entirely modern cult known only to the latter half of the nineteenth century—I mean that of Ruskin. Till Sept. 8, at the Institute Coniston, there is a most representative exhibition expounding the life and work of this great man. A very full collection of his own drawings, copies and original works, beginning from his tenth year are being shown, together with modern pictures and copies of old masters, and photographs illustrative of Ruskin's taste and work. We saw, too, personal relics, manuscripts, specimens of his own writings, and last, and by no means least, three original water-colours by Turner, representing that great artist's three periods. Among the family relics are Ruskin's christening robe and cap, the Bible out of which his mother taught him, his inkstand, water-colour box, walking stick, college cap and gown, &c. Among the family miniatures one of his mother proves that he must have much resembled her; there are also those of his grandparents and others of his kin. Of himself there are several portraits, one a photograph after J. Northcote, R.A., when Ruskin was three years old, two others of him in early manhood, by George Richmond, R.A., and another quite of recent days, a pathetic representation of old age, painted by Mr. A. Severn, who also sends pictures of his study and bedroom. Here, too, are the sketches done by the art correspondent of the Graphic at the time of John Ruskin's death. We next visited the churchyard and the plain green mound beneath which he rests, the surrounding grass trodden down by the feet of the many who visit the spot. One could wish the church more worthy to have been the scene of the last rites; it is plain, ugly, and excessively modern in appearance. The little exhibition of over 400 objects is got up for the benefit of the Coniston Institute, and with some idea of making a permanent museum in the place where John Ruskin lived and died."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

China and South Africa naturally hold a large place in this month's reviews. Among the South African articles is a vigorous defence in the Contemporary of Sir Alfred Milner, as an ideal High Commissioner and Imperialist by Mr. F. E. Garrett, who admits, however, that the publication in June of last year of the historic dispatch of May 4 was a mistake. In the Nineteenth Century, in addition to the military articles there is "An American View of the Boer War" by Mr. E. J. Hodgson, of St. Paul, Minnesota, which certainly does not err in the moderation of its statements as to the faults of the Boer character. In the same review Mr. J. A. Marriott writes on "The Imperial Note in Victorian Poetry," contrasting the poverty of the earlier years of the Queen's reign in this respect with the last twenty years, attributing to Seeley's "Expansion of England" not a little influence in the creation of a true Imperialistic sentiment, and ranking Mr. Henry Newbolt's ballads with Tennyson's. The beginning of the new epoch Mr. Marriott dates from 1872, and the publication of Tennyson's lines on Canada in the epilogue to the "Idylls of the King." Of Kipling he says:—

> It is easy for the superior person to sneer at Mr. Kipling as a literary Hooligan or a Jingo Methodist, but it is at least questionable whether any poet has ever succeeded in interpreting with greater precision, and in expressing with more majestic force, the prevailing but inarticulate sentiment of an entire nation. It is impossible to forget the effect produced when, on that bright June morning, three years ago, amid all the glint and the glamour of the Imperial Jubilee, there fell upon the ears of the nation the solemn and sonorous swell of "The Recessional."

> God of our fathers, known of old,
> Lord of our far-flung battle line,
> Beneath whose awful Hand we hold
> Dominion over palm and pine,
> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.
> The tumult and the shouting dies,
> The captains and the kings depart,
> Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
> An humble and a contrite heart.
> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Far happier thoughts for a true Imperialism than at the seat of war are to be found in contemplation of the new Commonwealth of Australia. In the Contemporary, Sir Robert Stout, who writes on "Australasia: Her Resources and Foreign Trade," points out that while the population of Australasia is at present small, being estimated at four-and-a-half millions, it is equal to what the white population of the United States was at the beginning of the century:—

> In 1861 the white population was 1,221,274. In 1900 it is 4,500,000. It has therefore nearly quadrupled in forty years. Who can predict what it may be in 2000? The race is a pure race. It has less admixture of races than Canada or the United States. The vast majority of the Colonists came from the British Isles.

In the Nineteenth Century, Mr. A. G. Berry, who acted as secretary to the Australian Federal Delegates, describes the constitution of "The New Commonwealth," as the most liberal that has yet been conceived, and writes very warmly of the fitness of Lord Hopetoun for the duties with which he is entrusted as its first Governor-General.

Of the Bishop of Hereford's article in the Nineteenth Century on "The Slow Growth of Moral Influence in Politics," we have spoken in another column. In the same Review Mr. Arnold Ward utters some salutary warnings on the subject of "Missionaries in Egypt." Prince Kropotkin contributes a valuable article on "The Small Industries of Britain," and Mr. M. MacDonagh concludes his delightful notes on "The Bye-ways of Rural Ireland." In the Contemporary, Sir Walter Foster's article on "Hospital Scandals in South Africa" should be noted, and Mr. Aylmer Maude's on "Tolstoy's Theory of Art," which deals effectively with the criticisms of an article on that subject in the April Quarterly, and brings out the real value of Tolstoy's work.

Whoever is faithful to a first grace that opens on him shall have a second in advance of it; and if still he follows the messenger of God, angels ever brighter shall go before his way. Every duty done leaves the eye more clear and enables gentler whispers to reach the ear; every brave sacrifice incurred lightens the weight of the clinging self that holds us back. Every storm of passion swept away leaves the air of the mind transparent for more distant visions; and, thus, by a happy concord of spiritual attractions, the helping graces of heaven descend, and meet the soul intent to rise. —James Martineau.

Look at this young man. He is building up his fortune, and that is all men see, and they praise that, and say he is an industrious and excellent man, and will probably be rich. I see and respect that for what it is worth. But behind his fortune there is rising up his character, stone upon stone, brick upon brick, story after story; and, by-and-by, that will be accomplished, and the great angel of death will come and pull down that scaffolding, and it will lie here, useful once, but idle rubbish now; and there will stand resting on the rock of ages and reaching far up into the heavens the great brave character which the man has built in the everlasting sunlight of God, itself as everlasting and always as fair.—Theodore Parker.

RITSCHLIAN THEOLOGY.—I.

PROFESSOR HARNACK'S "HISTORY OF DOGMA."

Some readers of The Inquirer may remember a series of short articles which appeared in these columns in September and October, 1896, and in which an account was given of Albrecht Ritschl and of the system of theology connected with his name; but, however that may be, there are few serious students of present-day opinion who are not aware of the important position occupied by the "Ritschlian school." In Germany its exponents hold the leading professorships at many Universities, and in this country and the United States there are unmistakable signs of a trend toward the position in theology represented by them. It is well known that in the Free Churches, whether "evangelical" or heterodox, there are preachers who gladly avail themselves of the Ritschlian mode of escape from the pressure of modern criticism, and who find in writings like Hermann's "Communion with God" a refreshing spring of devotional feeling. Nevertheless, as the articles referred to were intended to show, there are, to some minds at least, serious grounds of objection to this attractive and influential system of teaching. The old-fashioned orthodoxy has spoken out against it, alike in Germany and in Britain (for here Scotland claims an explicit recognition), and has denounced the new ideas as dangerous in the extreme. We do not remember more than brief and passing criticisms from the old-fashioned heterodoxy—whether its representatives are, as a rule, too lazy or too hazy to deal seriously with the subject may be left to its enemies to decide. But it is clear that Ritschlianism is, for good or ill, a matter not to be lightly ignored; and the patience of the thoughtful may not be over-taxed, therefore, if in two or three further articles on the subject, we try once more to call attention to some of its peculiarities.

As a ground-work for this resumed examination of the new "orthodoxy"—for despite the remarks of friends and foes, the Ritschlians claim to be well within the heritage of Luther, if not its sole possessors—we may conveniently make use of two works, one a translation from the German, and the other by an English writer, which have appeared since the former sketches were written. There is, indeed, great disparity in the two works, whether as regards bulk or critical importance. One is Professor Adolph Harnack's "History of Dogma," the English translation of which fills seven goodly volumes*; while the other is in the modest compass of one volume, although a substantial one, and consists of lectures given to a college audience.† It is not at all unlikely that the latter work will prove more directly serviceable to many readers than the former, for it succinctly presents a view of the whole field of Ritschlian philosophy and criticism; and this in no carping or ungenerous spirit, such as has shown itself in some former books by writers in this country, but with the sympathy that gives insight. At the same time the work presents an estimate, from what we may regard as the Liberal Independent side, both of the gains and the dangers—if not the losses—of the new system. Postponing further reference to this useful book we propose to give in the first place a brief account of Harnack's "History," and to supplement this with a few illustrative passages relating to points of special interest.

Dr. Harnack, who is, we believe, not yet fifty, has long been celebrated for his investigations in the field of early Christian history. Despite the opposition of the orthodox Lutheran party, his career as professor of Church history at Berlin has just been crowned by his appointment as rector of the University. The first volume of his "Dogmengeschichte" was published just fifteen years ago, and the third and last followed four years later. The third edition appeared in 1897, and the English translation—which is by several hands, the difference of whose touch is very evident—has been made from this third edition, and, therefore, must be accepted as presenting the matured views and revised expressions of the author. In a brief "preface to the third edition," which we could have valued more had it been extended, Dr. Harnack refers to some of the more important "objections" which have been raised against his work, and offers some remarks in reply to each. We may usefully turn to one or other of these matters, by and by; let us first see how the author deals with his vast subject.

Defining Church dogma as "the doctrine of the Christian faith, logically formulated and expressed for scientific and apologetic purposes"—a logical formulation with which he has the least possible sympathy—Dr. Harnack points out the impossibility of drawing any hard and fast line between the time of the origin and that of the development of dogma; but the "final point of division" is found when an article of faith, logically formulated and scientifically expressed," is raised to the articulus constitivus ecclesiae and is "universally enforced by the Church. He finds this point at the moment when the confederated Churches accepted "the doctrine of Christ, as the pre-existent and personal Logos of God," as the revealed and fundamental doctrine of faith—i.e., at about the end of the third century or the beginning of the fourth. Accordingly, the work of the historian of dogma divides itself into the tasks, respectively, of tracing the steps leading to this definite acceptance of the Logos doctrine, and of following out the developments in East and West as further doctrines have been in turn similarly accepted as "revealed" and "fundamental." In the Eastern Church these further developments were arrested at the second Council of Nicæa A.D. 787; in Western Christendom the Romish Church has steadily gone forward as a creed-maker, and as late as 1870 the dogma of Infallibility was added as equally "revealed" and "fundamental" with that of the pre-existent Logos; and there is no reason to suppose that the process of discovering new dogmas is, in that Church, yet at an end.

As regards the Protestant Churches, the historian is in a difficulty. First, there is no such agreement amongst them as obtained amongst the ancient Churches as to whether and in what sense dogmas are "valid." This remark of Harnack's, which occurs in his opening pages, is significantly amplified further on, where he says (Vol. I., p. 19): "Strictly speaking, dogma as dogma, has had no development in Protestantism, inasmuch as a secret note of interrogation has been associated with it from the very beginning." If we understand the author aright in these and other passages, the interrogative note which he detects in Protestantism refers generally to that which was prior to the enunciation of all "logical and scientific formulas" of faith—namely, "the Gospel"; and what it inquires is how far the successive propositions of the creed-makers harmonise with that "Gospel" when truly understood. That, at any rate, is clearly the spirit in which Harnack himself would approach the examination of doctrine. It sufficiently indicates the method of the Ritschlians generally; and on the strength of this they may be justified in claiming a succession to Luther and the earlier Protestants. It may be suggested, however—Professor Harnack shows in his last volume that he has not wholly overlooked the fact—that the "note of interrogation" in Protestantism applied not only to questions of harmony between the formula of the Church, and a particular ideal of the orginal evangelic message. If this ideal could be taken as one delineated by this or that particular Council or individual teacher, the process of testing would, indeed, have been a simple one. But what was questioned chiefly, at least by a few who have been increasing from generation to generation, was the right or competence of any authority to enforce a standard ideal of the "Gospel" upon the mind in quest of religious truth. The Reformers, in spite of themselves, did battle for freethought. Hence, no doubt, a wide divergence of view arose, and still prevails, as to what are the essential principles of the "Gospel"; and, as a result, the verdict passed by Protestants upon dogmas regarded as of the highest importance varies something more than considerably. To the ordinary evangelical Protestant, for example, the Virgin Birth and Bodily Resurrection are absolutely essential as part of the fundamental faith of a Christian; to the Ritschlian Protestant they have no such significance; he may reject them wholly as Harnack does, and he is disposed, at best, to use them as "suggestive;" while most Unitarian Protestants, we suppose, would unequivocably pronounce them mischievously erroneous. But there is more here than divergence of result; the question as to "authority," once raised, proves difficult to silence, and may extend to the tradition of the "Gospel" itself. To discuss how far "interrogation" may go in that direction would lead us astray from our present subject.

Having indicated the Nicene age as the point towards which, as, to a focus, the original rays of Christian thought converged, and from which they have passed onward—not without considerable inversion, may we say—into the wide fields of dogmatic Christianity, the author naturally is under the necessity of presenting a preliminary outline of the elements with which the minds of the first believers had to deal—the common preaching about Jesus as well as the traditions of his words; and, following close upon these, he has to indicate the prepossessions and preoccupations of Christ's Jewish followers and the first missionaries of the faith. Here the peculiar views of the Ritschlian show themselves. Jesus Christ, as he understands, brought no new doctrine into the world, but set forth a new life of holy communion "with God and before God." His brethren in spirit were led by him into this communion, but not apart from prevailing conceptions peculiar to Judaism. For Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, and the claim necessarily imparted a colour to his message and cast a shade on the meditations of those who heard and echoed it which came through the multifarious contents of the Messianic prophecies and hopes. Thus the Old Testament became pre-eminently the literary basis of the Christian Church, while the Jewish community was its social, or rather, ecclesiastical basis. But the Christian Church and its doctrine grew in the atmosphere of the Roman world and from a very early stage in close contact with Greek culture; and it may be said that "dogma in its conception and development is a work of the Greek spirit on the soil of the Gospel." So that we pass, in the preliminary inquiry, from the circle of Jerusalem and Palestine to those of Rome and Athens, in order to refresh our minds with a re-consideration of their share in moulding the creed, and, indeed, in shaping the very Church itself.

The author then displays in detail the preparatory stages leading to the fixing of Christianity as a Church and as a system of doctrine. These preparatory stages, of course, are to be found, for the most part, in the second century—that fascinating twilight age where we grope and guess and tell by touch but are still in the dark. Judaism, expanded to the uttermost, failed, as we see, to hold in check the germinal life of Gentile Christianity, which soon discarded it and left it to shrivel as insufficient or heretical. The gnostic attempt to prove Christianity the absolute religion and to rid it of the fetters of Old Testament tradition, is described by the author as the "acute secularising of Christianity"—a phrase not so self-explanatory as it might be. The attempt of Marcion to push the Pauline theology to its extreme limits, and to set aside the Old Testament basis upon which Christianity was persistently grounding itself, is another incident that naturally receives special notice from the author. All three, Jewish Christianity, Gnosticism, and Marcionitism, being successfully battled with, the young "Catholic" Christianity, holding fast to its Hebrew Scriptures and making by degrees a canon of its own Scriptures, which presupposed the Old Testament, passes on into the stages of definite construction—"secularism" the author calls it, when dealing with the rise of "the Church;" "Hellenising," when dealing with the rise of the "system of doctrine." These terms indicate the mood in which he addresses himself to the detailed examination of the history of the third century and the opening decades of the fourth. But it is right to add that, while Dr. Harnack evidently has no enthusiasm for much that he deals with and at time can be severe, he approaches the most diverse heresies with a kindly interest and, even where he condemns, it is often with a suggestion of hidden worth in the thoughts which have rise to the erroneous doctrines. We may give illustrations of this in our second article.

As already shown, the bulk of the work falls apart into two divisions—(1) the history that closes with the Nicene definition, and (2) the developments since that definition. The English translation awkwardly breaks up the original arrangement, and, spite of detailed lists of contents, does not show very clearly the author's plan till the second division is reached. Here the chief sub-divisions deal with (a) the "Doctrine of the God-man on the basis of Natural Theology," and (b) the expansion of dogma into a "Doctrine of Sin, Grace, and Means of Grace on the basis of the Church." The former of these leads us through that strange and complex wilderness of speculation on the subject of the person of the Son, which needs to be visited by no ordinary traveller if it is not to inspire mere weariness and disgust. The latter, opening with Augustine and extending through the monastic period to the scholastic and pre-Reformation times, offers matter more attractive. Occupying two volumes (V. and VI.) of the English translation, this section is one upon which the author has evidently bestowed great care, notwithstanding his modest acknowledgment of dependence upon other investigations for the later periods; and it is equally obvious that the subject-matter of these volumes is more closely involved than questions as to the Godhead in the Lutheran reconstruction which Ritschl attempted, and at which his followers have laboured since his death. Perhaps it is unfair to the author to recommend sections of his work for special reading; and yet the number of readers who will conscientiously read the whole seven volumes is really not likely to be large—if these two are mastered something solid will have been done after all. The concluding volume sums up the "Issues of Dogma" (1) in Roman Catholicism from the Trent to the Vatican Councils; (2) in Anti-Trinitarianism and Socinianism; and (3) in Protestantism — a division which shows the special bias of the author in retaining the term Protestant practically for the Lutheran line alone.

It is here that the great scholar whose work we have been surveying differs, not wholly for the better, if we may venture to say so, from those who, taking the great movement of the sixteenth century as embodying a larger unity than is suggested by the name of any one leader and reformer, however great, have been educated into a temper more docile under the later revelations of science than the most "advanced" of Ritschlians appear to be. It is true that, under pressure of Biblical criticism and the modern view of uniform operations in the physical world, Ritschlians, or some of them, have made cheerful sacrifice of the creeds and miracles, if only they may retain not simply a special, but an exclusive function for Jesus Christ in the realm of religion. Meanwhile, the Universe has both expanded marvellously around the Christian theologian, and has shown itself to be one, with a unity not appreciated before; and this not only in the physical world, but in the world of humanity. Doubtless the Ritschlian of to-day may wisely fear the effect on himself, or on men in general, of this widening of the horizons of thought. He may call it a "secularising" influence; but calling names is the vice of theological controversy, and it settles no questions. The question raised by the views which are represented by this work, and which are constantly used as a touchstone for the testing of the progress of successive propositions as thought has developed, is really whether man anywhere can know God as the Father without "personal" contact with Jesus, the Jewish Messiah. The more confidently the Ritschlians answer "No," the more difficult they make it for those who have rejoiced in Christian liberty to look upon their movement without disappointment, if not apprehension.—But our further illustrations of the Ritschlian ideas must be given at another time.

JOHN BURGESS'S DIARY AND CORRESPONDENCE.—II.

The members of the Baptist congregations in country districts in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were usually spread over a wide area. Round the central meeting-house subsidiary "meetings" were grouped for the convenience of those members of the church who lived at a distance, but the full church meetings, the "meetings for discipline," the Communion Service, and the service for the administration of baptism were usually held in the central meeting-house, and round about that was the hallowed ground to which the members came from far and near to bury their dead. A good example of such a widely scattered church is afforded by the Baptist Society at Kensworth in Hertfordshire. In a list of members of this church drawn up in 1675 the names of three hundred and ninety persons are given residing in upwards of thirty towns and villages of Herts and Bedfordshire. Similar congregations, though of smaller numbers, seem to have been grouped about certain centres in Sussex and the adjacent counties. Ditchling was one such centre. It was at the outlying meetings of the Ditchling congregation that John Burgess most frequently and regularly exercised his ministerial gifts. In the five years covered by his Diary he preached on no less than sixty-nine Sundays at the Barcombe meeting, and on the same number at what he calls "ye purchert meeting." But besides this constant service he occasionally went eastwards to preach to the congregations at Heathfield and Waldron, and once to the Tunbridge Wells meeting; and sometimes he went in another direction, giving his services to the outlying meetings of the General Baptist congregation centred at Horsham: these were held at "Joultsfield," Billingshurst, Blonks Green, West Grinstead, and perhaps Crawley. There was also a meeting-house at Cuckfield.

One or two extracts will show what full days his Sundays were; the entry for July 8, 1787, runs: "Went to Crawly Meeting, got to Mr. Danceyes, Hogs Hill by 9 o'clock. Drink tea before went to Meeting, P. Rom 14—17, 18, 19 Went to Mr Tamplings ye shop keeper to Dinner had Veal pudden smokd a pipe or 2." Crawley is sixteen miles from Ditchling. For May 27 in the same year the entry is: "Went to Heathfield Meeting the day was spent as follows I preach a sermon upon Titus 2—11, 12, after that ye Sacrament was administered by Father Edwards after that we had a Disciplen meeting James Sanders begun in prayer, it was concluded or agreed to take up ye Baptisery and car it to Waldron to Mr. Goslins and put it down in one of his fields it was likewise agreed that ye Church should excommunicate John Dan for disorderly walking, John Gosling concluded the meeting by prayer &c." For April 22, 1787, we read: "Went to West Grinstead to Mr. Billinghurstes to Meeting, Mr. John Dancy was there and preached in ye afternoon, the first time I ever heard him preach, his tax was Rom 2—16 I took ye first part of ye Day, Heb. 13—14 . . . . . came away a little before dark got home about 10 of ye clock." Even when he was not preaching on the Sunday John Burgess often went far afield to hear some favourite minister. He walked over the Downs on more than one occasion to Brighton to what was then known as the Presbyterian Meeting. This was the Dissenters' Chapel, in Union-street, now represented by the Congregational Church of which the Rev. R. J. Campbell is minister.

The entries referring to these excursions are interesting. Aug. 27, 1786: "This morning Mr. and Mrs. Drabrige was hear at Breakfast we then went to Brighthelmstone to ye prestbeerian meeting to hear Dockr Price and Mr. Johnson, Price preachd upon Luke 21, 34 . . . . Mr. Johnson preachd a very good sermon But Docter Price preached a most excellent Rational sermon as ever I heard." Again, on March 23, 1788: "Went to Brighthelmstone, went to the presbeterin meeting to Hear Mr. Johnson. Both parts of the day he preachd upon one Taxt namely psalms 143 middle part of the 5 verse about Meditation . . . . got home before 8 of ye clocke." On Sunday, Nov. 9, 1788: "Went to Brighthelmstone went to Calvaness Meeting in ye fore Noon, then in the afternoon Mr. Rich and I went to Church there was no teaching at the presbyterian meeting this day Mr. Johnson was gone out, after Church time we went to the red Cross had a pot of Beer and smokd a pipe or two got home about Nine of ye clock, &c." This time he hit on the right spelling of "presbyterian." The "Calvaness Meeting" was probably the Strict Baptist Chapel. On another occasion he records a visit to Lewes, where Mr. Drowly was elder of the General Baptist Society. Mr. Drowly was an excellent preacher; when he came to Ditchling John Burgess usually made some note on the attendance, "A very crowded audience," or something to that effect. Mr. Middleton was pastor of the Particular Baptists in Lewes, but still he was occasionally allowed the use of the Ditchling Meeting House. July 15, 1787: "Went to Lewes Meeting to Hear Mr. Drowly preach, went to Mr. Evens the Curyer in ye Clift (i.e., the Cliffe) Mr. Evens went to meeting with me both parts of ye day. I eat my dinner and drink tea with Mr. Evens, after tea we went to Mr. Middleton's Meeting to hear Mr. Middleton preach the first time I ever was there—I never heard the General Baptists sing in public service till to-day." The singing of hymns was only just coming into vogue amongst these folk; other references to this practice are, April 13, 1788: "I deliverd up the Key of the Meeting House for some people to come to Learn to sing psalms and Hims, &c." and Wednesday, Nov. 5, 1788: "In the after Noon went to the Purchert there was a Meeting kept there on account of Gunpowder plot. I preachd a sermon upon [p]salms 107—31, there was one Hymn sung after sermon the first hymn [that] has been sung at that Meeting, &c."

There is one reference to Sunday-schools in the Diary, Jan., 1789: "I paid Attree four shillings what I subscribed toward the Sunday Scool at Ditchling this is the first year of its been established."

John Burgess seems to have had a taste for sermons, and was ready to hear both sides. On Tuesday, Sept. 3, 1788, he says: "In ye evening went to Weavelsfield Methodiste Meeting to hear one Mr. Wiliams a Welchman." On one Sunday in 1789 after preaching at "ye purchert Meeting" he "went to mr. White's in ye evening to hear mr. Joans preach, methody parson from Briton." If there happened to be no meeting at the Meeting House on Good Friday or Christmas Day he repaired to the parish church. When a day of Thanksgiving for the King's recovery from a state of indisposition was ordered to be observed on Thursday, April 23, 1789, it was an opportunity not to be missed. He went to the church, and heard Mr. Jackson in the forenoon, and then walked over to the neighbouring parish of Street in the afternoon to hear Mr. Morgan, who, by the way, was one of his regular customers for leather breeches; he further notes "our Town was eluminated on the ocation." But as a rule there seems to have been a service at the Meeting House on Christmas Day. Thus on Tuesday, Dec. 25, 1787, the entry is: "Was at Home Smith preached upon Luke 2—10 and 11, we had a piece of Beef boilde for Dinner a Lott of about 1 stone sent as a present by a person unknown. Mr. Drowly preach'd a sermon this evening upon Luke 2 and 10 his 1 proposition was to point out the state of men when the News was proclaim'd, 2 that the news of a Saviour was great joy, 3 to whome, that is, to all men &c." In this last point we can trace the Arminianism that distinguished the General Baptists from the Particular Baptists. The former believed in the general redemption of man—Christ's message was to all, his death was for all; the latter held to the Calvinistic scheme of a particular redemption—Christ died for the elect. In their doctrine concerning God the General Baptists of the South had been largely Unitarian for some years before this time. W. H. B.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN THE PULPIT.

Sir,—All genuine and consistent Unitarians will feel deep sympathy with the Rev. G. Critchley, a much respected Congregationalist minister, who has been obliged to resign a twenty-five years' pastorate of the Burnt Ash Congregational Church at Lee because of his outspoken utterances against the war in South Africa.

A very interesting meeting has just taken place at Lewisham to present him with a testimonial and an Address, and herein it is stated that—"All sections of the Church, all shades of political and religious opinions are represented, amongst others members of Parliament, ministers of religion, and leaders of journalism and literature. Differing as we do on many and important points, we are at one in our sense of your bold fidelity to what you believe to be the truth—in face of strenuous and determined opposition—with the noblest disregard of consequences . . . . (we) honour in you the dauntless heroism with which you have stood for the right of free speech in pulpit and on platform, for righteousness and purity, brotherhood and peace."

The Rev. G. Critchley's Farewell Sermon and the two on the War, which gave so much offence, are now published by Cattell Brothers, Eltham, Kent, and may be had price 1s., the profit to go for the Indian Famine Fund. I should strongly recommend all who can to send for these Sermons. They will find much food for thought, and I think few of us could read them without some searchings of the heart, some earnest questioning as to whether we are quite as courageous as we should be in keeping true to the highest. Mr. Critchley points out the "perilous delusion" entertained by many professing Christians that a man can, so to speak, "divide himself into so many different parts, can pursue one code of morals in what he calls his religion, another in his business, and perhaps another in his relations as a citizen of the State.

"As a Christian he will devoutly listen on Sundays to the searching precepts of the Sermon on the Mount. But take that same man in business, he is hard, cold, unmerciful; and in defence of this course of conduct, he will plead that business is business." . . . . "It is just on matters of broad practical righteousness that the minister is told to stand aside. People say, 'We will hear you gladly while you confine yourself to religious subjects, when you speak to us of God and heaven and spiritual things; but stop here. Leave secular affairs alone. We shall do our business, deal with our workpeople, conduct our politics, and wage our wars as we please. Do you keep to religion, that is your concern.' But my hearers, that will not do for God. He will have the whole of you or nothing. He does not save men in parts and sections after this fashion. It is a deadly delusion for you to think because you keep one corner of your life for Christianity and Christ, you can follow the multitude to do evil with the rest."

Truly noble words. Long may our Nonconformist ministers dare to utter such words! and long may we Unitarians in particular, maintain to the very full, the sacred right of freedom of speech on the platform, in congregations and religious assemblies, and above all—in the pulpit.

UNITARIAN AND TRINITARIAN.

Sir,—May I be permitted, without in any way seeking to intervene in the discussion between Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Beeby, to quote the following passage from a recent essay by Professor A. S. Peake ("The Permanent Value of the Pauline Theology." Present Day Papers, July, 1900):—

"If Jesus is the image of the invisible God, the Son of His Love, then in him we have a manifestation of the character of God, which prepares us for fellowship with Him. . . . This conception of the Godhead, as embracing Son as well as Father, gives us a deeper and more ethical conception of God. For it shows that God is no abstract unity, isolated and self-centered, but a higher unity of richer and more complex life, in which there is room for the play of emotion, and in which ethical relations have their home. Thus we find in God not Fatherhood only, but Sonship; not rule and authority only, but the filial obedience which seeks always to do the Father's will. We see love given and love received, and love given back again. Thus the great truth that God is love gains for us a depth of meaning it could not otherwise possess. Thus we know that that which is highest in ourselves finds its pattern and fullest expression in the life of God. And thus the moral ideal comes to us no longer with the stern face of inflexible and impervious law, but as the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." J. Warschauer.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

Sir,—The Rev. T. L. Marshall quotes C. Kegan Paul's "Memories" under the above heading, and does not happen to notice that the date given "About the year 1870" is too late.

If recollection serves me, the ostensible reason given by Dr. Martineau for conducting Requiem over that interesting but peculiar scion of a noble house was his persuasion that with the loss consequent upon the Rev. J. J. Tayler's death there was no likely means of attracting religious reformers of German and French extraction to attend its anniversaries or feel pleasure in its survival.

Now the Rev. J. J. Tayler "fell on sleep" early in 1869, so that 1868 would seem to have been the year when Messrs. Coquerel and Paul officiated at this Union.

I heard quite lately that at some Friends' Meeting this year in London a discourse was given on the need of attaining some betterment of life, by exercise of faculties which gaze out upon the humorous side of things, as even Heaven must not be supposed destitute of smiles as well as of silence. If brevity be the soul of wit, that same Union was one of the most clever things of its time, since it seized its first opportunity of reaching a better world in the wake of a good man. R. J. Orr.

SERVICES IN THE ISLE OF MAN.

Sir,—May I call the attention of your readers to the advertisement of the services to be held, under the auspices of the Missionary Conference, at Port St. Mary, Isle of Man? It is hoped that Unitarian and other visitors, not only to Port St. Mary, but also to Port Erin and Castletown, will make a point of attending. Help from musical friends will be warmly welcomed. J. Crowther Hirst.

A CORRECTION.

Sir,—Some slip of the pen—or bad handwriting—spoke, in the article on Mr. Campbell's sermons, of the proposed Nonconformist Cathedral as costing twenty thousand pounds. We could beat that cathedral ourselves so far as cost goes. Of course it really should have been seventy thousand pounds. The assistant-minister himself is giving twenty-five thousand towards it. OBITUARY.

MR. DANIEL BULMER.

On Monday, August 6, after a painful illness of seventeen weeks' duration, Mr. Daniel Bulmer, of Belfast, an old and honoured member for many years of the Second Congregation, Rosemary-street, but of late connected with the First Congregation, entered into his rest. Mr. Bulmer had been for many years the superintendent of the Prudential Insurance Society in Belfast, and had won for himself in that responsible position the goodwill of all the members of his large staff, as well as of the Directors of the Company; and when he resigned his office about three years ago, proofs abounded of the high esteem in which he was held. In other places the story of his useful and active business life will be told and justice done to his successful work and his lofty integrity in all business relations; but here we may tell of his long and honourable connection with the Second Congregation, and of the good work he did therein. He and his family constituted a small group of quiet and devout worshippers who were always in their places and always among the most reverent members of the congregation. Very soon his unaffected modesty and simplicity of character won for him the respect and esteem of the minister—the Rev. J. C. Street—and he was invited to take his part in the active work of the church.

For some years he acted as a superintendent of the Sunday-school, as a member of the committee of the church, as a useful worker in connection with the choir, as an active member of the Unitarian Society, a true worker and helper in all the church activities. He was always simple and unpresuming, but never failed to bring clear common sense and ripe wisdom into all his work and his counsels. After Mr. Street left Ireland, Mr. Bulmer continued to work with Mr. Fripp, whose ministry he greatly admired; but when it was decided to leave the old Church and build a new one, he felt himself unable to approve of that step, and reluctantly severed his connection with the congregation and became a member of the First Church. But he retained the greatest affection and regard for all his old fellow-worshippers, and ever spoke of his great indebtedness to the lofty spiritual influences which he had experienced among them. There was no strain in the happy personal relations between Mr. Bulmer and his old friends. They continued to honour each other, and his death has called forth from his old fellow-worshippers a feeling of the greatest sorrow and of the deepest sympathy with his honoured widow and her daughter. A long and sad procession followed his remains to the grave, where Mr. Dunkerley and Mr. Street officiated.

A good man's work is done, an earthly life of blameless honour is closed, but the child of God has gone home and entered the Holiest Presence.

At "All Souls'," on Sunday, 12th inst., the Rev. James Hall spoke very feelingly in memory of the friend who had been called away; and the Dead March was played by Mr. Ernest Worth, the congregation standing.

MRS. WALTER HYDE.

Mrs. Walter Hyde, whose death is announced in another column, was the eldest daughter of the late Major Henry Coppock, of Daw Bank House, Stockport. She was married in 1867 to Mr. Walter Hyde, who succeeded Major Coppock as town clerk of Stockport.

A staunch supporter of the Unitarian church at Stockport, where she had regularly attended from earliest childhood, Mrs. Hyde bore her share in the activities connected with the maintenance of that church and congregation. She also took an active interest in several of the public and charitable institutions of the town, especially the Institute for the Blind and Deaf and Dumb, and the Stockport Sick Poor Nursing Association.

She was a member of the Ladies' Visiting Committee at Stockport Union Workhouse.

In the Jubilee year (1887) Mrs. Hyde was one of the deputation of ladies who went to Buckingham Palace to present the gift of the women of Stockport to the Queen. Her death occurred suddenly. She was very highly esteemed. The funeral service at the Borough Cemetery on Tuesday was conducted by the Rev. B. C. Constable.

MISS SARAH ELIZABETH SQUIER.

We have lost a staunch friend of Unitarianism in Miss Sarah Elizabeth Squier. She was the daughter of the Rev. John Owen Squier, for many years the minister of the General Baptist Church at Deptford.

Miss Squier was brought up by her aunt, who afterwards became the wife of the Rev. J. E. Fletcher, who was for some time minister at Selby. In 1858 she went to Preston, where she kept the house of her brother, the Rev. Wm. Croke Squier.

After teaching for some time as a governess in Brussels, she became assistant and then matron under Miss Mary Carpenter at the Red Lodge Reformatory at Bristol, and many were the delightful reminiscences that she could give of Miss Carpenter's splendid work amongst those who came under her care at the Reformatory. When she left her work with Miss Carpenter she became assistant at Mrs. Case's Boy's School at Hampstead, where she remembered Mr. Austin Chamberlain, the son of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, as one of the scholars.

In the summer of 1895 she removed to Dover, where at the Adrian Church, she gave help in the debates and lectures in connection with the Guild of Good Fellowship. So long as she was able she was a regular attendant at the services, but for many months before her death she was unable to leave her room. After severe suffering, borne with much fortitude, she passed on August 1 into the home and rest of our Heavenly Father.

She was buried in Buckland Cemetery, Dover, next to her father. The funeral took place on August 3, the service being conducted by the Rev. S. Burrows.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Pilgrimage to Oberammergau.—IV.

It is close upon the hour of one, and we are in our seats again after a hasty meal, which has seemed an interruption and not a particularly welcome one to the solemn services of the day. The solitary cannon signal has gone off again, and without a moment's delay the chorus once more steps on to the stage and the second part of the Play begins.

Just remember how far we had got in the story when a pause for dinner took place. We had seen the entry into Jerusalem, the farewell to dear friends at Bethany, the parting supper along with the disciples—all these are over and things of the past. Christ has been betrayed and is now a prisoner in the rough hands of the Roman soldiers, and awaits the sentence of life or death according as those who hate him gain their hearts' desire or not.

The seizing of Christ has put the priestly leaders of the Jews into high spirits, and in front of his house Annas, a high priest, awaits the return of Christ into Jerusalem, this time bound and attended not by a living bodyguard of disciples and friends but ignorant and excited soldiers, and accompanied by jeers instead of sounds of joy.

The howling mob bring Christ before Annas, and his answers to his priestly questioner not been looked upon as fit and proper to so mighty a person, he receives the first of a series of acts of violence, signs of the fury of his enemies —a blow on the cheek from one of the soldiers. Nothing comes of this interview with Annas; Christ's silent dignity is rebuke enough for his accusers. So now we see him passed on to one higher in priestly authority, to Caiaphas, and a specially called meeting of the High Council. A sort of trial is provided; witnesses appear, who tell all they can against him—how he had called the members of the Court hypocrites, ravening wolves in sheeps' clothing, blind leaders of the blind; how he had forbidden the people to pay taxes to the reigning Emperor of Rome; how he had eaten meals with his disciples without first washing his hands, and dined with tax-collectors at their own houses; how he broke the Sabbath by healing people on that day, and taught others to do wrong by walking or doing work on the Sabbath-day; how he had said he forgave sins and could destroy the temple and build it up again in three days, and so on. The trial ends: Christ is sentenced to death and led away.

Here follows that sad scene when Peter's courage fails him, and three times he disowns any knowledge of or acquaintance with Christ, the prisoner, the criminal; and closely follows Peter's regretful sorrow.

We are shown the prison with wonderful exactness, the deeds of violence to which Christ is subjected there, the beating with lashes and the crown of prickly thorn branches pressed with great force on his head, and we feel with a shudder how terrible the sufferings of those days must have been.

After the base kiss of betrayal Judas had not fully realised all that he had done, but when he learns that the result of his baseness has been that Christ is to be hunted to death, that the High Council will be satisfied with nothing less than his crucifixion, the memory of the kindness of the good master drowns for a moment in Judas the over-anxious care for his own future well-being and the money welfare of the little flock Christ said he would so soon leave behind, and his passionate remorse leads to at least three of the most powerful scenes in the Play. His eager desire to undo what he had sold himself to do, the scorn and laughter with which his attempts to tear himself away from the bargain are met by those with whom he has made the bargain for some paltry coins drove him to despair, and we actually see him preparing to make away with his life.

The sufferings of Christ are coming to a close. To carry out the sentence of death the High Council has to get the consent of the Roman rulers. Though a long way from Rome, Palestine was governed by Rome, and though in religious matters the trials of the Jewish Courts and Councils were supreme in power, in matters of every-day rule and in matters of life and death Rome was supreme.

Two more trials had to be gone through. From the warm and angry court of Caiaphas Christ was taken to Pilate, and calmer judgment seemed at first to hold out a hope of release to the prisoner, but King Herod, the king of the part of Palestine where Nazareth, the birthplace of Christ, was—Galilee—happened to be in Jerusalem, and Pilate, so as to avoid giving judgment himself, sent the Jews to Herod. Herod treats Christ as if he was a foolish fellow, whose mind had been turned by the people's praise, and sends him back to Pilate. This going backwards and forwards has made the priests and their followers still more angry, and the thirsting of the crowd, at this second appearance before Pilate, for the death of Christ brought out more forcibly the tender patience of Christ and the quiet dignity of Pilate. But Pilate gives way at last, and gives the maddened crowd the choice between releasing Christ or a certain Barabbas, under sentence of death for murder. The cry is: "Let the false Messiah die." "Let Barabbas free," and the scene closes with the shout, "And end to this Galilean."

The crucifixion is to take place outside Jerusalem, at a place called Calvary, and, at the same time, two criminals are to suffer a like punishment. But before that Christ has to carry the cross itself, on which he is to be nailed, from Jerusalem to Calvary. The body, wearied with so great anxieties, and tortured in mind, is too weak now to bear the burden, and we look with moistened eyes on the painful procession, with its frequent fallings and stumblings. At last a friend of Christ, one Simon, from the town of Cyrene, is seized hold of and made to carry the cross for Christ—a burden willingly borne when the Master is recognised. The sweat-stained face of Christ, relieved of his burden, is wiped by the loving attention of Veronica with a handkerchief, and, to add to the intensity of the agony, all this takes place in the presence of the beloved mother.

From the journey of agony we pass on to the Crucifixion.

I do not think that to tell the details of the actual death on the cross would do you young ones any good, but they are all represented to us. Before our eyes Christ is nailed to the cross, dies, and the body is taken down and lovingly carried to its burial. To prepare us for the sad scene the chorus, when it comes on the stage, has now exchanged their coloured cloaks for black cloaks, but before the picture of the resurrection they have on their joyful garments again.

Next we are before the closed grave. The stone in front of it is rolled away, and the risen Christ silently passes out. The last scene is a living picture of the Resurrection.

So now the Play is over: the object of our pilgrimage, and of the pilgrimage of thousands of others, is gained, and we set out the next day on the return journey full of many thoughts and intentions to be put into practice in the life before us.

Perhaps now that we are come to an end of our four talks about the Oberammergau Passion Play, you may wonder why four talks should be taken up with a little far-distant village like Oberammergau, and what goes on there—what has it to do, you may ask, with us little people over here? I will tell you.

When you have read to you from the pulpit, or read to yourselves on the Sundays, the Bible story of Christ's last days, a bit at a time, it gets, somehow, difficult for you to think that the person mentioned in the New Testament, Christ, and his disciples, and his Mother, and the three at Bethany, and so on, were real people who walked about and talked, and went through life as we do, and if in these papers I can have aroused in you one-hundredth part of the feeling of reality which seeing the scenery and acting did in me, I don't think your time spent in reading these pages will be altogether time lost.

Thos. Hodgetts Gordon.

A HYMN FOR SUMMER TIME.

The morning walks upon the earth,
And man awakes to toil and mirth;
All living things and lands are gay—
Dear God, walk with me through the day.

Sweet is the breathing of the world;
Lies it not in Thy love enfurled?
And blue and clear the immortal sky;
'Tis Thine, and Thine its purity.

Now Noon sits throned, her golden urn
Pours forth the sunshine! Laugh and burn
Corn land and meadow, lake and sea!
Lord of my life, pour love on me.

Rain in the afternoon! Soft fall
The cooling drops; the woodland hall
Smells sweet, and every lonely place;—
Rain on me, Lord, Thy freshening grace.

Slow comes the evening o'er the hill,
The labour of the world is still;
Homeward I go, and muse on Thee—
Father of Home, abide with me.

Now droops the dark, but worlds of light
Hidden by day, fulfil the night!
Infinite Stillness, silent sea
Of Truth and Power, flow over me.

O Thou, whose love this night has made
Outwearied earth and man to aid;
Who givest labour, and then rest,—
Give me the peace that fills Thy breast.

NATIONAL OBLIGATION.

THE wide difference between the standard of honour in the individual conduct of the average man and the ideal of righteousness as it may be gathered from the conduct of the Christian nations of Europe in the matter of international politics is the subject specially dealt with in an article by the Bishop of HEREFORD in the current number of the Nineteenth Century on "The Slow Growth of Moral Influence in Politics." While in Christian countries and under Christian influences individual morality has risen as never before or elsewhere, Dr. PERCIVAL holds that the public or political moral standard rose more rapidly in Israel under the Old Testament covenant, and this because of the untiring insistence and emphasis with which the great national prophets preached the duty of national righteousness and kept the living GOD before the eyes and mind of the people as the judge of all national and corporate life.

But, however this may be, there stands before us the plain fact, and it is a fact far too generally disregarded or ignored, that after eighteen centuries of Christian teaching and influence in Europe, a great deal of our public life, both at home and abroad, although in the hands of Christian statesmen, is to all practical intents and purposes still carried on as if the Sermon on the Mount had never been spoken and only the lower or selfish motives had a rightful claim to exercise dominion in practical affairs. It is not that action and practice are constantly falling short of the acknowledged and accepted standard of ethical duty. This we should expect to occur in public as in private matters. The point is that honest and good men do not seem to recognise those standards of ethical judgment which they accept without question in private life, as having the same claim on their allegiance in the arena of politics, or in the relationships of nations. "Blindness in part is happened to Israel."

The dealings of nations with one another seem without question to be based on self-interest, out of which naturally grow jealous rivalry, greed of power and wealth; and the BISHOP quotes HERBERT SPENCER as contrasting the religion of amity and the religion of enmity, to which men seem to give their allegiance in the private and public departments of their lives respectively, so that, for instance, the virtue of forgiveness for which a man prays on Sunday, or in his home, he will repudiate as a vice or a weakness on Monday in his club or in Parliament, or on the Stock Exchange. Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON is also quoted as declaring that the dominant factor in European politics is the passion of national self-assertion, the struggle for national supremacy, so that, whether right or wrong, the great nations are resolved to make themselves as big, as formidable, as extensive, as rich as science and energy can make them, or at least to tolerate no other nation bigger than themselves; to which the BISHOP adds a protest against "that degrading and mischievous influence in English life commonly described as Jingoism; that spurious or bastard patriotism which it should be the aim of every ethical teacher to eradicate and destroy, planting in its stead the true progressive Christian patriotism, whose aim is righteousness and goodwill."

Two other illustrations of his theme Dr. PERCIVAL cites from Mr. LECKY'S "Map of Life"; first, what he describes as "the meanest incident in the modern political history of England," the implication of a man holding the confidential position of Prime Minister of a colony and being at the same time a Privy Councillor of the Queen, in the conspiracy which issued in the Jameson raid, and the subsequent declaration by a leading Minister of the Crown in the House of Commons that although the man had made a gigantic mistake he had done nothing affecting his personal honour; and, secondly, the low level of public feeling in most countries towards the horrible Armenian massacres, and the spectacle of the Sovereign of one of the greatest and most civilised Christian nations so soon after those occurrences proceeding to Constantinople, taking the hand thus deeply imbued with Christian blood, and then from the Mount of Olives proclaiming himself the champion and the patron of the Christian faith.

The explanation of this lamentable difference of ethical standard the BISHOP finds in various causes. In the first place, it is noted that the original preaching of Christianity dealt only with personal morals. JESUS and his immediate followers, living under a heathen Imperial Government, left the political world severely alone, "content to sow the seeds of new principles, and a new spirit in individual hearts." Thus the Gospel teaching has more readily assimilated to itself the realm of personal conduct, while its application to public and State affairs still remains to be effectively carried through. Further, it is urged that there is a great lack of systematic training of the young in the morals of citizenship—a grave defect, which must be made good; while, again, as a fundamental reason for the slow progress deplored, we are reminded that all real moral progress is from the individual heart outwards, so that corporate advance has to wait upon individual advance.

Thus it may be seen what must be the lines of our personal endeavour, if we are painfully conscious of a defective sense of national obligation in our own country, and desire to do what in us lies to raise the standard into closer accord with the ideal of Christian duty in the world.

Upon ministers of religion the Bishop urges the remembrance of the prophetic character of their office. The law of Christian conduct is in our hearts, but it has constantly to be applied to the affairs of every-day life, to national affairs as to individual duty, so that by the attainment of clearer insight and the spread of a healthier and loftier public sentiment our conduct as a nation may be saved from the reproach of unchristian pride and unscrupulous self-assertion. Such an advance of public sentiment must be a slow process, to be attained only by the patient and steadfast effort of many faithful men, unless indeed some great leader should be given who would at once lift our common life upon the wave of his own passionate enthusiasm, and by some concrete instance of international policy successfully achieved prove to the world how a nobler righteousness can prevail. Then would the nation's achievement, under his leadership, remain as a loftier standard by which all future policy must be judged, and to incite to ever worthier aims.

But, meanwhile, all who believe in righteousness as the power of the living GOD must by every means endeavour to extend its influence over the whole field of life. One instance of what may be done in this direction, Dr. PERCIVAL gives in the following passage :—

A man of large and varied practical experience, and, it may be added, of rare prophetic insight and high enthusiasm, Dr. Paton, of Nottingham, feeling this need of greater attention to higher ethical training, has within the last year or two pressed on some of those charged with the education given in elementary schools (and the need is quite as great in higher schools) the duty of doing more than is systematically done to touch the imagination and the emotions of the young in regard to all the nobler elements of life and character. He would have, for instance, in every elementary school what he calls a Boys' Guild of Honour, in which the chief elements of high character, such as courage, truth, self-command, purity, generosity, chivalry, public spirit, should be systematically set before the boys and impressed on them as elements of life in which they should rejoice and strive to excel. "In addition to the religious teaching," he says, "I desire to see much more direct and emphatic moral teaching of the best kind in our schools. Such teaching should appeal to the imagination and the feelings, which are the great factors of conduct, and should deal with the actual relations of life at home, in work, in companionship, and in all civic relationships.

To the same end the Bishop urges the importance of the work that should be done by Ethical Societies in all the chief centres of our national life, to uphold the loftiest moral ideal, and make its power felt in all the practical activities of the world. This also is surely the duty of the churches and of a true prophetic ministry — to have faith in Eternal Righteousness and to manifest the strength of simple fidelity to the clear leadings of duty. The Bishop quotes Mr. Gladstone's saying, that "what is morally wrong cannot be politically right." To see how what is morally right bears upon public questions, and then to have the courage to advocate and as far as possible pursue the policy thus dictated by the supreme authority, is the duty of every citizen who desires the true greatness of his country.

THE DUTY OF THE PREACHER.*

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

"Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, thus saith the Lord."—Jer. ii. 2.

That is always the work of the preacher. He should speak of things about which he is convinced, not of his doubts or difficulties: he should be the spokesman of the Eternal Word, not the utterer of casual opinions. It is striking to note how that most positive and dominant of personalities, the Apostle Paul, divided between what he felt were his own private opinions and what he felt to be the word of God. In 1 Cor. vii. he is dealing with the mixed marriages of Christians and pagans. The commandments and advice which he gives are not of great importance to us and need not be particularised. The point to be noticed is the way in which Paul takes care to divide between God's will and his own desires, the clear line he draws between what we should call principles and opinions. "But unto the married I give charge—yea not I, but the Lord." "But to the rest say I, not the Lord," and again "Now concerning the unmarried I have no commandment of the Lord: but I give my judgment as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful." This distinction is of fundamental importance for the preacher: he has to be clear in his own mind as to the things about which he can say "Thus saith the Lord," and the things about which he must only say, "I am inclined to think this or that." It is evidently desirable that the preacher shall confine himself as much as possible to principles about which he can say "Thus saith the Lord," aud should spend little time in talking about his opinions, and, above all, it is important that when he does express his opinions he should not confuse them with the word of God and utter them with the tone in which he proclaims principles. But this does not mean that the preacher of to-day is to content himself with exalting abstract morality or the character of Jesus. Everything which happens is capable of religious interpretation: there are great principles involved in it, and those principles if we can see them ought to be expressed from the pulpit.

I want to speak about the freedom of the pulpit, and of its relation to another form of freedom equally important but often ignored, the freedom of the pew. I cau never quite understand what ministers mean when they complain of being muzzled. It was urged recently that we should never get the best young men to enter our ministry unless we gave them larger liberty of speech. They must be allowed to treat of modern problems, to refer to things affecting our national and social life; they must not be expected to confine themselves to moral platitudes, to attack nothing except the bad characters in the Bible, and to bring no politics into the pulpit except the politics of Palestine and Ancient Rome. Most assuredly the modern preacher must be allowed to speak of God in modern life—or rather, allowed or not, he must do it; for my own part I want to do it more and more.

But I cannot understand what right we preachers have to complain if, when we preach unpalatable principles, those who dislike them stay away or band together to oppose the preacher. The freedom of the pew means that each man and woman have a right to their own convictions, and that there is no reason whatever for complaint if they refuse to listen to or support principles in which they disbelieve, or in the application of which they disbelieve. There is no principle of which I know from which it follows that it is the duty of a congregation to attend regularly at a church or chapel where a Gospel is preached in which they don't believe. If a minister were to preach Trinitarianism in one of our churches—which he would have perfect right to do—there would be nothing bigoted in his congregation asking him to leave. He may be so good and admirable that they prefer doctrines they do not believe from him to doctrines they do believe from some one else, caring less for his oral teaching than for the doctrine of his life and character. Or he may be so persuasive and so strong that he can convert all or nearly all to his convictions. Such a minister would be entirely justified in his action. But he would also have no right whatever to complain if he did not convert his congregation and were asked to resign. It would not be in the least a persecution or an injustice. The liberty of the pulpit must be limited by the liberty of the pew. If a preacher is in strong theological discord with his congregation, there is nothing illiberal or unfair in saying they would rather have some one else, and this principle is equally true in politics and social questions. It is entirely right, nay, a preacher is in duty bound to treat of the principles involved in all forms of modern life. He is limited only by his blindness: when he can only see enough to form opinions and cannot find principles he had better be silent: when the facts are so complex and confusing that he feels he does not understand, he had better be silent. But whenever moral principles seem to him involved, then he has a duty, and not merely a right, to speak. But he has no right whatever to complain of being muzzled, if thinking men and women in the pews, who have their own convictions which are opposed to his, should express disapproval.

The preacher is not a chartered libertine of speech, who may attack anything or criticise anybody in the name of a principle, and expect it to be borne patiently and without opposition. That is the assumption of the priest, the demand to be treated as a superior being: it is a demand which arises out of contempt for the men and women in the pew. The essence of priestliness is this assumption and this disdain. It is the denial of the universal sonship of man, and that every soul has some power of knowing God and knowing righteousness. To see God and right through another's eyes, to be dominated in our moral and religious life by another, however wise, is, when it becomes a permanent thing, moral and spiritual ruin. That principle is outraged by the priestly claim to provide the religion and manage the morals of the people, and it is equally a priestly claim when made by the Nonconformist preacher in the form of a demand to be allowed without criticism or opposition to force upon the minds and consciences of his congregation all his social and political convictions. He will proclaim his convictions of course, taking care that they are not opinions with a more august name—only not as a priest who demands humble acquiescence, but as a prophet who is prepared to suffer for them, and who, in spite of the strength of his own convictions, always retains respect for those of others, and a faith that God is with them also as well as with himself. To have to proclaim unpopular convictions is a trial of courage of which there is no reason to complain. Our soldiers might as well complain of being fired at when they attack the enemy, as a preacher complain of being opposed if he expresses convictions strongly at variance with those around him.

When this freedom is granted to the congregation ungrudgingly by the minister, when he admits that he has no ground of complaint whatever if they will not listen to principles which they dislike, then he will not be misunderstood when he claims it as his right and duty to preach religion in modern life even if it touch politics or socialism. He must do it at his own risk, and he would be a coward to complain of the risk. If there is one thing clearer than another about our faith, it is that we believe in a Living God, not one who spoke and walked upon the earth 1900 years ago, and has been silent ever since. England's relationship to other nations, her prosperity or weakness, is conditioned by our moral relation to the divine will, just as certainly as was that of the Jews of old. God judges the world to-day. There can be no greater mistake than for religion to dissociate itself from modern life and modern problems. Some time ago there was a complaint against our weekly paper The Inquirer, because its editor ventured to refer to the South African war. I can speak with less fear of being thought prejudiced because his convictions are not mine. It was urged that The Inquirer should confine itself to reporting tea parties and to publishing theological reviews. Such separation from active pulsing life would be to betray religion. If it were a theological or literary weekly, politics and social questions would be outside its sphere: but it is a religious weekly, and in that word is recognised amongst other things the duty of finding and expressing the will of God in every event of modern life. God is working here and now, is speaking to us here and now, and one of the channels through which His words come to us as heretofore, is through men and women who are in earnest, who are pure in heart and without fear. It is far better for a man to express thoughts and convictions with which we do not agree, than that he should ignore those great present day occurrences, and so treat them as if they were outside religion. To-day is the Sphinx whose riddle we have to read, whose divine meaning we have to understand: our life does not depend on understanding God's message 2,000 years ago, but on understanding God's message to-day. His former messages and the great procession of history with all its tragedies and teaching, are useful only as they help to the understanding of to-day. The nation or the church which does not read the Sphinx riddle of to-day, which does not see the divine will in the present and try to obey, will perish, whatever be its knowledge of the past.

No minister will claim a monopoly of the prophetic power: he will know that this power of feeling God's love and seeing His will is in every man and woman, although often latent in all. But, however ready to acknowledge the power in others, he will know there is something of the power in himself. He will divide, as carefully as possible between this power and his mere opinions, likes and dislikes, passing notions and ideas: but he will express without fear his own convictions, not complaining if they are opposed, but feeling the divine constraint upon him to say what he believes. "Woe is me," said Paul, "if I preach not the Gospel." For a religious teacher to ignore politics and social questions is to deny the presence of God in modern life, and to disbelieve in God's message to the world to-day.

THE HIGHER UNITARIANISM.

The "First Unitarian Congregational Society of Rochester" (New York), which adopted its original covenant in May, 1843, has at present a "Bond of Union," adopted in 1892, and spoken of in the "Church Year Book" as a matter of heart-love for the Church and one another, having nothing to do with finance or legal rights.

The minister of this church is the Rev. William Channing Gannett, most widely known in this country, perhaps, by his "Blessed be Drudgery," and the other sermons that went with it, but also by his "Year of Miracle" and the hymns and poems which are collected in the two little volumes of "The Thought of God" by him and the Rev. F. L. Hosmer.

The "Bond of Union" in Mr. Gannett's church is as follows:—

"Love is the Spirit of this Church, and Service is its Law.
This is our great Covenant:
To dwell together in Peace, to seek the Truth in Love,
And to help one another."

"In the freedom of the Truth, and in the spirit of Human Brotherhood, and to the end that the best meaning of these words may open in our minds, and fill our lives, and make us strong to bear a helpful part in our community, we who here subscribe our names do by this act enter into a Covenant of Love and Service and Right Endeavour with each other.

"Our doctrinal beliefs we hold always open to re-statement, as growing thought and purer life reveal new truth. We welcome to our membership all who wish to join us in following after righteousness and love."

Among other interesting matter contained in the "Church Year Book" is the following opening address by Mr. Gannett on "The Higher Unitarianism":—

The Principles of Freedom and Fellowship and Character and Service in Religion are infinitely greater than "Unitarianism." They gave birth to us, not we to them; and ours is but one voice in the nursery chorus that to-day is trying to interpret their high meanings. These Four Principles are the supreme things on which to lay stress, whenever we are asked what our name stands for in Religion. But here let us sum up the noble Faiths to which these Principles seem to be leading us and our comrades. And if we call such faiths the "Higher Unitarianism," what we mean is, not the foolish thought that faiths great as these are only truly named, or even best named, when thus named, but simply the hope that our own Unitarianism means this to-day for ourselves. Let others name it the "Higher Orthodoxy," or the "Higher Judaism," if they will, and so much the better. We will rejoice together. I think, then, that the Higher Unitarianism means—

1. A view of Religion, which traces its source to actual experiences in the Soul; to gradual dawns of thought, of feeling, of motive, of ideal, in consciousness; to sudden shinings sometimes there; to happenings that happen in the spirit as really as things happen to our bodies of flesh. A Religion which may care, and yet but little cares, to weave arguments concerning God or probe the whys and wherefores of Prayer, but which wakes up to the consciousness, "That was Prayer! I felt it! I did it! And the unknown Force and Face in the silence within me was—God!" and which shall make us, remembering the experience, seek that silence and tempt that light again, until our life becomes "communion," a sense of life in common with the One Life, One Light, in all.

2. It means a Theism, which sees Law as Love, and Love as Law, which knows no miracle but the infinite miracle of Nature, begetting endless awe and endless joy in man; which believes that in the dialect of Heaven are no such words as "accident" or "tragedy," but that all that we misname thus is really Goodness on the way to vision. A Theism which discerns that all in Nature named, in our dismembering pronouns, "It," is as truly "He," and all we glorify as "his" is only that which men so long have deadened into "It"—transfigured!

3. It means a Christianity, which identifies itself with the Holy Spirit manifested anywhere and everywhere; a Christianity which stands for the life called "Christ"—not Christ, the blessed Jew, who once exemplified the life, nor Christ the date, a numbered "year of the Lord," but the impulse "Christ," the movement "Christ," the spirit "Christ," for ever moving souls and shaping history; here known by one name, there by another; never begun and never ended, and never confined to any holy May-hour of human experience.

4. It means a Bible, which shall go on compiling itself inside the world's memory and gratitude; freshening old reverences with tender new ones, welcoming and canonising new ideals of truth and life wherever such ideals are nobly rendered into the perpetuating Word.

5. It means a Faith in Immortality—faith not incurious to watch for stars of sign and beckoning that may break the skies, and yet no whit afraid if we must wait our turn to know that what we call the future life will be; a faith which cherishes, meanwhile, the sense of deathlessness that rises in us as our will becomes one with the Moral Law—that sense of deathlessness which makes all Easter questions end in quiet smiles.

6. Finally, it means Brotherhood—recognition that, though individual, we yet are members of each other in a sense so full that parables of Good Samaritans can only hint it, and no nineteenth-century science can describe it. It means perception that our trusteeship for each other applies not only to all outer things that we call "property," but, as truly, to the inmost things that we call "faculty." It means an ever-growing realisation that "no one liveth, no one dieth, to himself"; that we only attain true selfhood by unselfing processes; and that all things which unrim us into oneness with our fellow-men, until, of our own choice, we share their aches, their poverties, their disinheritance—that these unrim us also into oneness with what we call, not fellow-man, but "God": so that by experience we learn that love to Man is love to God, and that only in proportion to such love we live.

Is not this—or something nobler yet, if nobler can be—the Unitarianism of our hope? Are not these the Higher Unities toward which we, and a far larger host who never bore, and never will, our name, are rising? The Unity of Religion with Human Nature; the Unity of God with Universal Nature; the Unity of Christianity with all movements of the Holy Spirit everywhere; the Unity of the Bible with Literature; the Unity of Life hereafter with Life here and now; the Unity of Self with Fellow-man and God. These are the great Faiths to which the Principles of Freedom, Fellowship, Character, and Service in Religion are leading all men. Is it not so?

Religion is an instinct of the spirit which quickens the house of clay wherein it is confined; an aspiration as that of the eagle's callow brood, born to cleave the sky, though yet only capable of fluttering within their nest.—Charles Hargrove.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF A MANCHESTER UNITARIAN.

No. I.

I go back in memory to a Sunday-school formerly held under the chapel in Mosley-street, of which the minister was the Rev. John James Tayler, B.A. The room, I believe, was originally occupied by bales of cotton. Then, and for some following years, this important article was kept for sale by many Manchester merchants. I have seen large quantities of it in a warehouse suitably placed in "Cotton Court" leading from Smithy Door to Deansgate. Well, the cotton having been cleared out the scholars came in. About 1831 I was appointed a teacher, surely the youngest of the staff. The most prominent of the school authorities were Mr. John Swanwick, and the late Messrs. Edward Herford, James M. Darbishire, John Craven, James Hall, W. Barrow, and Richard Aspden. The latter was the manager of the savings bank. With him I deposited many a small economy, little dreaming that I should ever sit with him as a fellow-member of the City Council, and a colleague in several departments of Unitarian activity. Shortly afterwards I was induced to give up my class and undertake the charge of the library, thus beginning a kind of public work which, in one connection or another, has never, or hardly ever, been interrupted. In this underground apartment the school remained till the congregation sold the building, and prepared for their new chapel in Upper Brook-street.

Before the old chapel was demolished accommodation was found for the school in a large room in the Mechanics' Institution in Cooper-street, but only until, in 1836, the commodious new day and Sunday school was erected in Lower Mosley-street, which thenceforward became its home until about three years ago, when it was advantageously sold, and a larger and better building was provided. The Upper Brook-street Church was opened in 1839. I was intensely interested on the occasion. Mr. Tayler conducted the devotional services; and I saw and heard, for the first time, the distinguished preacher of the day—the Rev. James Martineau.* I must have been deeply impressed, for I remember his first sentence which, if not identical with, was very nearly this: "Hitherto no voice has been heard in this sacred place but that of psalmody and prayer; the descent is harsh to this profaner speech." Mr. Tayler for many years had a large, influential and deeply attached congregation. Among them were the bearers of such notable names as Schwabe, Darbishire, Kennedy, Wood, McConnel, Leisler, Reiss, Oldenburg, and others. On his removal to London, to continue in Manchester New College his lectures on Ecclesiastical History, and to become joint pastor with Mr. Martineau at Little Portland-street Chapel, many of his old friends left and founded the German Church in Greenheys. His immediate successor was the Rev. Joseph Henry Hutton, B.A., who was followed by the Revs. Edwin Smith, M.A., W. H. Herford, B.A., Silas Farrington, John Trevor, Christopher J. Street, M.A., and by the present pastor, the Rev. Charles Peach.

* A copy of the sermon, entitled "Outer and Inner Temple," is in the library of the British Museum. It is reprinted in Dr. Martineau's Essays, Reviews, and Addresses. Vol. IV.

Shortly before 1833 much interest was excited by a visit to friends in Manchester and Liverpool of the Rev. Dr. Tuckerman, of Boston, U.S. With a tender and irresistible eloquence he pleaded for the appointment, in each of our large towns, of a "Visitor to the Poor," which was his characteristic phrase. His office should be to select a district, and go from door to door with his message of sympathy—to cheer the sick, assist the poor, in every practicable way, and prove himself a wise counsellor and a true friend. The effect of his advocacy was the establishment of a Mission to the Poor in Manchester (Rochdale-road) and Hulme, and two years afterwards in Liverpool. The chief promoters in the former town bore names still deservedly held in honour—Martin Schunck, Sam. Alcock, Samuel D. Darbishire, Benjamin and James Heywood, and other excellent men. They were encouraged and supported by the learned and pious ministers who then shed distinction on the local pulpits—Tayler, Beard, Robberds and Gaskell. The first appointed missionary, the Rev. John Ashworth, had, I believe, been formerly connected with the Methodist body, and he brought to his truly Christian work something of the religious enthusiasm one associates with their history.

About this time a band of enlightened men—amongst them several of the founders of the Mission to the Poor—seeing the lamentable condition of popular education, projected the establishment of the Lower Mosley-street Day Schools in the building specially intended to accommodate the Sunday-school. The committee had the good fortune to engage the services of the late Mr. J. O. Curtis. His ability, his organising skill, his deeply religious tone, and the influence and charm of his personality, soon gave the school a leading position in the community. Its only rival was that attached to the Swedenborgian Chapel in Peter-street, inspired and directed by the late Mr. Moss, himself also a born and gifted teacher. Mr. Curtis, in addition to his arduous labours on five days of the week, was also for many years the efficient and valued superintendent of the Sunday-school, conducting a morning religious service for the young. He transmitted his mantle to his pupil and successor, Mr. George Smith, who emulated the zeal, ability, and influence of his master and instructor. For a long period they were assisted on the Sunday by educated and competent teachers, several being students of Manchester New College when, in 1840, it was brought from York to Manchester. The names of Darbishire, John Wright, Herford, Crosskey, Steinthal, Harding, Marcus, Pilcher, Nanson, Wade, Reynolds, and Travers Madge, will ever, with others, be identified with the unparalleled influence and success of this school. The settlement of Manchester New College here was an event of peculiar interest. It made a brilliant effort to provide for laymen, as well as for ministers, a liberal course not alone of literary, but of scientific and philosophical instruction. Its staff included Francis William Newman, as Classical professor; the Rev. James Martineau had the department of Mental Philosophy and Logic; the Rev. John Kenrick, M.A., History; the Rev. John Gooch Robberds, Pastoral Theology and Hebrew and Syriac Languages; the Rev. John James Tayler, Ecclesiastical History; the Rev. Robert Wallace, Theology; Mr. Montague Phillips, Physical Science, and Mr. Finlay, Mathematics. The scheme hardly met with the support deserved by its merits, and the distinguished men by whom it was directed. This advent of professors and students brought an appreciated addition to our local society. The latter, like all their genus, were not lacking in energy and good spirits. They formed friendships with several families of the congregations, and more than one engagement and wedding ensued.

A small institution deserves a passing notice, the constitution of which was a marvellous contrast to present methods of supplying religious literature. It was called "The Lancashire and Cheshire Unitarian Book and Tract Society." It offered to its subscribers the privilege of purchasing the publications it kept in stock at a discount of twopence in the shilling, and had, for some years, a fair amount of success. But the altered conditions of the book trade undermined its usefulness, and it became a somewhat quaint survival of a bygone system.

Considerable interest attended the operations of the Village Missionary Society. It undertook the religious superintendence of a number of small but intelligent congregations in the Peak of Derbyshire. The Rev. Robert Shenton was the chief resident preacher. As secretary to the committee I accompanied the late Rev. James Yates, M.A., on a visit, about 1846, to the stations at Great Hucklow, Bradwell, and Stoney Middleton. He had expressed a desire to make the personal acquaintance of those poor but earnest and exemplary people. At an earlier period the local mines had been profitably worked, but on their becoming largely exhausted many of the villagers left to seek their living in other places. Subsequently I made a second visit with the late Mr. James Chorley. In recent years some of the stations, notably Great Hucklow, have been revived and encouraged by the kindly oversight and generous aid of the Rev. Lawrence Scott. The Society eventually collapsed; but several of its supporters attached themselves to the Manchester District Missionary Association, which shortly afterwards was founded. It has long done useful work, and was never more energetically conducted than at the present time.

At two widely different periods I was a member, for a short time only in each case, of the Cross-street congregation; in the first the Revs. J. G. Robberds and William Gaskell were the ministers, and in the second the Revs. W. Gaskell and S. A. Steinthal. The pew in which I sat in my younger days was next to that of Mr. (subsequently Sir) Benjamin Heywood, and I used to see him and his large family of boys stream into their places every Sunday. Among the worshippers were numerous prominent public men, representing the benevolent, educational, municipal and political interests of the city. Sir William Fairbairn was a constant attendant; as were Mr. John Edward Taylor, founder of the Manchester Guardian; Mr. Alex. Henry, member for South Lancashire; Sir Thomas Potter, first Mayor of Manchester; he was followed in the same office, ten years afterwards, by his son, Sir John Potter, who in 1857 was, with Mr. James Aspinall Turner, elected member for the city. They displaced Messrs. Gibson and Bright at the most excited parliamentary contest ever held in Manchester. But in the process of time the congregation suffered in numbers and influence by the increasing facilities of railway traffic, which carried people away, farther and farther, from their old town and suburban residences. This and other causes equally affected all the local churches and chapels; church and dissent. I can well remember sixteen or seventeen flourishing congregations; and now Cross-street, as it was the earliest, is the only remaining representative of Nonconformity in our midst.

For a long period of years I was connected with the Greengate, subsequently the Strangeways, Unitarian congregation. Its foundation may be traced to a band of religious and earnest laymen, who regularly undertook a share of local preaching work. They were penetrated with a belief that Unitarianism would soon be the universal faith of England. Of that they would have thought it wrong to entertain the shadow of a doubt. Intelligent and liberal-minded as they were, it is curious to note that, when framing the rules of their society, it was made a condition that every member should append his name to a declaration of the fundamental principles they held, in addition to the promise of a contribution of not less than 2s. 6d. a quarter. In two or three years they felt strong enough to engage Mr. William Duffield's services as minister. When he became unable to continue the work, Mr. Peter Eckersley was instructed to invite the Rev. John Relly Beard, who had been a distinguished student at Manchester College, York, the stipend to be £120 per annum. His acceptance was dated March 25, 1825. They secured a small building in Dawson's Croft, Greengate. There they and their talented minister remained until, after a period of unfortunate misunderstandings, they and he removed, in 1842, to the more commodious chapel in New Bridge-street, Strangeways.

On Dr. Beard's eminent services to religious literature, his marked success in conducting a high-class school, the stimulating and inspiring influence he exercised in the practical cultivation of the missionary spirit, his amazing industry, energy and zeal, his origination of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, of which he became principal, and of the Memorial Hall as its future permanent home, it is needless in these columns to dilate. His ever active, progressive mind, dealt in his pulpit with many topics which then attracted little notice. Long before "Citizen Sundays" were projected, it was a distinctive feature of his pulpit teachings to illustrate and insist upon the duty of every member of a community to do "suit and service" for the common good. He had the gratification of seeing in his congregation two aldermen (Abel Heywood and Ivie Mackie) become Mayors of the City, and he influenced the mind of another (Alderman Grundy), who for two years (1877-8 and 1878-9) occupied the same dignified and influential office. To this list must be added three councillors—Mr. James Woodley, Mr. Hibbert, and another, who, some years ago, was elected an alderman, and by the kind confidence of his colleagues was subsequently offered the civic chair, which, however, he gratefully declined.

AN OLD NONCONFORMIST LAWSUIT.

Although the Toleration Act has frequently been styled (not very happily) the Dissenters' Magna Charta, many succeeding statutes were needed to complete the beneficent reform which it inaugurated. Nor can it be said that Nonconformists have yet received at the hands of the Legislature that full measure of justice which is the due of of every loyal British subject.

But, independently of statute law, an ample field lay open for the extension of the remedies given by the celebrated Act of William and Mary. It has been pointed out by not a few jurists that what Bentham called "judge-made law" (i.e., the virtual making, under the guise of mere declaring or interpreting) is as powerful an agent as the enactments of Parliament—if indeed it be not more powerful.

Under the guidance of a broad-minded judge (Lord Chief Justice Holt was such a one, and Lord Mansfield carried on his traditions) many shortcomings of the Act might thus be made good, and many inconsistencies harmonised.

Section 6 expressly provided that nothing contained in the Act should be construed to exempt any of the persons benefiting under it "from paying of tythes or other parochial duties, or any other duties to the church or minister, nor from any prosecution in any Ecclesiastical Court, or elsewhere, for the same."

Even had the wording of the section been less ambiguous, we could scarcely be surprised—human nature being what it is—to find the clergy of the Established Church prepared to strain the enactment to an extent often incompatible with logic and common sense.

Where these claims were brought to the test of a law-suit, the Dissenters generally carried the day. Each decision in their favour, forming as it did a precedent, constituted a fresh clause in their charter of freedom. Thus, side by side with the remedial Acts to be found in the statute-book, there grew up a corpus juris or code of so-called "unwritten law," which expanded, controlled, and explained them.

The importance of such test-cases was not so apparent to all concerned as it might have been, had the power of the Press (only recently unmuzzled) and of the other media by which public opinion is generated and propagated, been what it is to-day.

There was, however, much apathy among those who ought to have shown zeal and enthusiasm.

On the other hand—let the Dissenter of to-day never forget it—there were within the Nonconformist ranks not a few stout and able champions, both clerical and lay, whose sympathies were not bounded by the walls of their meeting-houses, but who recognised in the cause of one of their brethren the common cause of all.

Among the deeds and papers belonging to the old chapel at Gateacre, near Liverpool, are a number of letters and other documents relating to a suit which was once a cause célèbre in the Nonconformist world, and which still retains an historical interest, as representing one of the many laborious steps by which Dissenters have attained their present position of liberty.

The decision of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Scott v. Naylor (reported in Barnardiston's K.B. Reports, Vol. I., p. 159; and Raymond's Reports, p. 1558) established the immunity of Dissenters from liability to pay customary fees to the parson of their parish, for the churching of their wives, in cases where such churching had in fact not taken place.

The ecclesiastic who asserted this preposterous claim was the Rev. Thomas Scott, vicar of Wakefield—a Tory High Churchman of Jacobite sympathies—a man of a very different kidney from the more familiar, if less historic, incumbent of that parish—Dr. Primrose, of fragrant memory.

The printed reports above-mentioned give the pith of the matter—the dry legal essence of the case. The bundle of tattered papers, written in faded ink, which lie before me, give more. They help one to realise those

> Old forgotten far-off days,
> And fights fought long ago.

The reader is enabled by their means to enter into the joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears of the litigants; to trace, more or less imperfectly, the course of the suit through its various stages; from the issue of the citation in the Ecclesiastical Court of York, down to the crowning decision of the King's Bench, "in arrest of judgment," which nullified the verdict of a prejudiced Tory jury, and rendered unavailing the perjured testimony of a too-loyal parish clerk.

But it is time to say a word of the real, if not the apparent, protagonist in the fight. This was the Rev. Joseph Lawton, minister of Gateacre Chapel, from some unascertained date (probably not much before 1715) until 1747. From some other papers—in a still more fragmentary condition than the bundle under notice—we gather that he had already been engaged in a similar contest with the Vicar of Childwall (the parish within which Gateacre Chapel was situated) concerning the liability of Dissenters to pay fees to the vicar on the occasions of baptisms, marriages, and burials, at which the vicar's services had not been employed. We are left in tantalising ignorance as to the issue of this earlier litigation. The ripened experience which it enabled Mr. Lawton to bring to the defence of the Vicar of Wakefield's suit is apparent from the large number of counsel's opinions, extracts from law reports and legal text-books, carefully copied and endorsed in the minister's neat but crabbed hand, which form part of the Scott v. Naylor "dossier."

The defendant in the cause was a Mr. Ebenezer Naylor, who, in his "Answer" to the vicar's "Libel," admits having had had twelve children born to him, and that his wife is then living. Whether Mr. Naylor was personally acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Lawton we do not know: probably he was not. What seems clear is that the latter, fresh from his skirmish with the vicar of Childwall (possibly flushed with recent victory), recognised in the claim now set up against a fellow-Nonconformist an opportunity of bringing to a legal test another point of grave consequence to the Dissenting community.

It was probably due to Lawton's efforts in inducing Mr. Naylor to stand his ground, and in furnishing the sinews of war, by means of contributions levied upon friends in Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and elsewhere, that the question came to be decided, as it ultimately was, in the Dissenters' favour.

Letters from the Rev. Joseph Mottershead, the minister of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester (for an account of whom see Nightingale's "Lancashire Nonconformity," vol. v., pp. 97—101), show that the Manchester flock were disposed to bear their share of the expenses of their "brethren at Wakefield."

But the brunt of the whole battle seems to have fallen upon the good minister at Gateacre. He collected funds, perhaps found witnesses, interviewed counsel, and (to judge from his voluminous notes, and his "paucula excerpta a quibusdam legum professoribus") diligently searched the reports and text-books, to ascertain the law on the subject. It is no small loss that Mr. Lawton's own letters cannot be added to our bundle. They would probably have been found the most interesting of all.

The first of the dramatis personæ to come upon the stage is Mr. Thomas Bootle, an eminent advocate of the day, who, writing on March 8, 1728, to "Mr. Pemberton, Mercht. in Leverpoole," acknowledges the receipt of a letter from that gentleman "and several other gentlemen (for whom I have the greatest esteem) on behalf of Mr. Naylor," and expresses his regret at having accepted a retainer in the case from the plaintiff, in ignorance that it was "against one for whom so many of my friends had so great an esteem." The retainer shall be handed back, that his forensic talent may be at the service of the defence.

The next letter bears date Oct. 20, in the same year, and is directed to "The Rev. Mr. Joseph Lawton, in Liverpool (by Rochdale bag)." The writer is one Richard Milnes, of Wakefield, who appears to have acted as intermediary between Mr. Naylor and his attorney—Mr. Ingram, of Wakefield—and the Rev. J. Lawton and other Liverpool supporters. Mr. Milnes was apparently a son-in-law of Mr. Pemberton, whom he frequently refers to as his "father." Most of the letters in the bundle are from his hand.

In the present one the writer refers to some legal advice contained in a previous letter from Lawton, and asks the minister's opinion upon a further question.

The vicar of Wakefield's libel had included a claim for burial fees (no burial services having been, in fact, rendered). "As regards these," says Milnes, "Mr. Naylor was advised to allow of the demands for burials, &c., as having been customarily paid, and not to clog the prohibition too much; but when once the point of churching is secured, we will have a fair trial for the rest." A somewhat too sanguine surmise; for this same "allowing of the demands for burials" was to breed future trouble.

The next letter is the most interesting in the collection, and, though lengthy, must be transcribed in its entirety:—

"Wakefield, March 31, 1729.

"Revd. Sir,—On Wednesday last the cause between Mr. Naylor and our vicar was tried at York, and the verdict was brought in by the jury in favour of the vicar, contrary, as I have reason to believe, both of the Judge and the whole Court, not even excepting their own counsel. But what will not a Tory jury do when the rights of the Church, as they apprehend, are in dispute? Some of them said they would be racked and torn to pieces before they would give it against the Church. This is the rock I was always afraid we should split on, though we were as well in that respect as we could well hope, the foreman of the jury and another being Dissenters; but the other ten were entirely against them; so, after two or three hours' sharp contest, they submitted to the greater number.

"I shall now proceed to give you an account how the trial was managed. Upon the jury being first called over, when they was going to swear Mr. Brooksbank, of Ealand, the Foreman, the Vicar's Counsel objected against him as being a Dissenter; but Sir Tho. Pengelly, the judge, overruled their objection by telling them that by the same rule Mr. Naylor's Counsel might as well object against all the rest for being Churchmen. Upon which, the jury being sworn, the Judge, after reading the record, told the jury it was an issue out of the King's Bench; that the Vicar insisted upon 10d. by the custom of the parish of Wakefield for a churching fee, though the women were not churched, and that Mr. Naylor denied the said custom, which they were now to try; not as to the validity, legality, or reasonableness of the said custom, they had nothing to do with that—which he told them was to be tried above—so they were only to try whether there was a custom or not. Upon which, the Vicar's Counsel, after opening the cause, proceeded to call their witnesses, six or seven in number. The six first witnesses, amongst which was one, Mr. Paley, a clergyman, who was formerly curate there about twelve years, did all of them prove a custom for those to pay whose wives were churched—namely, at the time of their churching; but being asked whether they had ever known any pay that were not churched, all answered they never heard of any that did. But at last comes old Mr. Barber, our own parish clerk, and he swore roundly that it had been a custom for Dissenters to pay time out of mind. He swore the former clerk had told him so, who was an old man, and as for himself, all persons had paid it in his time from whom it was demanded, and that Mr. Naylor was the first that had refused. He swore particularly that my father and several other Dissenters had paid him to the number of eighty-four times, which he drew out of a book he kept for the registering of children when the Act of Parliament for the registering of births and burials was in force; and he swore that both before that Act and since the expiration of it, the Dissenters had regularly paid when demanded; and a good deal more by which this poor wretch is as much perjured as ever man was.

"We had several witnesses there, to have confronted him—some of them the very same persons he swore had paid—who would have sworn they never did pay him; but as they were all of them persons living within the town and parish, they could not be admitted to give their evidence, it being contrary to law for any person to be admitted as evidence against a custom who is then residing in the parish; which was extremely hard upon us, for we have none now residing out of our parish that have lived formerly here and had a family and children, but four, and we had three of them at York, who all swore they never had anything demanded of them for churching, nor heard of it before. The fourth lives at a considerable distance, so we could not have him, but he could not have helped us much, being none of those Barber swore had paid him for churching; for he took care to mention none but such as he knew could not be admitted to confront and take of (sic) his evidence. In short, upon this evidence it was—such as it is—that we were cast.

"Barber has swallowed so strong a pill that I fancy he has not well digested it yet, for I am told to-day that he is much out of order. Should he die now, no doubt it will be said he died a martyr in the Church's cause.

"It appears from the manner of expression made use of by the Judge in summing up the evidence, that he suspected Barber's, for when he came to take notice of his, he said to this effect: 'As to Barber, he has proved a custom, if you will give any credit to his evidence. But,' says he, 'it is pretty remarkable that amongst so many old women as have been examined on the same side that none of them ever knew or heard of this custom, and much more that Mr. Paley, the former curate, should know nothing of it,' and then took notice of the difficulty we on our side laboured under as to evidence, which was acknowledged to be hard, but that, however, those we had, proved as far as they could there was no custom.

"This, Sir, is the best account of the affair I can give. When Mr. Bootle comes to Liverpool, he will be able to give you and our friends a more perfect one. We are exceedingly obliged to him, for he worked hard for us, and exerted himself as much as in any cause I ever heard him. He was so busy that after the trial was over he could spare but little time to consult what steps were most proper to be taken at London, but as he will have time enough when (he) comes to Liverpool, I would have you and the rest of our friends fully to consult and advise with him what is to be done, and to propose such cases to him as you shall think proper; for I know no person more fit than yourself. If I possibly can, I will come over myself if (I) did but know when he would be at Liverpool. I have been at York the whole assize, so that (I) am now in a hurry of business at home. Please to acquaint Mr. Pemberton (I) shall write to him the next post, and that we are all well.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, Richard Milnes."

Three days later comes another letter from Milnes, suggesting certain points to be put to Mr. Bootle on his shortly-expected arrival in Liverpool. The following passage is noteworthy, for it deals with what ultimately proved to be the pivot upon which the whole case turned.

"After the vicar's witnesses had been examined, the judge took notice that the vicar's counsel had not produced any evidence to prove the time that our wives ought to have been churched, or when the money ought to have been paid, except as is mentioned in the Common Prayer-book, where it says 'the usual time,' but they did not prove what the usual time was. Whereupon the vicar's counsel begged his lordship not (to) represent it to their disadvantage; but he answered that he must represent things as they were."

Upon the same sheet as the above letter to Lawton is one to Pemberton, in which the writer announces that Mr. Edward Bootle (brother to the defendant's senior counsel) "gave great hopes of succeeding above"—presumably upon an application for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

"We were, on our return from York," continues the writer, "welcomed with ringing of bells, bonfires, &c., &c.; with the old Jacobite phrase of "Down with the Rump"; as if they had got an entire conquest; for our Jacks concern themselves much in the vicar's cause, because he is one of the greatest supports they have in this part of the country, in his way."

THE JONAH LEGEND.*

THE late Mr. William Simpson, the author of this book, was the well-known artist of the Illustrated London News, and had seen and studied men and worships in many lands. His reading and his travels have supplied him with a wealth of instances bearing more or less resemblance to the story of Jonah; and these make interesting reading, whether we accept his theory or not. His Freemasonry ceremonies and symbols are also in his thoughts; and those mysteries have much to do with the simulation of death and re-birth. To this day the tribes of men in many lands practise rites of initiation which have the signification of going down to death and returning from the dead. Mr. Simpson has much to say about the Egyptian "Book of the Dead," and the Greek Eleusinian Mysteries, and concerning Brahmanic and Zoroastrian ceremonies, because he guesses that in all these the foundation and origin was initiatory rites. The secrets of these mystery meetings were never fully divulged, but Apuleius ventures to tell us as much as this, after his initiation into the Eleusinia: "I approached the confines of death, and having trod on the threshold of Proserpine, I returned therefrom, being borne through all the elements. At midnight I saw the sun shining with brilliant light: and I approached the presence of the gods beneath, and the gods of heaven, and stood near and worshipped them." And this was new birth to him, for he adds: "I celebrated the most joyful day of my initiation as my natal day."

Mr. Simpson emphasises the fact that initiatory rites are intimately connected with man's first ideas regarding death, the next world, and the ghosts or gods that exist there. These ceremonies preceded entrance into kinship, into manhood, citizenship, membership of a tribe or an order. The symbolism as a rule is regenerative, like the symbolism of being buried in baptism and rising again to newness of life. Mr. Simpson essays to show that the Jonah initiation was that of a priestly order; and he thinks that in the temple where it was enacted there would be a pit or cave to represent the Underworld. In mediæval sculptures and pictures, the mouth of a sea-monster is represented as the mouth of hell. Jonah, in his prayer, says he is in the womb of Sheol. Then follows re-birth. Mr. Simpson remarks that there was no real fish in the case: it does not occur to him to mention that the undersphere of the celestial globe shows the constellation Cetus in the very place where it would be wanted. Curiously enough Mirkhond, in his account of Jonah, says: Therefore the fish approached the shore by divine command, where it ejected Jonah like an infant wrapt in swaddling-clothes. Christ's own words, our author thinks, leave no doubt that the symbolism in the Jonah legend is that of re-birth: "as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth"—and then rise to new life.

Mr. Simpson suggests that the Book of Jonah may have been brought back from the Captivity, and the story localised at Joppa, where by the way, in Greek myth, Andromeda was to be devoured by a sea-monster, and whence the bones of a whale were carried to Rome as relics of the same. The story of Hercules and Hesione is another parallel. In Babylon the material of the kind was ancient and plentiful; and civilisation was said to have been brought to that country by Oannes, a man who came out of a fish.

Mr. Simpson, though fruitful in suggestion, is a careful writer, who never makes an assertion not justified by his evidence. He would not say that he has fully proved the Jonah legend to be simply the description of an initiatory rite. But like Mr. Fraser in his "Golden Bough," he presents us with a large collection of similar rites, and produces the impression that the story of Jonah is one of a class. In support of his theory he shows that the legends of ceremonies have actually, in some other cases, become established as events that really took place. Nevertheless we cannot altogether agree with him. Frazer says that custom is first, and then the myth is invented to explain the custom. K. O. Müller had said the same before, and argued that the myth springs from the worship and not the worship from the myth. Mr. Simpson thinks that the story of Jonah may admit of explanation on this theory: that there was a ceremony of initiation into the priestly office—a dramatic representation of descending into Hades and coming forth re-born—and in process of time this was mistaken for an historical event. He would say the same of the myth of Persephone—and he can quote an ancient writer who says that the Eleusinian mysteries were a mystical drama in which the history of Demeter and her daughter was acted, like a play, by priests and priestesses.

But such examples hardly support the contention; for even thus there must have been a myth of Demeter seeking her daughter in the Underworld, before the story was put on the stage in the mysteries. The legend of Jonah would be told before it was enacted as an initiatory rite. Still the story might, in the first instance, be symbolical — an allegorical piece of doctrinal teaching, not involving any incredibility. Our own impression is that the Hebrew writer selected such a legend, from the abundance then at command, and adapted it to his own purpose. He simply used it as the frame-work for the moral lessons he wished to teach his countrymen. Their prophets had been declaring that Jehovah was the God of the whole earth, and all gods of the nations were but idols. It was time they accepted the corollary that the Jews had no exclusive property in God—that He would show mercy to the Ninevites, for example—and that all mankind were brothers. The leading expositors are now coming to take some such view of this delightful Hebrew parable; and when this rational explanation is thoroughly popularised, all scoffing at Jonah and his fish will cease. There can be no doubt that Mr. Simpson's book will contribute to this good result.

In addition, it is rich in matter valuable to the student of legend, suggestive to the Scripture expositor, and interesting to the general reader. Freemasons, too, will revel in it. The volume is enriched with some curious illustrations, reproduced by permission from Layard's "Nineveh," Wilkinson's "Ancient Egyptians," Bonomi's "Nineveh," and from gems, &c., in the British Museum.

GAMMER'S BANK.

OLD farmer Gammer made an oak porch
Whence to watch the glitt'ring stars.
In his quaint white coat, on the bay cob,
Often at dusk,
Will he greet you, o'ertaking you, keeping the green,
Cantering on
Back to his gables,
To his hollyhock garden,
To the long path lined with lavender
That leads to the porch:
Under its honeysuckle
He will sit and ponder;
Serene in the arms of its grey beams;
Eyeing the spangled skies from their nook.
A newcomer, who once trespassed on his evening ease,
Asked the best local bank—
"There it is, neighbour," said he,
And pointed upward to the great counter
Bright with the gold of God.

E. BETHAM.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bedfield.—Services have been conducted recently by Miss F. Hill (C.P.M.) and Mr. F. Robinson (Stowmarket). On Sunday, Aug. 5, the school anniversary services were conducted by the minister. The evening service was commenced in a field at Monk Soham, and—a heavy storm coming on—was continued in a cart shed near. The school treat was held at Monk Soham on the following Wednesday.

Evesham.—On Sunday the Mayor, Mr. Geoffrey New, accompanied by members of the Corporation, attended morning service at the Oat-street Chapel, the Rev. Rudolf Davis being the preacher.

London.—The Rev. D. Amos, who is at present in charge of the Bermondsey Church, will be the preacher next Wednesday at the City mid-day service at the Falcon-square Congregational Church, Aldersgate-street, close to the General Post Office. These services are held in connection with the Congregational Young People's Union every Wednesday from 1 to 1.30 P.M. Preachers are announced up to the end of September, the last on the list, for Sept. 26, being the Rev. Bernard J. Snell.

London: Channing House School.—The following successes are reported:—Matriculation (July):—First-class: Miss Alice Mary Mellor and Miss Jane Williamson. In the Trinity College of Music Preliminary Examination, Miss Kate Latache, with honours.

London: College Chapel, Stepney Green.—On Sunday, Aug. 5, the usual conference in connection with the Central Postal Mission was held at five o'clock. Mr. John Evans took the chair, and Mr. Lucking Tavener introduced the subject of the Christian Endeavour Movement. In his address he called attention to the startling and encouraging fact that a religious society had grown in nineteen years from one small chapel meeting with forty-eight members to an association of 56,566 societies, with 3,363,960 members. It was a movement whose strength was in the direction where Unitarians were weak. Essentially it was a young people's organisation for the deepening of religious life and the extension of organised usefulness. From personal experience, Mr. Tavener asserted that in orthodox bodies, where the Christian Endeavour Society existed, the young people did so much of the work of the church. It provided a Look-out Committee (for watching for absentees), a Prayer-meeting Committee, and a Visiting Committee. The other distinctive feature of the Society was its pledge, and the repetition of that pledge at consecration meetings. These various items were dealt with by the speaker at some length, who thought that, whilst Unitarians could not adopt the Christian Endeavour Society just as it stands, yet some such organisation would be useful in the churches of our denomination. Mr. Tavener preached in the morning, and in the evening took for his subject "Religion at the Royal Academy, 1900."

MARRIAGES.

Hopps—Fielding—On the 4th August, at the Free Christian Church, Croydon, Bernard, youngest son of the Rev. J. Page Hopps, to Ethel, daughter of Mrs. Fielding, Hursley, Anerley, and the late Robert Henry Fielding, Esq.

White—Young—On the 11th August, at Hamilton-road Domestic Mission, by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, Adam Bowman, eldest son of W. J. White, to Lillian, eldest daughter of W. F. Young, both of Liverpool.

DEATHS.

Hyde—On the 10th August, at Cromwell House, Heaton Chapel, Ann Bancroft, the wife of Walter Hyde. Buried at the Stockport Cemetery, Aug. 14th. Friends will kindly accept this intimation.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection
Offices: 62, Strand, London.

In the matter of Vivisection the late Mr. John Ruskin was (like the late Dr. Martineau) on the side of the defenceless and oppressed. He resigned his Professorship at Oxford when Vivisection was introduced into the University course, and both before and after he exerted his vast influence always on the same side. "These scientific pursuits," he said, "are now defiantly, insultingly separated from the science of religion: they are all carried on in defiance of what has hitherto been held to be compassion and pity, and of the great link which binds together the whole Creation, from its Maker to the lowest creature."

The above Society confidently appeals for aid from all true lovers of justice and mercy.

AT last we have news of the successful relief on Aug. 14 of the besieged Legations in Peking, but not before seventy of the defenders had fallen, and many more had been wounded. The feeling of the whole country at this deliverance from a terrible anxiety cannot better be expressed than in the words of the Queen's message to the officers commanding the Royal Marine Guard at Peking :—

I thank God that you and those under your command are rescued from your perilous situation. With my people I have waited with the deepest anxiety for the good news of your safety, and a happy termination to your heroic and prolonged defence. I grieve for the losses and sufferings experienced by the besieged.

V. R. I.

THE International Congress on the History of Religions, to be held in connection with the Exhibition at Paris, September 3–9, promises to be of great interest. Le Progrès Religieux of Geneva reports on August 18 that not less than 250 members have joined, and that number will no doubt be considerably increased before the meeting of the Congress. Among the papers announced are the following :—Professor Tiele, on the history of the study with which the Congress is concerned; De Gubernatis, on the character and progress of the History of Religions; Dean Sabatier, a sketch of the progress of Biblical criticism during the second half of the nineteenth century; Count Goblet d'Alviella, on the study of Religious Symbolism; Professor Senart, on the History of Buddhism; Professor Goldziher, on the Influence of Mazdeism on Islam; Mr. Alfred Nutt, on the place of Folklore in the History of Religions. The names of those wishing to join the Congress should be sent to Professor Jean Réville, 4, Villa de la Réunion, Paris-Auteuil.

THE Manchester Guardian has announced that, at the request of the Bishop and by permission of the Dean, a short course of divinity lectures will be given in October in the Derby Chapel of Manchester Cathedral by Dr. Sanday. The subject of the lectures will be "The Beginnings of Christian Thought outside the New Testament." These lectures will be open to clergy, Nonconformist ministers, and students of all theological colleges in the three dioceses of Chester, Manchester, and Liverpool on presentation of tickets at the cathedral. Tickets may be obtained from the Archdeacons and Rural Deans of the diocese of Manchester, or from Canon Arthur Gore, Bowdon; Archdeacon Madden, Liverpool; the Rev. J. M. Elvy, the Cathedral, Manchester; and the Rev. Dr. Mackennal, Bowdon. Each minister is this year allowed the privilege of purchasing a second ticket, with the object of introducing a friend to the lectures. Professor Sanday will be the preacher in Manchester Cathedral on Sunday evening, Sept. 30.

IT was in the Jubilee year, 1887, that Mr. G. F. Watts wrote to the Times, suggesting as a fitting commemoration of the fiftieth year of the Queen's reign the erection of a national monument, which should record the deeds of heroism of humble people in every-day life; for, he said, "The material prosperity of a nation is not an abiding possession: the deeds of its people are." As a modest beginning towards such commemoration, Mr. Watts has himself built a memorial cloister in the old churchyard of St. Botolph's, Aldersgate, which is now laid out as a public garden, under the shadow of the General Post Office. The "memorial cloister" is built with perfect simplicity, and is, in fact, a covered shelter, with seats running along its whole length, and looking out upon the garden, and it is in the divisions of the wall at the back that space is provided for 144 memorial tablets, such as the four which have already been erected. In the oak beam running along the open front of the shelter, under the roof, the words are carved, "In Commemoration of Heroic Self-Sacrifice." The tablets are of some kind of glazed ware, with simple decoration, and bear the following inscriptions :—

THOMAS GRIFFIN, Fitters' Labourer, April 12, 1899, in a boiler explosion at a Battersea sugar refinery, was fatally scalded in returning to search for his mate.

WALTER PEART, Driver, and HARRY BEAN, Fireman, of the Windsor express, in July 18, 1899, whilst being scalded and burnt, sacrificed their lives in saving the train.

MARY ROGERS, Stewardess of the Stella, March 30, 1899, self-sacrificed by giving up her life-belt, and voluntarily going down in the sinking ship.

GEORGE STEPHEN FUNNELL, Police Constable, Dec. 22, 1899, in a fire at the "Elephant and Castle," Wick-road, Hackney Wick, after rescuing two lives, went back into the flames, saving a barmaid, at the risk of his own life.

The Vicar of St. Botolph, writing in the Guardian of the recent opening of the Aldersgate Garden and Memorial Cloister, referring to the simplicity of the latter, said: "It is meant to be so, because it commemorates simple lives and deeds of bravery quite simply done at the call of duty. It was felt that nothing could be better than that men and lads, engaged in the work of the City, should have kept before their eyes the memory and example of those heroes of the factory and the workshop, of the mean street and the poor home, who learnt and still teach the great lesson of self-sacrifice." It is hoped that the example thus set will be followed in other great towns throughout the country.

THE Athenæum of last week, in a review of recent New Testament Literature, deals with the two volumes of the "International Handbooks of the New Testament" which have already appeared, that on the Synoptic Gospels by President Cary, of the Meadville Theological School, and that on the Pauline Epistles by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The reviewer's opinion of this work is, "that the enlightened layman who wishes to read the New Testament with reverence and understanding may find what he wants in it." "Professor Cone," it is added, "the general editor, is the author of excellent books, written from an advanced point of view, on the Gospels and the early development of Christian thought. Dr. Drummond needs no introduction in this country." Of the volume on the Gospels it is said :—

While Dr. Cary occupies an extremely modern point of view, he is not at all speculative in his treatment, and in many instances he might have gone a little further than he does in seeking the historical basis of a narrative. The differences of the accounts are skilfully set forth, and the introduction presents as full a view of the synoptic problem as could be expected in a work of such compass.

And again, of Dr. Drummond's volume :—

Principal Drummond deals in the second volume with seven Pauline Epistles, all accepted by him as genuine. The writers in this publication draw from the same fountains of learning as those in the "Expositor's Greek Testament," and we see in both cases the effects of the recent reaction in questions of the authorship and date. The introductions in this volume are singularly fair and able, and scholars may do well to consult them, as they contain statements of views based on adequate inquiry. The commentary is short, chiefly by the omission of less important topics, and the way is made quite plain for the reader.

The Rev. Stanley M. Hunter, minister of the Unitarian Church, St. John, New Brunswick, who last year paid a visit to his relatives in this country, after ten years of service in America, has come over for a further visit this summer. Mr. Hunter, on his return from the recent Boston anniversary meetings, preached a sermon on "Advance of Liberal Thought," which has been published by the St. John Branch of the Women's Alliance. Having spoken of Unitarianism as the highest expression of freedom in religion, Mr. Hunter said :—

Let the good work go on. I repeat, the world is coming our way. The world has put its hand to the plough (whether consciously or unconsciously), and it cannot turn back. The liberal army is a small one. But it stands on the ramparts of truth. "Her bulwarks cannot be shaken." Let no man think he can desert this "great cause, God's new Messiah," for some personal prejudice or ignoble reason, with impunity. He cannot so violate conscience without paying the penalty in a shrunken disposition and blurred vision. This great cause needs the best there is in a man. It has no use for the worst. But to every man who will give of his best, it will return a thousand-fold. The outlook for Unitarian thought was never brighter.

Thomas Faed, whose death is announced at the age of seventy-four, was an artist as popular in this country as in his native Scotland, from which his subjects were chiefly drawn, depicting the pathos of humble life. Born in 1826, the son of an engineer and millwright, he was trained in an art school at Edinburgh, where he had W. G. Orchardson for fellow-student. At the age of twenty-three he became an associate of the Royal Scottish Academy, but in 1852 settled in London, where three years later his fame was made by the exhibition of his "Mitherless Bairn." Mr. Faed was elected a Royal Academician in 1864, and retired in 1893.

Dr. Martineau's "A Study of Religion: Its Sources and Contents," which has been out of print for some time, has now been re-issued by the Oxford University Press.

SILENT WORK.

The Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, recently secretary, and now president of the American Unitarian Association, sent to the Christian Register, of July 26, the following address :—

"The new secretary has gone upon a well-deserved vacation; and the former scribe is again in his seat, returning from a three weeks' rest in a quiet place by the sea. After the hurrying events and many labours of the last two months, this change has been most salutary; and the silent days have brought their own message. Do we not too often make demand that the influences that sway us shall be noisy and demonstrative? We are all the time thinking that the kingdom really comes with observation. We are surprised to find that genuine power is not in storm or earthquake so much as in a still voice. We are slow to learn that the best influences of our lives come softly and silently as the summer life comes which is to ripen everything in the luxury of autumn. If there is anything more impressive than the rapidity with which Nature works, it is the utter silence of the transforming processes. Here are marvels done daily before our eyes, but there is neither boast of intention nor cry of triumph. Noiseless and unseen forces, uttering no warning of their purpose, go to work until new glory and beauty are spread around us. No voice, no language, but a word that runs to the end of the world. Nothing said, only something done. No articulate utterance, yet an intense energy of declaration. Silence, yet speech.

"I think voluble people have much to learn from a taciturn God. A soul is not made as a statue is, with click of hammer and chip of chisel from without. It is, I suspect, made rather by unfolding from within. Emerson said, 'God does not speak prose, but communicates with us by hints, omens, inferences, and resemblances in objects lying all around us.' It is good for us sometimes to listen for these silent voices. Language, after all, is inadequate to the uses of the spirit; and it is unduly forced when we try to make it compass and describe all our thoughts and emotions. It is a good instrument of business, of instruction, and of mutual understanding; but, as Martineau said, 'When we try to raise it to its highest function, it only spoils the thing it cannot speak.' Surely, worship must sometimes seek the wilderness of the upper chamber. It requires a certain privacy of spirit. Are not our voiceless moments our most honest moments? Is not soliloquy more sincere than conversation? Has not each one of us something in himself which refuses to be phrased?

"It may well be, then, that a genuine and personal confession of faith will prove a better means of strengthening another's hope than argument. So often we ministers seek to impart religion by expounding, by intentional address, by purposed onset. Is not a better way that of self-revelation? Speech is no burden-bearer. I think Job's friends were wise men, after all; though the popular phrase derides them as but poor comforters. Did they not give us a real insight into the way of consolation when they went and sat in silence with their heart-broken friend? They just recognised his sorrow, and so helped him to bear it better than by texts. Sometimes the voiceless language of considerate act, of tone and bearing, of uncatalogued sympathies, makes the most potent speech. There are times when, though men speak with the tongues of angels, it is but as sounding brass or tinkling cymbal. Blessed is he who knows how and when to refrain, as well as how and when to speak.

"Do we not often make religion didactic instead of receptive? Do we not make it a desire to influence rather than a desire to be influenced? We so often think of faith as something to be won, when really it is something to be quietly accepted. We apply to religion the principles of our money-getting and our competitive success; but, really, the process should be just reversed. In the hurry of the street, the way of contention and assault is the natural way. But religion is a silent energy; and, if a soul is full of tumult, faith and hope cannot find entrance. It is the calm lake that mirrors the stars. The least cat's paw wrinkling the surface wipes out the reflected glories of the heavens.

"Yet we should be careful not to make the need of occasional quietude an excuse for listlessness in service or for languor of will. The silence of nature is not a passive thing. I do not urge upon any one a merely idle trust; but I think in the last weeks I have discovered another mode of energy than that of the easy flow of talk—the energy whose realm is feeling, which is a force, not a voice, which is a spirit bearing witness with our spirits—the revelation not in words, but in deeds, which Nature in these summer days declares is the revelation of an intense industry, alert, vital, ambitious. In co-operation with such silent energies, let us find inspiration and joy!"

The great secret of life and power is to make and keep one's conscious connection with the infinite source. The power of every life, the very life itself, is determined by what it relates itself to. God is immanent as well as transcendent. He is creating, working, ruling in the universe to-day, in your life and mine, just as much as He ever has been. We are too apt to regard Him after the manner of an absentee landlord, one who has set into operation the forces of this great universe and then taken Himself away. In the degree, however, that we recognise Him as immanent as well as transcendent, are we able to partake of His life and power. In the degree that we throw ourselves open to the inpouring tide of this immanent and transcendent life, do we make ourselves channels through which the Infinite Intelligence and Power can work.—*R. RITSCHLIAN THEOLOGY.—II.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM HARNACK'S "HISTORY."

"The religion of the Gospel," says Dr. Harnack (Vol. I., p. 60), "is based on this belief in Jesus Christ; that is, by looking to him, this historical person, it becomes certain to the believer that God rules heaven and earth, and that God, the Judge, is also Father and Redeemer." In his preface to the third (German) volume, the author observes that his critics charge him with not stating with sufficient clearness what "the Gospel" is by which he consistently tests the significance of the developments of dogma. In reply he gives "a brief epitome" of his view. He says:—

> The preaching of Jesus contains three great main sections. First, the message of the approaching Kingdom of God or of the future salvation; secondly, the proclamation of the actual state of things, and of thoughts such as are given in Matt. vi. 25-34, vii. 7-11, ix. 2, x. 28-33, &c.; thirdly, the new righteousness (the new law). The middle section, connected with Matt. xi. 25-30, and therefore also combined with the primitive Christian testimony regarding Jesus as Lord and Saviour, I hold from strictly historical and objective grounds to be the true main section, the Gospel in the Gospel, and to it I subordinate the other portions.

He admits that Christ himself expressed this "Gospel" under the cover of Eschatology; but that does not shake him from his allegiance to this heart of the whole matter, which, be it observed, is found by no means in John—a work in which he finds "an abundance of allusions to the historical Jesus, and at the same time the most sovereign treatment of history," and "a bright cloud of the supra-historical"—but in Matthew. It will be interesting to the reader to look up the references; he will see how much that is valid for all to whom the New Testament is a significant literature is linked to that claim of unique and—as has been said—exclusive revelation which is given in the passage last referred to, a claim respecting which some explanation is urgently called for in the face of contemporary studies in religious history.

The Ritschlians, for their part, not only regard this claim without any shrinking, but, in accordance with their experiential method, they, as individual believers, have found it a true claim, and therefore they declare that "the Gospel" can only be appropriated and adhered to in connection with "a believing surrender to the person of Jesus Christ." Yet in the moment of making this declaration most definitely Dr. Harnack, typical here of the whole school, is careful lest anyone should either take on himself to lay down terms as to the character of this "surrender," or as to the nature of that "person" to whom it is made. "Every dogmatic formula is suspicious, because it is fitted to wound the spirit of religion; it should not at least be put before the living experience in order to evoke it; for such a procedure is really the admission of the half-belief which thinks it necessary that the impression made by the person must be supplemented. The essence of the matter is a personal life which awakens life around it as one torch kindles another." (I., p. 71.)

There have existed "two great types of thought," says Dr. Harnack, and the question involved in them has been "whether virtue or grace, morality or religion, the original and inalienable constitution of man, or the power of Jesus Christ, was supreme" (V., p. 169). Nothing can be said that will more vividly exhibit the Ritschlian absolutism. "Virtue," "morality," "the original constitution of man," find their antitheses in "grace," "religion," and "the power of Jesus Christ." Probably the author had some particular exponent of rationalist philosophy in mind when he penned the sentence quoted, and his parallelisms may have led him beyond his intention into so complete an identification of "religion" with the working of "the power of Jesus Christ." But the tone is quite characteristic.

Now, in Harnack's view, "dogmatic Christianity is intellectual Christianity" (I. p. 16), and while he admits the function of intellect in supplying philosophical elements to exist side by side with the historical, he consistently deplores the triumph of "intellectualism" which "in a Christianity represented by the clergy" succeeded to the first attempts at Christian philosophy among the Apologists. He says (III., p. 229):—

> What we here chiefly understand by "intellectualism" is the placing of the scientific conception of the world behind the commandments of Christian morality and behind the hopes and faith of the Christian religion, and the connecting of the two things in such a way that this conception appeared as the foundation of these commandments and hopes. Thus was created the future dogmatic in the form which still prevails in the churches, and which presupposes the Platonic and Stoic conception of the world long ago overthrown by science. The attempt made at the beginning of the Reformation to free the Christian faith from this amalgamation remained at first without success.

Of course the Ritschlian movement is meant to prove a successful attempt and to complete the work of the Reformers.

It is the Trinitarian theology, Dr. Harnack says, which has perpetuated this Hellenic and not really Christian way of looking at things. In this theology we "meet with what the Church inherited from the downfall of the ancient world of thought, though, certainly, it presents itself in a very much abridged and stunted form."

Owing to the way in which it was employed, and owing to its being united with separate Biblical expressions which came to be taken as philosophico-theological conceptions—the τρόποι ὑπάρξεως, modes of existence, for example—it doubtless underwent the most astonishing modification. Still the doctrine of the Trinity, in the theological treatment given to it, became the vehicle by which the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy was transmitted to the Slavic and Germanic peoples. It contains a most peculiar blend of the Christian thought of the revelation of God in Jesus, and the legacy of ancient philosophy (IV., p. 129).

On the strength of such passages the orthodox opponents of Ritschlianism have naturally suspected a tendency, and more, to deny the Trinity; but that doctrine has long shown itself to be most elastic and compressible, and these qualities have not failed it in the hands of Ritschlians, who maintain their claim to orthodoxy still.

It might have been thought that, as amongst those who were foremost in creating the "dogmatic" so long prevalent in the Church no one stands higher than Athanasius, a Ritschlian historian would have had but limited sympathy with the victor at the Nicene Council. On the contrary, Dr. Harnack finds in Athanasius the deliverer of Christianity from a confusing welter of opinion. His "importance to posterity," we are told, "consisted in this, that he defined Christian faith exclusively as faith in redemption through the God-man who was identical in nature with God, and that thereby he restored to it fixed boundaries and specific contents" (III., p. 144.) But it is obviously not because of his having propounded a neat philosophical theory which, at whatever expense in the way of mutual contradictions when it came to be worked out, stood forth with a certain magnificent and captivating boldness from all others, that Athanasius receives the author's applause. It is because the assertion of the oneness of Christ "essentially" with the eternal Father-God was to him a vitalising thought, for the sake of which he could dare alike to face an opposing world in controversy and to risk all possible philosophical complications. For him it was a thought to live by rather than to expound. To anyone familiar with Ritschl's works it is easy to see how any follower of his must be attracted to such a thinker as Athanasius, notwithstanding the share he took in the establishment of the Nicene creed.

In our days the doctrine of Incarnation is beginning to be thought upon afresh under a more vivid consciousness of divine immanence. Let us hope there will never be an institution which, by exalting the new idea into "dogma," will give the world a new "intellectual" war-cry and rob mankind of a true "word of life." How the Trinitarian thought fared as time went on is thus put by Dr. Harnack:—

> For Athanasius the fundamental religious thought was the Ὁμοούσιος, and just because of this he could not treat it technically. For the Cappadocians the Ὁμοούσιος and the doctrine of the Trinity came to be the sum of theological knowledge. For the Westerns after Augustine these doctrines became a sacred legal statute, to which, above all, obedience must be rendered. This is the course of things which is constantly repeated in the history of religion. Men pass from the religious thought to the philosophical and theological doctrinal proposition, and from the doctrinal proposition which requires knowledge to the legal proposition which demands obedience, or to the sacred relic the common veneration for which constitutes a bond of union for the community, whether it be that of the nation, the state, or the Church. And thus the process of formulating comes to have an ever-increasing importance, and Confession with the mouth becomes the foundation of the Church (IV. 137).

Well, what then about the anti-Trinitarian movement which showed itself amongst those who, in the sixteenth century, made effective remonstrance against this heavy load of authoritatively imposed creedalism? As already said, Dr. Harnack recognises in this movement (of which he takes the Socinian type as presented in the Racovian Catechism, 1609, as the classical illustration) a definite "issue" of the history of dogma. Modern Catholicism offers its "issue" in what he calls the "neutralising" of dogma; it acknowledges the necessity of accepting the intention to believe all that the Church says ought to be believed, in the place of an intelligent knowledge and acceptance of the prescribed dogmas. In "Protestant" (i.e., Lutheran) developments towards the emphasis on piety springing from attachment to the person of Christ, the author sees the fruitful "issue" of this history. In Socinianism he finds only the "self-disintegration" of dogma; but that is a real "issue" also.

It is very clear that Dr. Harnack has addressed himself with his accustomed zeal and thoroughness to the study of the earlier anti-Trinitarians, and he knows also that through the efforts of Sozzini "a new Confession developed itself from Unitarianism, the Christian character of which cannot be denied, and which, after a history rich in dramatic incidents, found a place for itself in England and America, and produced excellent men." Nevertheless, it is not evident that he has made close acquaintance with these excellent men, for his delineation of the movement stops short at the seventeenth century—a matter the more surprising when we remember the recent origin of Ritschlianism itself. Within the limits accepted by the author, however, he has done good service, although his criticism of the positions set up in the Catechism seems at times to betray a somewhat less genial disposition than he has taught us to expect in him. He prefixes to his examination of the "Socinian Doctrine" (as given in the Catechism of 1609) an historical survey which is specially suggestive on the German side. Of Faustus Sozzini himself, he speaks in terms of high praise, notwithstanding the defects of his system. Servetus, too, is recognised as a "unique man," "an empirical investigator, a critical thinker, a speculative philosopher, and a Christian Reformer in the best sense of the term" (VII. 128). We need not quote further remarks of the kind. It is more important to observe that in Harnack's view the fault of Sozzini was in ignoring the "correct tendencies" (author's italics) "which led the Church to the doctrines of the Godhead of Christ, the Trinity, and Satisfaction." A very characteristic attitude is represented here. And a remark, the parallel to which we seem to have heard nearer home, is found in the next sentence—"One can agree almost everywhere with the formal criticism to which the Socinians subjected the orthodox doctrine, and yet hold that the representatives of the latter displayed a much surer understanding of the Gospel than their opponents" (VII. 137).

The chief points in favour of the Socinians the author finds to be (1) their courageous simplification of the import of the Christian religion; (2) their system sought to substitute "ethics" for the "metaphysics" which had so long dominated the doctrine of the Church; (3) it made for definiteness and clearness in religious expression and exposed the futility of "unintelligible paradoxes and contradictions;" and (4) "it delivered the study of Holy Scripture from the ban of dogma, and itself made a good beginning with a sound, historical exegesis." But having granted these merits, the author has a heavy indictment to bring against Socinianism, with the words of which we may end these quotations. He says:—

That the Christian religion is faith, that it is a relation between person and person, that it is therefore higher than all reason, that it lives not upon commands and hopes, but upon the power of God, and apprehends in Jesus Christ the Lord of Heaven and earth as Father—of all this Socinianism knows nothing.

We need only repeat the warning that this verdict must be taken as referring, not to the Unitarianism of Channing or of Martineau, but to the Racovian creed, now nearly three hundred years old. But this also is a kind of remark which seems familiar in modern application, and reminds us of that ancient tendency, from which it would appear the Ritschlians are not wholly free, to consider one's own party the only orthodox and soundly religious. Undoubtedly, there is much fervent piety in this interesting group of reformers; but amid so much confidence that they specially of all men have "the gospel" at heart, are there no dangers? Or must "Protestant" in Dr. Harnack's narrower sense reconcile itself to permanent opposition to the Catholic spirit?

JOHN BURGESS'S DIARY AND CORRESPONDENCE.—III.

It is in his letters that the religious opinions of John Burgess are most clearly set forth. The one extant volume of his Diary does not throw much light upon this point, but it shows him as a diligent student of the Scriptures and a regular attender at the conferences for moral and religious conversation held at the houses of members of the Ditchling General Baptist Society. The Diary only just takes us into the year 1790. In May of that year the Rev. Charles Lloyd was settled in charge of the Ditchling congregation. He had ministered for a short time to Oat-street congregation, Evesham, but had changed his views on the question of infant baptism. He did not remain long as minister at Ditchling, but he made a great impression. In 1793 he withdrew from the ministry. Though John Burgess emigrated to America in 1794, he writes five-and-twenty years later with respect and affection of his former pastor, Dr. Lloyd. There had been a good deal of sympathy amongst the General Baptists with the American colonists in their struggle against George III. and his singular colonial policy; moreover, they had not been untouched by that wave of feeling which culminated across the Channel in the Revolution. The political outlook in England was dark and cheerless during the closing years of the century; there seemed no hope of reform. We need not wonder, then, that there was a continual stream of emigrants to the New World from the ranks of the General Baptists at this period. A letter from John Burgess, dated Oct. 29, 1794, discloses a little of the current feeling; it is dated from Westchester County, in the State of New York, and begins simply:—

"Thos. Hallet I recollect that you was one of our Ditchling Frends, a frend to Liberty and Truth; Justice and the rights of Man. I am in a World were I have little oppertunity to hear how publick matters are going on . . . but what little I have heard of the War is that justice and truth seem to prevail over Tyranny and Oppression, which gives me pleasure at the Idea, for there is nothing so hateful in my sight [as] to see one Man try to oppress another, for what are we, we are all alike all Mortal Creature[s] all dependant upon the Great Father of the Universe and indeed dependant one upon another." . . . He urges his friends to come over and join him, "what an additional pleasure" he says "would it be to me to see these my old frends come and smoke a pipe with me in this New and happy world . . . we could converse upon what subject we pleas'd political Morral or Religious without any person to suspect us or having any power or right to controul us, oh I would not Exchange this Natural Right the great source of human Happiness no not for all the riches in Ditchling. . . . No man is Deny'd to carry his Gun rich or poor all alike, no bounds set to our Manners they run as far as we like to hunt, all belongs to him that kills it, so [long as] we don't Meddle with Man's private property such what the farmer brings up tame . . . the farmers have been used to make many shifts tan their own Leather and make it up when they have done in a manner, save all their wool, make all their cloaths both for Men Women and Children the same as they did in England in my grandmother's days. . . . I shall look for many [of] you early in the Spring, but don't let me perswade you, judge for yourselves, if you prefer Slavery to Liberty Stop were you can have it by wholesale. . . . Don't forget to remember me to Mr. Davies and Mrs. Drawbridge—to my Son &c, and all my relations tell them I don't repent I came away, have more reason to repent that I stayed so long spending my strength for Naught and in Vain."

Several letters are addressed to his son John, who remained in England apprenticed to Mr. Brigden, harness-maker of Cuckfield; one, dated 1795, opens thus: "John as a small token of my affection for you I have sent you as a present from this new World this happy republick a seal with the impreshon of General Washenton president of the United States of America. I am informed that it is an exact Likeness of this great and good man, how the affairs of the Nation go on in England I have but little knowledge of at present but sopose they are worse and worse, if you can come to me with mr Drawbridge I shall be very happy to see you and make no doubt it would be to your advantage but I am informed there is more danger in coming then when I came, that is, some danger of been taken by the french." In an article in The Inquirer for Jan. 2, 1892, by Miss Kensett, of Horsham, some extracts are given from letters in the possession of her family, received from John Burgess. In one, dated June 10, 1807, he tells us the preaching in America was too orthodox for his taste. "In England I had much pleasure in hearing such men as Mr. Evershed, Mr. Rowland, Mr. Dendy, Mr. Edwards my father-in-law, but more particularly Mr. Lloyd a man of the very first rate abilities had in my opinion the most Rational and most consistent scheem of any man I ever heard as well as practical." He goes on to tell how he always went, when in New York, to hear "a Mr. Michel an Irish gentleman very good preacher and a Mr. Palmer of the same church an English gentleman." They were Universalists, but he says "not the wors for that in my opinion, they are men of the strictest Moral Chariter the only two Gentlemen that I know of that refuses to take any pay for preaching most others have large sallarys. I am very well aquainted with Mr. Palmer he is a very benevolent good disposition'd man pleasing in conversation. Since I came to Sparta we had an Englishman that came from Hull in Yorksheer that would sometimes preach to us at Sparta but he declined on account of bodily infirmity and is since dead. I think he was the nearest in my estimation to Mr. Lloyd of any man I ever heard for Matter, was a very poor Speaker, he spoke short sentences very correct and a most admirable chain of reasoning free from orthodoxy. We have a meeting for the most part about onc in two weeks at Sparta Soplied by Itinerant preachers called Methodists the followers of Mr. Westly there are a great many of them in this country have a few good preachers but in general have no other qualification to make a long face and a great Noise."

After an interval of some years in which the correspondence was interrupted, John Burgess looks wistfully to the old country, and writes to his son on May 14, 1815, with a great heart hunger for news of his relations and friends and the old places he knew so well. "My Son John Burgess. Some time past I dispared of ever hearing from you or your mother again but as a change has taken place in the political world I hope to hear from you that you and your family as well as my wife your mother are all well as I am through the mercy and goodness of God which calls upon me dayly to be thankfull. I am now in the 64th year of my age. I am yet able to labour to my own Soport as I hope I allway shall, without been dependant upon any for my dayly Bread. . . . I have no recolaction when I heard from you last but it being so long since that I long much to hear from you and your mother and all my frend and aquaintance mr. Drawbridge family in perticuler fear he is not yet living as he has not whrote to me so long time. . . . I fear I shall never see any of you again in this World, but we [have] a good ground to hope we shall meet again in the Life to Come, it is impossible for me to say what will take place in this our life time for dayly Experience teaches us that there are many strange and unexpected events take place in the natural, morral, and political world the Late war with England I considered as a greevious Calamity but when the tidings of peace was made Known it was to me tidings of great Joy, for war I think is one of the greates[t] evils that befalls us, would to God that a general peace had continued throughout the world, but I much fear that the powers of Urope will not be Content to let the French nation Chuse their own master and whoever they as a nation shall think proper to have for their master I hope he will never draw the Surd but in defence of the rights of the people who may Chuse to place him at the head of the nation. I am nearly of the same opinion respecting politicle matters as I was when in England but in respect to my Religious opinions I have seen much reason to alter my mind. I am of the same opinion respecting the unity of God as I ever was for I think the Doctrin of the trinity one of the greatest corruptions in the Christian Church, the doctrin of the pre-existance of Jesus Christ I have intirely given up for I think he, Jesus of nazareth was the son of Joseph and mary a man in every respect like other men but Chosen of God as his Messenger to declare to men the Will of God, he was so highly favour'd of God that God gave unto him the spirit without measure and Jesus Christ was allways obedient to the will of his heavenly father and that for his great merit and morral worth God was pleased to Crown him with Glory and honnor and give him a name above every name &c. &c. &c. I formerly beleft in the doctrin of Endless misery but I find that has no foundation in Scripture nor reason or Justice so I have given that up, the doctrins of original sin, of atonement, of personal election and reprobation are to me doctrins absurd in the extreem. I am very glad to hear that the Doctrin of the unity of God prevails so much I wish it could be planted hear for we hear nothing but rank Calvanism except the methodist. I very sildom go to meeting now I am so deaf and when I could hear I did not believe one half what I heard so that I enjoy myself much better in reading and I have the use of a very large Library belonging to a gentleman who came from London long since I came he has got the greatest part of Docr priestley's work. Docr Linsy, Docr Diney and Dor Hartley and many more of the same eminent Chariters I have been constantly reading them for 2 or 3 years past and have more pleasure in so doing than I should if I could hear all the preaching in America.—when you wright please to fill your paper full as I am apt to do about men and things wheather you ever hear from Waldron and Heathfield meeting, wheather James Sanders preaches there as yet, I never could get a leter from him such good frends as we was How happy should I be to receive one more letter from mr Drawbridge if he is yet alive. I want to hear from mr Loyd were he Liveth and wheather he preaches as yet for he was one of the best preachers I ever heard in all my life time, I often think of my Cosin Beal and about Barkham meeting wonder in my mind wheather it be continued, who preacheth at Lewes, as to Ditchling I sopose is soplyed by one mr Bennet a very active man in promoting the Doctrin of the unity of God. . . . I have a great share of aflictions both of body and mind but don't think it right to complain for I have no doubt but all evil both natural and morral is desinid to bring out some great good in the end, I Bless God for my existence being fully perswaded that an infinitely wise, Just and good God would never have called me into Existence and render that state of Existance worse than a state of non-existance it is evident to me that God desined that we should be gainers by our State of Existance and all the evils we suffer are nothing but means to bring about the end. I do not know that you can read this hetrogenious Epistle for my pen is got very bad and I have lost my Knife so cannot mend it." This letter is signed "From your afactionate Father John Burgess." There is one later letter of his extant, sent to Mrs. Kensett, of Slaugham, in 1819, in which he says: "I thankfully acknowledge that I am under the same kind providence and injoy for the most part a good state of helth and bodily Strenth at the age of 68 and have only to wish I was more deserving those and all the blessings I injoy in this Life of trial [and] disciplen." How much longer he lived I know not. Here we must leave him. His letters and his diary enable us to realise very vividly the life and times in which he lived. They also serve to remind us that in some points we have made an advance upon the customs and habits of past generations. For example, in the case of recreation, John Burgess records attending a Bull Bait at "Fryers Oake," in March, 1788, and he even supplied a dog on that occasion for the inhuman sport; but this practice was already on the wane, and there are references to other sports that were soon to supplant bull-baiting in popular favour. He frequently mentions the Races at Lewes and Brighton, which had been instituted not long before, and he speaks of cricket as coming into favour; thus, Aug. 1, 1785: "There was a cricket match at Lingfield common between Lingfield in Surry and the County of Sussex. Soposed to be upward of 2000 people."

It is through the kindness of Mrs. Frank W. Burgess and Miss Kensett that I have been enabled to give these extracts from the diary and correspondence of that sturdy, self-reliant rationalist of the eighteenth century. To men of his stamp we owe, perhaps, more than we are aware.

THE BICYCLE.

SIR,—Your suggestion that we should present our ministers and their wives with bicycles struck me as a dreadful come-down, after reading Mr. Brooke's address inculcating the study of the beautiful as an escape from the monotony of life, and as an incentive to originality. The tendency of the age seems to be for everybody to act and think alike. We all read exactly the same news every morning, supplied to the world by the Central News Agency—that alone creates a fearful monotony of thought. Then as the evening comes round after the day's work, everybody who possibly can must rush about the dusty roads on a bicycle.

As a convenient means of locomotion for the telegraph boy, or a tradesman going his rounds for orders, or as an occasional diversion like a game of cricket or football, I have no objection to find with the cycle—no, not even for minister or clergyman going his round of visiting (provided coat tails and silk hat are avoided). What I do object to, is the sheep-like way in which mankind follow the lead set them by inventors and manufacturers; individual originality and freshness is being stamped out. We can commune with God in Nature without paying ten guineas for a machine to help us. Our lanes, field-paths, woods and breezy commons are deserted. The art of walking is dying out; yet there is no more health-giving exercise in the world—health for body and mind. 'Tis seldom ordered by a doctor, for he does not know what it is, from one week's end to another he scarcely walks a mile himself. Even in the towns a twopenny fare on tram or train brings the fields and lanes within every one's reach. I should expect more freshness and originality in my minister's sermons if he devoted some hours a week to such simple healthful communion with Nature than if he spent as many hours rushing along the highways with the motley crowd.

But if we can save the minister, I am afraid it is an undeniable fact that the inventor and manufacturer have ensnared most of the congregation; and fairly enough, inasmuch as it entails no Sunday work on "man-servant, maid-servant, or cattle," the use of the cycle on Sunday is gradually becoming universal. Bicycling, lawn-tennis, cricket, and Sunday bands have made the Puritan Sabbath a thing of the past; and we have, at least, a semi-Continental Sunday. Let us be business-like and accept the fact. Is a theatre kept open when the actors begin to play to empty seats? As soon as the numbers fall below a score in the summer months, why cannot we discontinue our evening services, and if desired for the convenience of some members who cannot attend at eleven o'clock, a short service without sermon be held at 8 A.M. In all probability this latter would be unnecessary, as the few evening faithful ones for the most part would make arrangements for attending at eleven, thus cheering the minister by the larger attendance, and sparing him the depression and pumping-dry exertion of writing one of his weekly sermons for empty pews.

Where an evening service was discontinued from June 1 to Sept. 30, the recommencing in October would come with fresh zest to minister and to congregation—a help to originality and an enemy to grooves.

FREE SPEECH IN THE PULPIT.

Sir,—The main contentions in Mr. Gow's sermon are admirable, and you did well to publish along with it Miss Florence Hill's story of the brave Congregationalist pastor, whose boldness of speech was rewarded by loss of a pulpit held for twenty-five years. Every self-respecting minister will speak out the whole word of the Lord which he feels committed to him, whether the people will hear or whether they will forbear. Every congregation of free worshippers, on the other hand, has at any time the right to say to its minister, "Your message is no word of the Lord to us, and therefore we had better part." And in these circumstances there should be no sense of grievance on the part of a minister who, having taken upon himself the prophet's rôle, is called upon also to bear the prophet's burden. Let him go forth alone, not knowing whither he goeth, but strong in faith in a guiding God. Unto this hour was he called. He has not failed in his high trust: he has delivered his soul in freedom, and kept his honour clean before the Lord. The congregation has also maintained the clear right of its members to be protected from what they deem to be an unwholesome gospel.

The theory of our free pulpit is that the minister is urged to speak his whole soul, and avoid the dissimulation involved in mental reservations and unworthy suppression of honest conviction. It is a high charge, and carries with it heavy risks, from which, however, no brave truth-seeker will flinch. It is inevitable that now and then such a man must offend the susceptibilities of some of his people. But they are false to their trust when they try to close his mouth on these subjects upon which they differ, while they encourage him to speak out on everything else upon which they are agreed. And they abuse their powers when, because of such occasional jarring, they seek to procure the dismissal of an honest man. Only when there is utter alienation of sympathies on vital points is a congregation justified in taking so invidious a step as to rid itself of a minister who, from a conscientious spirit has felt obliged to speak unwelcome words.

No complaint is made against the penalty which free speech may fairly bring upon the speaker; but no words can be too strong to condemn the onesidedness and intolerance which would charge the minister with exceeding his office and abusing his trust when he speaks as necessity is laid upon him to do. The attempt to stop free speech in a free pulpit—to prevent a man, deeply in earnest, from delivering his message—this is what is meant by "muzzling" the preacher. It is not a pretty word, but the idea is uglier than the word. That the dread of interference with our proud freedom is no bugbear many of our ministers in these latter days can sadly testify. But the brave man will go on as he has begun, leaving the consequences in the hands of Him who gave the command to speak; and when members of his congregation remonstrate with him and tell him he has no right to wound their susceptibilities in this way, he will remind the grumblers that he was called to a free ministry, and that if this ministry is unacceptable the free members have their remedy. In the long run it is not the fearless man who suffers most. C. J. Street.

FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

Sir,—I have in my possession a copy of the Form of Prayer used at the Religious Service of the Free Christian Union, on the occasion when sermons were preached by Athanase Coquerel and C. Kegan Paul, and the date is given as Tuesday evening, June 1, 1869. See also footnote on p. 327 of "Letters of John James Tayler," who died May 28, a few days before the service was held.

A WEDDING HYMN.

THE GLADNESS OF OUR DAY.

(Tune:—No. 746 in Bristol Tune Book.)

Our Father from above
Sends us, to cheer the way,
The light of Holy Love,
The gladness of our day,
To keep our hearts at one with His Calm in the trust of heavenly peace.

The greatest gift we need,
Dearer than Hope and Faith,
To inspire the noble deed,
To conquer fear and death,
To enrich us as the years roll by,
Is Love, God's treasure from on high.

United heart and hand,
And sanctified by prayer,
The bride and bridegroom stand
Within the Father's care:
O may they bless Him all their days
With songs of gratitude and praise.

May every Christian home
The peace of God possess;
O may His kingdom come
In truth and righteousness:
And chiefly may we live and move
Encircled by His Holy Love.

OBITUARY.

MRS. BIRKS, DERBY.

The congregation of the Friargate Chapel, Derby, have suffered a grievous loss in the death, after a long and painful illness, of Mrs. Birks, wife of their minister, the Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., who passed away on Thursday, Aug. 16, in her sixty-first year. Not only at Derby, but at Idle, Kingswood, and Taunton, the scenes of her husband's ministry in former years, Mrs. Birks is remembered with respect and affection. She took a deep personal interest in congregational work, and at Derby was the superintendent of the Girls' Sunday-school. The welfare of the young people connected with school and congregation she had specially at heart. Mrs. Birks was also a member of the Ladies' Visiting Committee of the Derby Union Workhouse, and in other ways showed a helpful interest in the aged, the sick, and the poor. Her husband's political, charitable, and philanthropic labours were sustained by her constant sympathy.

The funeral was on Monday, the first part of the service being held in Friargate Chapel. Both there and at the cemetery the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper, officiated, who, in speaking of Mrs. Birks, referred to her unselfish life, her unostentatious piety and the sincerity of her interest in all that pertained to the cause of true religion. Her example he solemnly commended to the attention of the young, as showing them the way by which they could best show their respect for her memory. The service, both in the chapel and at the cemetery, was largely attended by members of the congregation and their friends and relatives.

A memorial service is to be held on Sunday, conducted by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., of Chesterfield.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From William Smith's "Thorndale."

I never could look upon the stars and not feel that I claimed some kindred with the infinite and the eternal. Why am I vexed incessantly with this question, "Mortal or immortal," if nothing is to come of it? Or who can think upon that other and greater problem—the nature of Him who perchance sits central amidst the stars—and not feel that a creature who can—who must—state such problems to himself is surely destined, one day, somewhere, to have them solved for him?

Oh, yes! believe it!—believe it!—there is an eternal life within us. It will burn on!—it is akin to those stars.

This beautiful external nature, these still waters, these majestic hills, I have not been worthy of them. Where was the peace of mind, where the greatness and tranquility, where the noble, free, useful activity which all nature symbolises? Not in me! not in me! or only for an instant. On my best hours such little thoughts, such little cares intruded. I have flowed weak as water. Any straw could turn me, A jest, a look, a laugh has thrown trouble into my soul; a pain, a lassitude, a sick and morbid feeling has changed the current of a whole philosophy. We would be gazing upward and around at some divine spectacle—gazing with calm and dilated souls—and lo! there is ever some thorn in the sandal we must first stoop to extract.

. . . . .

Stand aside from the crowd, and look on—have no other business than to look on—how mad and preposterous, how purposeless and inexplicable, will the whole scene of human life appear!

"How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
All the uses of this world!"

Step down into the crowd, choose a path, or let accident choose for you; be one of the jostling multitude; have wishes and a pursuit; and how full of meaning and purpose has it all become! This labyrinth of life is ever a straight path to him who keeps walking.

. . . . .

Who that has cultivated a high and reflective piety has not recognised that religion does not first of all consist in hope of a future life, but consists first of all in living well here—in a certain felt relationship with God—in that happy, grateful, devoted relationship which springs from knowledge of God's world and of our own humanity?

I boldly claim for the future generations of mankind that religion which our best and purest have claimed for themselves, when they shall be saints in heaven. In that state they confess that goodness and piety are their own ends—not preparation for any other state of existence. They will become so here. This life will cease to be regarded as chiefly as a preparation for another, because it will have become identified with that other. If we are immortal souls, we are immortal here; death is but our great progression; let us begin to live as the immortals should.

"Fear first," said the Cistercian, "then hope, is the impulse of a Christian life. Last of all, the Christian life itself is its own motive. There comes a time when neither fear nor hope is necessary to the pious man; but he loves righteousness for righteousness' sake, and love is all in all. It is not joy at escape from future perdition that he now feels; nor is it hope for some untold happiness in the future; it is a present rapture of piety, and resignation, and love; a present that fills eternity. It asks nothing, it fears nothing; it loves, and it has no petition to make. God takes back His little child unto Himself—a little child that has no fear, and is all trust."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I suppose most of you will be either in the country or somewhere by the seaside just now; having a good time, I hope, getting in a store of fresh air into your lungs, and fresh thoughts into your minds from the new sights that surround you; having a time of recreation, as we call it—or re-creation—so that you may come back to your work with fresh strength and renewed vigour.

I wonder how many of you have taken boats with you to sail on the water. Have you ever thought what a strange thing it is to be able to make a boat that will stay on the top of the water and not tumble in? It is not easy to make a little wooden boat that will just sail as you want it; but when we think of the great big ships, with lots and lots of people able to get into them, and yet not sink to the bottom, how wonderful it is! how is it all possible?

Now, I could not help thinking about this a few months ago, for I was on one of our biggest ships for ten days, going across the great Atlantic ocean to America. It was a beautiful new steamer, and her first trip; and as I was lying down in my little berth, or bed, I often said to myself, "It is wonderful—wonderful." There we were, numbering more than 2,000 people, all in this ship together; and yet we did not fall to the bottom, and we were always going along steadily and true to our right course; though, look as earnestly as we could, there was no land to be seen for days. How could the captain tell whether he was going right? Well, we knew that he had studied a great deal, and that he had been in other ships and had guided them aright, and we knew that he had been chosen to be captain by people who had tested and tried him; and so, though we could not have guided ourselves, we felt quite safe in his hands. And we were right to trust him, for he knew just what to do and how to do it; and in due time we reached New York safe and sound.

Yes; the captain did a great deal, but he could not have carried us across the ocean alone. First of all, steam was wanted. Have you ever thought what a work it must be to get enough steam to move a big ship all through even one night and one day? Perhaps you have watched the coalmen when they have brought coals to your home and have counted the sacks—ten to a ton. Well, how many have you counted at one time? Thirty or forty—perhaps, three or four tons; and these will last you at home for as many months, it may be. Think of this quantity, and then imagine for yourselves what it would be to have 140 tons instead of the three or four. Well, that is the quantity that was burnt every twenty-four hours in our ship, and that was considered very little; some of the quicker steamers burn four times as much. Now try to realise how many men must be employed just to fetch the coal from the big coal-hole and put it on. But then, having succeeded in making the fire, and boiling the water, and getting the steam, it would do no good unless it was guided just in the right way; and so these engineers, who often look so hot and grimy, have the ship partly in their keeping. They must work, and they must work together, obeying the captain's orders.

Then there is the work of the sailors; they seem to have something to do everywhere; there are always two who are up aloft, in a little sort of box among the rigging; not a pleasant time when it is windy or cold. But the look-out must be kept; the safety of the ship is also in the keeping of those good sailors in the watch-box. They, too, must work together with those that are down below; it will be useless for them to look out unless they pass on the knowledge of what they see to the officers.

And the officers, how much is in their hands! They have each their own special duties, but if they do not work together the ship will suffer. Then we must not forget the cook and his helpers; two thousand people to be fed is no easy task. The getting in of the food is in the hands of one of the officers, but then the cook has to make it ready for table, and there is no shop round the corner where one can run and buy anything that may have been forgotten. Ah! the more we think, the more marvellous it is to realise how many heads and hands are needed to work together if a ship is to make its way successfully from port to port. And, indeed, if we speak of all who are connected with the vessel we must think of the builders of the ship itself, of those who planned it, and of the innumerable heads and hands whose work was needed to invent, to make calculations, to carry out the instructions of their leaders—and all, from the least to the greatest, needing to work together, with common aims for the welfare of the ship. I think we may well understand that when this wonderful structure is completed people agree not to call the goodly vessel "it," but consider her worthy to be spoken of as a human being:

There she stands,
With her foot upon the sands,
Decked with flags and streamers gay,
In honour of her marriage day,
Her snow white signals fluttering, bending,
Round her like a veil descending,
Ready to be
The bride of the gray old sea.

So sings Longfellow in his beautiful poem of the Building of the Ship, which, I think, you would enjoy reading, or, better still, having it read to you by someone who knows and loves the beautiful lines.

There are two thoughts that always come to me when I think of these mighty ships that we see from the shore, and in which sometimes we even have the privilege to travel. The first is wonder and awe at the thought of the Mind of man; how by his power of getting a little knowledge here and a little knowledge there into the laws which govern the world, he is able to unravel the mysteries of Nature and, by using God's methods, is able to produce these wondrous results, and so prove himself, in a special sense, to be indeed a "child of God."

And the other thought is that of the beauty of working together. We find people are now able and willing to work together for business purposes; may we not look forward hopefully to the time when men shall join hands everywhere for the common good of everyone? Do not think that you, boys and girls, have nothing to do with this now; you have, indeed you have. The world will be all the better or all the worse according as you are trying now to get noble thoughts and right ideas about things to-day, and some you can even put in practice at the present time. For instance, in your school life you have the temptation of joining with just one or two congenial friends, and shutting out some others who are really needing a word of cheer from you.

Together; yes, all together, as much as in you lies, even to-day in your home-life, in your school-life; and then, as you grow in years, you will have large opportunities of developing what has already come to be a habit of mind with you—namely, the habit of "looking to the things of another," because you know that the world can only move smoothly when all try to think and act in harmony together with one another, and together with God Himself.

Good may ever conquer ill,
Health walk where pain hath trod;
As a man thinketh so is he;
Rise, then, and walk with God.

BEYOND OUR KEN.

WE are often told as Unitarians that our conception of GOD is poor and ineffective, and fails to reach the heart of the deepest religious needs. The Rev. C. E. BEEBY recently stated in these columns that "the orthodox formula of the worship of the one GOD, under the symbols of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, presents to the mind of Christendom a more complete and truer idea of the object of Christian worship than the symbol of 'Father' alone"; and last week a correspondent sent us a quotation from Professor A. S. PEAKE, in which the conception of the Godhead, as embracing Son as well as Father, is declared to be deeper and more ethical than the Unitarian :—

> For it shows that God is no abstract unity, isolated and self-centred, but a higher unity of richer and more complex life, in which there is room for the play of emotion, and in which ethical relations have their home. Thus we find in God not Fatherhood only, but Sonship; not rule and authority only, but the filial obedience which seeks always to do the Father's will.

Modern interpreters of Trinitarian doctrine are very insistent that the Unitarian conception makes of GOD an "abstract unity," and think that something is gained for spiritual religion when they have affirmed that there must be a "society" in the Godhead. To us it appears that in all such arguments they are adventuring into dangerous seas of metaphysical speculation concerning the inmost nature of the Eternal, where even the subtlest mind is out of its depth, and attempting to raise a structure of knowledge for which there is no warrant in the experience of our actual life with GOD—while they inevitably invite less subtle minds to a new form of restrained Polytheism. It is, indeed, argued that there is a "divine and revealed idea of personality," as in GOD a unity not simple and single, but "tri-personal," which is to be accepted as a higher truth concerning the being of GOD, and "of which account is given at first hand in His personal self-revelation in JESUS CHRIST"; but when we remember the teaching of JESUS himself as it is recorded for us in the Gospels, and realise something of his own religious life and the religious life to which he called his disciples, we can only marvel at the astounding assumption involved in such assertions.

One of the most powerful of the recent expounders of a Trinitarian theology is Dr. P. T. FORSYTH, of Cambridge, who holds the Evangelical position that "the cross is the one final, absolute, and comprehensive revelation of GOD," and in the death of CHRIST sees "the sacrificial heart of Deity." Dr. FORSYTH contributed to the April number of the London Quarterly Review an article on Dr. MARTINEAU, to which we made some reference at the time of its appearance. In this article, after a very warm eulogy, he proceeds to criticism of what he regards as the defects of Dr. MARTINEAU'S teaching; and urging that the true conception of GOD is "not the theistic unity of a person, but a richer unity of persons," affirms that Dr. MARTINEAU'S theism "is but his individualism writ large," and a little further on adds that "the individualism of intuition makes religion logically a theism. It sets up an antithesis too sharp between the soul and its goal. The individual is confronted with another individual, only infinite." But that last expression, surely, is a travesty of the true spiritual conception of the One Eternal.

What Dr. FORSYTH regards as the spiritual unity of GOD may be gathered from the following passage :—

> Both intuition and Theism indicate a false unity in God, and a false simplicity in our relations with Him. God's unity is not that of an individual person; the category of personality framed on the human individual is too small for Him; and the more it is pressed the more by thought it is denied. It is a spiritual unity, which is personal indeed, but also so much more, that it includes a variety of persons, like all the most living and commanding unities we know — our family, country, or kind.

Only an "incorrigible individualism," Dr. FORSYTH thinks, can see Tritheism in such teaching as this, but when one reads of a "society" in the Godhead, and of the play of emotions between the different "persons," while in one there is "rule and authority," and in another "filial obedience," it is difficult to see what other intelligible meaning can be attached to the words. We fully admit, with Dr. FORSYTH, that the spiritual unity of GOD is personal, and much more than personal in any human sense, but we cannot find the larger thought in "a variety of persons" in the Godhead, nor can we admit that in the view of a spiritual Unitarianism GOD is regarded as an "infinite individual."

Of an "abstract unity, isolated and self-centred," in our thought of GOD we know nothing. He whom we have learnt, with JESUS, to trust as our Father, whom we adore as the Source of Love and Life, in whom we reverence Eternal Righteousness, is the one ever-present Spirit, in whom we live and move and have our being. To speculate on what GOD might be apart from the abiding glories of His creation, the steadfast faithfulness of His law, the fellowship of living souls, in whom He has awakened the hunger after righteousness and the heavenly life, as He draws them into communion with Himself, seems to us idle, if not irreverent. Our concern is with the present life in the Spirit, and our trust is in the living GOD. His will and holy purpose in humanity are revealed in growing light from many sides, and most clearly in that line of religious life of which we are the children and inheritors. The prophets speak to every generation of the strength of His righteousness, the psalmists tell of His tenderness and of the beauty of holiness and joy in the glory of the LORD; in the Son of Man we have the chief revealer of the true spirit of the children of GOD, the Friend and Teacher, the Leader and Inspirer, who most surely opens to us the way of heavenly life. And in the experience of the Christian centuries, the witness of many intimate lives, very near to our own, searching the deep places of the spirit, we know the meaning of deliverance from sin, the glory of the martyr, the steadfast service of the Kingdom, the joy of brotherhood, and the union of perfect love; holy memories of many generations abide with us, and our hearts are lifted up in contemplation of the heavenly vision in an unspeakable peace, as we are united in the great fellowship of living souls in heaven and on earth. All this is ours in GOD, resting in the Eternal, surrendered to our FATHER'S will. Why should we attempt to penetrate beyond the very air we breathe, why should we desire more than is given in such a glorious call to service, and such a rest in the LORD?

We may dream of other and more glorious beings in the boundless realms of the divine creation, all still in the great household of God; but our life is with those whom we know and love, among whom is JESUS, "the great Chief of faithful souls." And this life can never be apart from GOD. Our reverence and trust and love He asks of us. We need not speak or think, foolishly, of any "abstract unity" in the Eternal, or of any tri-personality or multi-personality, of which it is impossible for us to have any real thoughts. It is Love, infinite and eternal, in which we rest, and our prayer must be that in us and ours, more and more perfectly, the Father's will may be done.

"GOD FORBID THAT I SHOULD GLORY, SAVE IN THE CROSS OF CHRIST."

(Suggested by a sermon of the Rev. L. P. Jacks.)

Not for the good and gracious things of life,
Not for the memory of duty done,
Nor for that perfect righteousness he won,
The prize that marks him victor in the strife,
For none of these he gives his God the praise,
For none of these triumphant voice will raise,
But, "God forbid that I should glory now,
Save in Christ's cross of shame which with rejoicing crowns my brow."

And we ourselves have known some human ill,
One of the crowd of common daily woes,
Locked like a fetter round the mind's repose
Or body's strength. Awhile the freeborn will
Was quelled, but in this later day we own
That our best powers have from that weakness grown;
So God forbid that we should glory now,
Save in that cross of pain which set health's crown upon our brow.

Ourselves have felt at times a heavier cross,
Which seemed too dread and burdensome a load
For us to bear along earth's weary road,
Some weight of irremediable loss,
Transformed into a vision of great light,
As life immortal breaks upon our sight.
May God forbid that we should glory now,
Save in this cross of death which sets life's crown upon our brow.

And when our souls have borne the burden sore
Of doubts that strove to crush our childhood's faith,
Oft with its lifting comes a purer breath
From heaven than any we have known before,
And sweetens all around, and brings the balm
Of strong assurance and profoundest calm.
May God forbid that we should glory now,
Save in that cross of doubt, which set faith's crown upon our brow.

Theodora Mills.

It is very seldom that you have an opportunity of saving the life of a fellow-creature; but every day you may make some little contribution to the happiness of those with whom you associate, either by a kind look or an encouraging smile. You are not often called upon to submit to a great injury; but almost every hour of every day some little forbearance is to be practised.—W. H. Furness.

MAN'S "POOR RELATIONS."

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Proverbs xii. 10.

We read here that a "righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." If we understand his beast of burden, his patient co-worker who drags or carries about his burdens for him or bears him upon his journeys, we might change the description of the man and say "a sensible man regardeth the life of his beast"; for this world is so made that, in the long run, the highest profit and the wisest kindness go together. I do not wish, however, to limit my remarks to the case of beasts of burden, but to ask your consideration of the attitude we should take with regard to all the animals which we call the "lower animals." The Bible says they are all put into the power of man, and we may with good reason speak of them as beneath humankind; for whatever their strength, or beauty, or skill, they evidently are not gifted with the moral and spiritual capacities which render man not only able to achieve things far beyond them, but to be capable of improvements entirely denied to them.

The growing sense and sensibility of mankind have brought this subject more directly to the front in our day than ever before. There was a time when, being himself nearer to a barbarous state, man chiefly looked on the lower creatures either as fit prey, or as things having no claim upon his consideration. They were, for the most part, in fact, and many still are, his enemies or rivals. Their prosperity beyond certain limits means his adversity. Formerly there was little inquiry into such matters, at any rate in these Western lands of the old world. People did pretty well what was right in their own eyes, and their uneducated instincts often led them into ways which we regard as unfeeling and cruel. Now, if we turn to our New Testament for guidance we shall, indeed, find there principles of religion which in their broad sweep must eventually include all living creatures; but there is little direct expression on the subject.

In the Old Testament we do find some clearer testimony to a feeling that, low down as the non-human inhabitants of the globe may be, they, too, have their rights. Besides this reminder in the Book of Proverbs, concerning mercifulness to the beast of burden, we find that the ancient Hebrew law bade the farmer leave his ox unmuzzled when it was set to walk round and round treading the corn out of the ripe ears of wheat. Let the poor beast share in the bounty of harvest. Again, if the Hebrew saw his brother's beast staggering under a load, or fallen on the way, he was bidden go and help to lighten the burden; and, in case of need, he must shelter the tired creature till the owner came along. Not only so; but the right of the beast to mercy could not be set aside by any unneighbourly feeling that might exist between his owner and any other man. If the Hebrew saw the ass of one who hated him suffering under his load, the kindly hand of help must go forth just as if the owner were a friend.

And the old Law seems to have had boys in view as well as men, for it has a word to say about bird-nesting. If "a bird's nest chance to be before thee," says the Deuteronomist (xxii. 6)—(I don't know if this implies that it would be best not to go hunting out the nests purposely)—but if it "chance" to be before you, on the ground or in a tree, you are not to take the spoil without some consideration. If you must take away the young ones at least leave the mother. So far had the old lawgiver got—for my part I would not like to rob the mother of her little ones.

Well, from these and other passages, we can gather that the drift of those ancient teachers of morality and religion was in full accord with the general Christian principle, which is that of pity for all who are low down, kindness especially to the weak, and wise consideration for all.

Now, we may conveniently sum up under three heads the reasons why we should develop this principle to its fullest in dealing with the creatures around us.

First, we should remember the common lot which falls to them and us, bringing us, as it were, into a great family to which, though they are the Poor Relations of man, they belong no less than he does. We and they are alike dependent on a Power and Wisdom which gave us life and which assigned us all a place, not of our own choosing in the scale of existence. All are fed from the same productive forces of Nature, the most exalted has needs as well as the lowliest, beyond his own power to supply. There is also a strange and sometimes startling resemblance, an essential sameness between the chief aims of the higher creatures and our own. The birds of the air, and the beasts of the field, have their problems of food-supply and of shelter if not of clothing; and their care for their young is attended, evidently, by many feelings analogous to those of human parents. They are content to go without if only the little ones may have; they are bold and ingenious to defend them against enemies and injury; they take delight in the play of their offspring and in assisting them to develop their own powers and gifts. Are not these creatures also, like ourselves, subjects to the chances of accident, surrounded by dangers, capable of hunger and thirst, and pain and death? It is impossible that any intelligent mind can recall these things without feeling that the "Poor Relations" of man have a claim upon him for every wise consideration; and that deliberate cruelty towards them is a cowardly act, a sin against the common creaturehood of all the children of the earth.

Again, if we attend to the teachings of Natural History, we are surely furnished with a further set of reasons for mercifulness toward all creatures. Think of the discoveries of naturalists; the recorded observations of the ways of this species and that, their habits and haunts, the migrations of birds, beasts and fishes, the changes through which the individuals pass, their wonderful variety of structure and colour—all these have been studied for us so plentifully that we are simply bewildered by the copiousness of the interesting things provided for us. Take a walk through the Natural History Museum at Kensington—you will take many a walk if you are wise enough to wish to be wise—and see how marvellous a kingdom it is of which these creatures are the inhabitants. But great as the discoveries of natural historians have been, you know well that the mystery of this teeming life is still to be solved. Some things we know, and many we may guess, respecting the origin of organic structure on the earth, the succession of species, the distribution in time and space of the various living tribes; but who is not conscious that our knowledge is still the the most limited? We are surrounded with marvels. Who can account for the constancy of organic growth, cell after cell and fibre after fibre, along the lines of recognisable plan—so that the offspring passes through all its changes right on to a definite resemblance to its parent? Who can trace the hand of the artist that tints each feather and each filament of a feather so that the whole plumage is an ordered picture? By what mysterious tuition are the unerring instincts brought forth so that each creature plays its part in the great economy of the world, and order is preserved amidst all the shocks and chances and seeming chaos of things?

Meditating on such things the Indian sages of old grew so awe-stricken in the presence of Life, in even its lowliest form, that they forebore to kill anything at all; and the ancient Egyptian, not without a deeper meaning than some of us may catch, found himself constrained to bow in reverence even before things that crawl and things that harm. In our day wisdom seems to point to other ways of showing our reverence—but ill for us if no reverence is left when the mistakes of early piety and later superstition are left behind. We purchase rationalism at too great a price if it deprives us of that deep sense of awe for the mystery of all life, and that ever-fresh wonder at the variety and order of living beings, which should increasingly attend our years of education—i.e., all our years.

This brings me to the third group of reflections tending to beget in us a sense of duty, a spring of benevolence towards the lower creation. It is not only true that we and they are in a wide sense children of one all-producing Creator, that we are involved with them in similar, however distinct, possibilities of care and pain and pleasure; it is not only the fact that the more we attend to the problem of life even in its lowlier forms, the more we shall feel ourselves beset with divine mysteries; there is a consideration which peculiarly affects us as human beings.

I said, just now, that one great mark of difference between us and the lower creatures is the aptitude for moral and spiritual improvement, apparently without limit, that belongs to human nature as such. Now, nothing is more certain than that the things that surround us are all part of the means by which, if we are willing, our natures may be improved. If we are unwilling, or simply indifferent, these very means may prove stumbling-blocks and hindrances; a man may fall and grovel where he ought to mount upward. If we are mindful of the claims of pity, if we let our minds expand in wondering and reverent knowledge of Nature, we shall be all the while growing upwards in the scale of being. The moral sympathies and the intellectual powers will alike quicken. A man so accustomed to behave himself towards all living things must develop a keener apprehension of truth, a more delicate responsiveness to appeals of beauty; and a stronger and more vital moral energy will fill his soul. But he who acts cruelly, on whatever pretence, sinks to the lower levels. He who will not let these creatures share in the discipline, sometimes difficult, but always wholesome, by which his better, wiser, stronger self may be educated, will just sink and sink, until he is the really low animal, and they, in their brute obedience to the law of their nature rank above this degraded man. If for no other reason, a man should be merciful through self-respect; for the finer type of humanity can never be unhumane.

To speak practically, the range of our activity towards these creatures is a limited one; but many of you have living pets in the house, many more may make pets of out-door creatures such as the wild-birds; some have to do with beasts of burden—most of us are glad to avail ourselves at times of public conveyances drawn by horses. In regard to domesticated animals we must recognise that no one has a right to take away liberty and ease from any creature without rendering an equivalent. If you have a pet creature, it is so far your master that you must protect it and serve it in all reasonable ways so that it may enjoy a full measure of painless health. Assuredly, those creatures that are useful to us, without whose services we should be very ill off, require of us a special degree of consideration. Often, indeed, the dog and the horse and other creatures show themselves very sensitive not to bodily comfort only but also to the friendship of their owners; and the owners in such a case are strictly bound to respect and value the attachments they have thus begotten. Anything like barbarous treatment of such creatures is a flagrant wrong; and as thoughtlessness may often cause as much suffering as wilfulness, it should be promply rebuked. I wish the good people who would not wilfully harm a fly would remember that a tram-horse has a hard time of it, and not put the beast to unnecessary strain in stopping the conveyance on a hill, if they can avoid it, or by insisting on being taken to their doorstep when they might have got out of the omnibus when someone else did five seconds before.

Sometimes we have to kill—insects and and animals of a higher degree, live like ourselves under sentence of death; and in the conflicting interests of this strange world the necessity for executing that sentence may come earlier rather than later. So be it; but he who kills, let him do it wisely and swiftly, even in that act remembering mercy, shunning as far as he can whatever may add torture to the process of death. Let all be done with the calm strength of a reasoned duty, not in the passionate excitement that may only too easily degenerate into impulsive and wasteful fury.

We have, in fact, to do here as in respect to all forms of evil—"cast them out" effectively by putting in a better spirit. Everyone knows how ingeniously and successfully Lord Shaftesbury went to work to get the costermongers of London to be kind to their beasts. The annual show, the award for the best-kept animal, these were the outward means; but the inward and the more effective lever which he set in motion was the pride of the men in their donkeys when well-treated, and the developing manhood that went along with developing "donkeyhood." And so the sure way of redeeming the young roughs of the streets—and the young roughs of the family—is to beget in them an interest in the living things around them, plant as well as animal, and to help them to realise—what we all do but too imperfectly—how wonderful it all is, how strangely beautiful, how solemnly mysterious, this problem of life.

Be sure this subject is not a mere superfluous adjunct to the religion we are seeking, the highest type of thought and life, the purest worship, the most effective and wisest power for doing good as long as we live.

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All creatures great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all."

WHAT THE AVERAGE TEACHER MAY DO.*

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

I.

I am to tell you what the average Sunday-school teacher may do with and for his (or her) class.

I had intended to begin by defining the average teacher. But that is somewhat difficult; it would take up precious time; and moreover it is not needed. For practical purposes what we all know needs no definition. We all know ourselves and our regular comrades in this Sunday-school work, and there is no mock humility in saying that most of us are only average teachers. The fact is that all, except those we call our best or our better teachers,—all others are average teachers. And so you will not misunderstand me now if I say that I want to show what any teacher—even the humblest—can do. Of course what the humblest teacher can do the highest teacher may do; and, to that extent, what I have to say applies to all. Only please remember, all along, that it is the average teacher I have in mind; and if I say nothing of the big things which the better teachers may do, it is because I am trying specially to speak only of the things which any teacher can do.

Such a subject is very important if for no other reason than this: That it is upon average teachers that our Sunday-schools have mainly to depend. Of the 700,000 teachers within the Sunday-schools of the United Kingdom it is safe to say that at least three-fourths of them are not above the average. And yet they are the backbone of the Sunday-school system, as at present constituted. Without them the Sunday-school could never have done its noble work, and could not now have the existence it has.

I have an intense sympathy with the average teacher. I see him (or her) in every school I visit; on all sides of the school, with all kinds of classes. I see him (or her), in our school and others, doing most of the work, such as it is. And I cannot but admire them. For to them the work of teaching is often hard indeed. They have not sufficient teaching skill to find a joy in the very exercise of their art. They have often not knowledge enough to feel the pleasure of conveying it. They have too seldom that conscious object in their work which gives such pure satisfaction whenever attained. And yet these average teachers—some of whom perhaps feel about once or twice a month that they would like to give up—hold on year after year. Whatever be their motive—some sense of gratitude or duty to the school, some devotion to or desire to please the minister or superintendent, some vague love for, or dim wish to help, the children—whatever be their motive, there is in these average teachers an endurance at any rate which almost amounts to heroism. Now those are teachers toward whom my heart goes out. I long to help them, or to see them helped. They are the rank and file. The great captains can take care of themselves.

And here let me say that in telling you what the ordinary teacher can do, I shall really only be naming and setting in order the things which average teachers have already actually done.

Suppose now we begin at the beginning, and take what may seem to be the little things first. Well, the average teacher can be punctual. No genius is needed to do that! And, mind you, punctuality in a teacher means a few minutes before the time! As brigades seemed all the go, I suggested to our teachers that we should be "A Five Minutes Early Brigade," for the good of the school. Three minutes or even two minutes before the time make much difference as between a teacher and a class. And for this reason: the man who is on the spot first, in almost anything, has a psychological advantage over later arrivals. Nelson used to say that he owed all he was and did to the fact that he was always a few minutes early. But there is more than this in the case we are considering. For purposes of teaching and learning, the first question is: Whose influence is to be most active during the lesson—the scholars' or the teacher's? The teacher who is at school before the scholars—or even before the bulk of the scholars—takes the easiest course of obtaining the upper hand; and if he obtains it at the outset, he is more likely to keep it all through. Of course, even the most brilliant teacher ought always to be in time, and would do well to be early; but the average teacher simply cannot afford to be late, and thus let the children give the tone—the governing mood—to the class before he (or she) arrives. That, as a rule, means that the teacher has to begin the lesson with an exhausting struggle for order and attention, whereas, by being early, he might have had the order in a much easier and pleasanter way. Three minutes' influence gained over your class by simply being present and pleasant as the children come in and take their seats' one by one, may be a saving of ten or fifteen minutes' strength and feeling afterwards—may be, and often has been, the saving of the whole morning or afternoon.

So much for punctuality.

Next I pass on to say that any teacher can be regular in attendance. No extraordinary powers are required for the practice of regularity. But teachers often do not realise the power for good which regularity in itself gives them over their scholars. In the irregular teacher the children lose a certain amount of faith; and all loss of faith in a teacher is, to the children, a loosening of faith in character generally. The faithful teacher, by simple faithfulness alone, does more than he imagines to build up in the children's minds and hearts the kingdom of integrity. But there is another point. You know the old fable of the hare and the tortoise. The tortoise won the race! You recollect also the fable of the sun and the wind and the traveller. It was not the blustering wind which made the traveller take off his cloak, it was the persistent sun! And life shows us, in many spheres, that it is the regular things, the constant influences which tell, and, in the long run, which make and mould character. Believe me that faithful regularity of attendance with your class is in itself character-making, not less to you than to the children.

And now I want to emphasise another thing which any teacher may do. It is this: He (or she) can meet his class good-temperedly, nay cheerfully. I am not sure that you can teach anything in a bad temper. Certain I am that neither the excellent nor the ordinary teacher can in "a temper" teach religion—and least of all our religion. But, whatever you may be trying to teach, and whatever you may have been privately passing through, go to your class cheerful. Oh yes, it can be done by anybody! Try it—try it again—and you will see! I have not time to argue it out and prove it by many instances. But please understand that cheerfulness is not a mere matter of temperament or circumstance; it is a creatable and a cultivatable quality by all who will. I ask you—whatever your temperament—to test this fact. Simply be cheerful—as you can be by an act of will, and as you can more easily be when your aim and motive are to help the happiness of others—and you will find cheerfulness grow from an effort to a habit, and from a habit to a spirit within you. Children like a cheerful teacher, as our gardens love a sunny day. Don't you feel cheerful? Put that feeling aside in the presence of your class. Think of the children, their outer and their inner life, their needs, their dependence on you, and then, if you can do nothing else, say "For their sakes I will cheerfulize myself."

Punctuality, regularity, cheerfulness—after all, are these only little things? As Wendell Holmes reminds us, the philosophers have never yet decided whether life is a little bundle of great things or a great bundle of little things. Be it as it may, these things I have named so far, whether small or large, are the hinges of success to the average teacher, and are the things which any teacher can do.

Well, now we must move on to the lessons. What may the average teacher do in regard to lessons?

It is obvious that the humblest teacher must give some lesson. A lesson of some sort every teacher gives—or professes to give—each time he meets his class. It may not be a great lesson, there may be not much in it; but the humblest teacher knows he has to fill in the allotted time somehow or other, and experience teaches him that the giving of a real lesson to the children is the most economical way of using up the time.

This being so, then the first thing I want to say upon the point is that any teacher can prepare his (or her) lesson. Note that I use the word "prepare" in the widest possible sense. Literally the word "prepare" means to get ready beforehand. For example, if you have only made up your mind before you go to school what lesson you will take, you have prepared, to that extent. Suppose it is only a reading lesson, and you have read over at home what is going to be read in class, you at least know something of the lesson beforehand, and that is preparation. But, as you see now, the average teacher can easily do more preparation than that. If he (or she) does less preparation than I have stated, need the average teacher wonder if he fail to gain or keep the attention of the children? Would the average teacher himself pay attention for twenty, thirty, or forty minutes to a preacher or lecturer who had evidently never thought beforehand of what he was saying? Surely the least that a scholar ought to expect of any teacher who wants his attention is that the teacher should have something to tell him, or ask him, or explain to him. Put yourself in the scholar's place, and imagine what it feels like to "sit under" a teacher who has got no lesson to give! Would you be good? I don't believe I would. True, an average teacher may have seen a first-rate teacher take a class at a moment's notice and give a capital lesson. Do you think that lesson was given without preparation? Never! You might as well expect a new-born baby to begin giving an explanation of Newton's "Principia," as an absolutely unprepared man or woman to give a lesson. The lesson may not have been prepared that day, that week, or even that year. But prepared it had been certainly, The facts, the truths, the principles, the illustrations, had all been stored away and associated in the mind of the speaker, and if he can give them out, and adapt them, and apply them at sudden call, it is because, by previous preparation and use, he has gained the knowledge and acquired the art of conveying it. "You could never do that," do you say? Then there is all the more reason why you, as an average teacher, should prepare your lesson, however humble or simple it is. Even the first-rate teacher cannot, as a regular thing, do without immediate preparation. Old Dr. Thompson, the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, once quietly rebuked a young undergraduate who had rather sneered at age and had been somewhat over-positive in the debate over a serious matter—when Thompson, with quiet irony, replied and said: "We are none of us infallible—not even the youngest of us!" It will be just as true to say: "We can none of us do without preparing our lessons—not even the poorest teacher that ever taught." No, you must prepare your lesson somehow if you are going to have the least success as a teacher, or the least pleasure in teaching. Until you have tried this, don't think yourself a failure. Someone once asked Dr. Bartol if he didn't think Christianity a failure, and he replied: "I cannot tell; it has never been tried." To the average teacher I say do not lose heart, do not imagine yourself a failure until you have properly tried this simple and sensible talisman of making such preparation as you can, and as suits you and your class, whatever kind of lesson you give.

Now, as to the lesson itself. Here, in passing, may I venture to put in a plea with all whom it may concern, for shorter lessons in our Sunday-schools? Lessons in many of our schools are much too long for the average teacher and the average scholar. They are even longer than a day-school lesson, with all its helpful apparatus, its trained teacher, and its authoritative discipline. The consequence is that the last ten or fifteen minutes between average teacher and scholars is often a trying time! I think one of Wesley's sayings was that, in preaching, there were no souls saved after twenty-five minutes! I should be inclined to say that with average teachers and scholars in a Sunday-school there is not much teaching done after an actual lesson of twenty minutes.

If there be any truth in this, what are we to do? Suppose the school meeting occupies an hour or a little more, how is it to be filled up if the average lesson is to last only twenty minutes? That, of course, is for each school to decide for itself, according to its own needs and circumstances. And, as a matter of fact, this is what some schools have done. In earlier times about twenty minutes respectively were devoted in the Sunday-school hour to reading, writing, and arithmetic. That day has gone. In one later school I have heard of there are two teachers present with each class, one keeping order and the other teaching, and when one has finished his lesson the other begins! These must be average teachers with scholars above the average! Another plan I have heard of is that, at a signal in the middle of the hour, teachers change classes and give their lesson over again. This, again, is pretty rough on the average scholar.

What we have recently done in our school with success in the afternoon is the following:—Starting at two o'clock, nearly ten minutes is necessarily taken up in the opening exercises, the separating into classes and class-rooms, and the settling down to lessons. Each teacher has then half-an-hour with his (or her) class. At twenty minutes to three lessons stop and all re-assemble in the large room—all except the infants, who are already on their way home. Then the notices are given out. And then, that doctrinal teaching shall not be entirely neglected, we spend a little time in repeating together reverently some of the great truths we believe, with a few words of explanation by the minister on this point or on that, with a few questions here and there to make sure that it is not mere sounds we are learning but vital ideas—living truths. Then, that the devotional spirit may be developed in all who gather in our Sunday-school, we spend the next few minutes in one of the services with music at the beginning of our hymn-book. All this may not be much each Sunday, but let it go on Sunday after Sunday, not mechanically but livingly, and there comes into play that character-moulding power of regularity, to which I have already referred, and which in Nature, in history, and in God's education of the human race, is one of the most potent you can find.

AN OLD NONCONFORMIST LAWSUIT.—II.

This case, however, was ordained to illustrate with force the old adage that "He laughs longest who laughs last"—a maxim which every thoughtful litigant would do well to take to heart.

Apparently Milnes' two letters to Lawton were delayed in the post. The latter's impatience seems to have led him to accuse his correspondent of a "breach of promise." Writing on April 6, 1729, Nilnes exculpates himself, and remonstrates, with the remark, "Your zeal in the cause has made you most unmerciful to your friends." After referring to the pecuniary support promised from Liverpool and Manchester, he says: "If the custom should at last be set aside as illegal or unreasonable, it will be a great point gained for the Dissenters in all parts where such unreasonable customs have prevailed, or where they have parish clerks that will swear roundly that there have been such customs."

"Ours," he adds, "continues still mighty ill, though I question not he has ere now got an absolution for what he has done in the support of the Church's rights, though contrary to the dictates of his conscience."

The vicar of Wakefield did not long survive his triumph, for he seems to have died sometime in this same month of April.

This event somewhat embarrassed the defence, who found themselves thereby forced to abandon the idea of moving for a new trial, for (as the law then stood) the maxim, actio personalis moritur cum personâ precluded the suit from being revived.

A change of tactics was accordingly adopted. Leaving the verdict of the Jacobite jury to stand, they now "moved in arrest of judgment." In other words, they no longer disputed the existence of the custom, but contended that the custom was invalid.

The idea of prosecuting the too-devoted parish clerk for perjury seems also to have been under consideration.

A letter from Mr. Ingram's London agent, one Mr. Nicholas Paxton, of Southampton Buildings, to his principal, under date of May 5, 1729, informs us that the validity of the custom is to be "solemnly argued" before the Court of King's Bench. Mr. Naylor's counsel were Mr. Fazakerly, Mr. Thomas Bootle, Mr. Edward Bootle, and Mr. Filmer, "so that," adds the attorney with a touch of professional pride, "you could not be better supplied in all Westminster Hall."

This formidable phalanx of legal talent did indeed prove too much for the adversary. The Whig Dissenters triumphed over the Tory parson and his "Jacks."

The tidings of victory reached the Rev. Joseph Lawton in a letter from Paxton to Ingram, dated May 20, 1729, duly copied and transmitted by Milnes, four days later.

"On Friday last"—so runs Paxton's letter—"our counsel moved in arrest of judgment, which was strenuously opposed; but after hearing four counsel on both sides, the Court were clear of opinion that the custom, as laid in the suggestion, was void in itself, for that they had laid the fee to be due to the Vicar at the time that Mrs. Naylor ought to have been churched, which being uncertain, the Court were unanimous in their opinion as to the invalidity of the custom, and ordered judgment to be arrested accordingly."

The prudent Milnes, in his covering letter, seizes the opportunity, while enthusiasm is hot, to recur to the subject of ways and means. "I hope," he says to Lawton, "you will take care to impart this good news to as many of our Dissenting brethren as lie within your sphere, who, I make no doubt, will generously contribute something towards the charge of supporting our common cause and interest."

Mr. Edward Bootle appears to have been more impulsive and less clear-sighted than his more eminent brother. In a letter written from Chancery-lane on May 17—the day following the victory—he hazards the statement that "A final end is not only put to that malicious prosecution, but I hope to all other attempts hereafter in that kind, the Court declaring the custom to be unreasonable and void."

The minister of Gateacre does not seem to have been slow to spread the good news. In a letter, undated, but evidently following the one last quoted, Milnes, after mentioning that "it is talked that it (the suit) had cost the Vicar and his friends about £150," says: "I am glad the thing was made public. We had some thoughts of doing it ourselves, but you have saved us the trouble. I met with it in the papers the same day (sic) post that yours came to hand."

But, alas for the predictions of too-sanguine enthusiasts! The elation of the Dissenting world had no doubt moderated somewhat after the lapse of a few months. It must have been still further chastened by the news that the late Vicar's executors were again in the field.

In forwarding to his reverend friend at Gateacre a copy of a letter from the proctor at York, reporting this new move on the part of the enemy, Milnes thus comments upon it (Aug. 13, 1729): "Our late Vicar's executors are not yet easy, but have now a mind to push the affair forward as to what was not prohibited, in order, as we suppose, to recover costs of Mr. Naylor in the Spiritual Court. You know the Vicar libelled against Mr. Naylor for 4d. for a customary fee for burying four of his children." The writer then propounds sundry questions touching Mr. Naylor's appropriate course of action, &c., with a request that they may be laid before Mr. T. Bootle on his visit to Liverpool. This was duly done. Among Mr. Lawton's papers we find Mr. Bootle's opinion, copied in the minister's hand. At foot is written: "Vera copia Quaestiō & Responsiō Dat. Septembris Octodecimo die año 1729 eparata pr. J. Lawton."

In this Opinion, the learned counsel points out that the decision of the Court of King's Bench, in Scott v. Naylor, as to the custom of churching, does not touch the kindred questions of burial, christening, and marriage fees, because it "was chiefly founded on the insufficient and incertain manner in which it (the custom) was alleged." But, he adds, in the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Holt, Dissenters are not liable for such fees unless the rector or vicar actually perform the duty. The decision here referred to is apparently that given in the case of Bordeaux v. Lancaster (reported in I. Salkeld's Reports, p. 332). A copy of the report figures among the Scott v. Naylor papers.

It is pleasant to be able to close our series with the following letter. The Vicar's executors had been only playing a game of "bluff," after all, and had no heart for fight left in them. When resolutely opposed, they collapsed.

"The affair of the burials," writes Milnes to Lawton, on Jan. 29, 1730, "is now entirely at an end. The late Vicar's executors pushed it in the Spiritual Court as far as it would go, and finding in the end that Mr. Naylor's proctor had positive orders to deny the custom, and demand a certificate of the Court of his having so done, in order to move the Court above for a Prohibition, they then fairly threw up, and ordered proceedings to be stopped immediately; and so it rests."

The prosaic but inevitable question of law costs has once more to be brought under notice. "And now," we read, "all being ended, we have, the last week, been collecting what we could amongst our friends in this congregation, which amounts in all to about £30; which, indeed, I think is pretty well, considering that the weight lies chiefly on four or five of us, and for all the rest, their contribution does not amount to above £5 in all. Nor could more be expected, since their circumstances will not admit of it. We must now see what can be done in other congregations. I have wrote to Manchester, and Leeds will shortly be taken care of. There are people at both places who seem willing to act generously, and I hope they will. I desire you to promote a collection now amongst our friends as much and as speedily as you can. If your Brother Winder be forgetful and dilatory, pray rouse him up. You have arguments in store much better than I can pretend to furnish you with. I shall only say that if persons will not stand up in vindication of their interest and liberty, it is pity they should enjoy either." This "forgetful and dilatory Brother Winder" was probably the Rev. Henry Winder, who was minister at Liverpool from 1719 to 1752, first at Castle Hey, and afterwards (1727) at Benn's Garden Chapel; in 1740 he received the degree of D.D. (For a further account of him, see Nightingale 6, 112—113.)

It can scarcely be doubted that Mr. Winder, and all others who required it, were duly "roused up"; that all, indeed, who lay within the Rev. Joseph Lawton's sphere of activity were, nolens volens, compelled to contribute to the expenses of a suit that so nearly concerned them all.

Thus ended this thrice-fought fight. No one at the present day will be disposed to find fault with the judgment.

The longer report of the case (in Barnardiston) appears to base the Judges' decision upon the uncertainty of the custom, as alleged in the libel, thus conveying the impression that the Dissenters owed their victory to a technical flaw, due to the imperfect draughtsmanship of their adversary's pleadings. The judgment seems in fact, however, to have been founded upon the merits of the case; for (according to Raymond) the Court further found that the custom was void, as being unreasonable, inasmuch as it required a fee to be paid, although no duty were performed. This version of the judgment is corroborated by the letter of one of the counsel engaged in the suit—Mr. E. Bootle—(quoted above), where it is stated that the Court declared the custom to be "unreasonable and void."

This double foundation seems to have established the decision in Scott v. Naylor as an unshaken precedent from that day to this. James L. Thornely.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF A MANCHESTER UNITARIAN.—II.

I don't know anybody but myself who is likely to remember my employer, Mr. Thomas Forrest. I believe he came to Manchester in 1825, and obtained work as a journeyman on the Manchester Guardian. Three years afterwards he began business for himself in St. Ann's-place as a bookseller and printer. He was long a member of the Cross-street congregation, his pew being in the gallery looking towards Cheapside. In time he removed to the shop in Market-street, in which I served my apprenticeship. Then, and for many years afterwards when it came into my own possession, it was the only place in the town where Unitarian publications could be obtained. It was a rendezvous for both ministers and members of the local congregations. When the Manchester Guardian was published but once a week, and was sold at sevenpence, we had a visit every Saturday morning from an old retired minister, who called to say "Good morning," read the paper, and "bade us farewell." His name was Andrew or Abraham Bennett, but I never knew what pulpit he had occupied. Another diligent caller was the Rev. William Harrison, of Blackley, who for forty years revelled in a salary of the same number of pounds sterling. In subsequent years the Rev. Dr. Beard was a constant customer. We printed many of his books and the Christian Teacher, of which he was founder and first editor. To him it fell to me, in my capacity of "printer's devil," to carry proofs and copy. On one occasion I was directed to his schoolroom to present my parcel. Shyly opening the door, confused by finding myself in the presence of fifty or sixty youths, I momentarily forgot my manners. Of them, however, I was speedily reminded by a stern command from the desk of the master—"Take off your cap, sir." But, of course, he didn't know that he was startling the nerves of one of his future chapel wardens. The periodicals kept on the counter were the Christian Pioneer, the Christian Reformer, and the Children's Friend. "They had their day and ceased to be." The Rev. John Gooch Robberds was always welcome—so genial and kind—with a smile to "make sunshine in a shady place." His happy face was a living commentary on a phrase of his own: "God and man have been very kind to me."* The Rev. John James Tayler was largely supplied with the publications of Schleiermacher and other German theologians, who were once such a terror to orthodoxy. The Rev. Mr. Gaskell came less frequently; but the resounding laugh of the Rev. John Colston, of Styal, often enlivened us. When the college arrived in September, 1840, my governor's business was increased by orders from Mr. Francis William Newman, B.A., professor of the Greek, Latin, and English languages; Mr. Robert Finlay, B.A., mathematics; Mr. Montague L. Phillips, physical science and natural history; and others. The students required notebooks, and were always chatty and pleasant. With several of them I formed acquaintanceships which ripened into friendships that death only terminated. They were good enough to invite me to some of their debates and social functions. With a singularly able lay-student, John Ashton Nicholls, I had long afterwards the pleasure to co-operate in educational movements in which he was a leader, until his lamented decease at the comparatively early age of thirty-seven. Had he been spared a little longer, he would certainly have become one of the representatives in Parliament of his native city. How well I remember some divinity students of this date, who also were destined to too brief a period of active service, Rees Lloyd, Henry W. Crosskey and others. I always admired the great capacity for public work displayed by another esteemed friend, the Rev. John Wright, one of the same band of Manchester College students, who has quite recently been called to his reward.

A peculiar interest, not untouched with a tender pathos, attaches to perhaps the most remarkable of the students of 1841. Travers Madge had spiritual gifts and moral purity and sweetness of disposition which we may justly call saintly. His intellectual powers were far above the average. His addresses and sermons displayed many of the highest qualities of a distinguished preacher.

His character was truly magnetic. It was impossible to know him intimately without feeling its subtle but powerful influence. What he was to successive scholars at the Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school can never be known save by those acquainted with their subsequent lives and careers. My own relations with him form a consecrated memory that can cease only with my life. For, in addition to an intimate knowledge of his general activities, I knew him as a workman and a partner in business for some two years or so. One day I was called to see a lady who had inquired for me. It was the late benevolent and estimable Mrs. Salis Schwabe. She told me that Travers had for some time spent a part of every Saturday in giving religious instruction to her sons. But he seemed occasionally so depressed and unhappy that she induced him to open his mind, and tell her his trouble. It turned out to be, that he had finally adopted the resolution never to take money for preaching, or any other kind of religious work—that he was determined to get his living by the work of his hands—and that perhaps the most congenial employment to him would be that of a printer. Her question was, could I take him and find room for him in my office? He was too old to be apprenticed; the trade would not permit him to work as a journeyman;—and the only solution of the difficulties was to make him a partner in the profits, allowing him, till they were periodically ascertained, a weekly wage. Conscientious in everything, he attended to all the minutiæ of duty, until his health was so impaired that a long rest became imperative. He won the hearts of every boy and man in the office, and they parted with him as with a dear friend. His gentle kindness, the frankness with which he accepted every piece of work assigned to him, left a fragrant and long-cherished memory with all his fellow-printers, young and old.

Many are the phases of faith through which both ministers and laymen have passed since my early days. The miracles were almost unconditionally accepted, though those of the Old were regarded with less confidence than those of the New Testament. Water might have been converted to wine at Cana of Galilee; but Jonah in the body of the whale was rather strong meat.

In a class of young men conducted by Mr. Tayler, I remember a discussion on them when our learned instructor remarked that if the miraculous element were struck out, the narrative would present such gaps that its historical continuity could hardly be preserved. The pulpit instruction of another eminent minister assumed the historical accuracy of the Mosaic cosmogony, and sometimes reviewed the first chapter of Genesis as a scientific as well as an interesting record. Dr. Martineau's "Rationale of Religious Enquiry" was looked at askance. Religious truth, it was held, depended entirely on the authority of the Scriptures. The approved method of controversy was the battle of the texts. If you could produce sixty in favour of the Unitarian position, and your opponent could find thirty only to support the Trinitarian view, he was supposed to be silenced and ought to be convinced. Much anxiety was created in many minds by Mr. Tayler's doubts as to the authenticity of St. John's Gospel. I was told by one very able minister that he had been painfully shocked when the physical resurrection of Jesus was called in question. In 1869 I was present at Little Portland-street Chapel, when it was made evident that important changes had become necessary. Mr. Martineau conducted the service from the book to which he had, not long before, himself contributed two of the ten forms. But he omitted so much and altered so much else, that I could hardly regard such criticisms as favourable to the flow of devotional feeling.

Somewhere about 1864, my late esteemed friend Robert M. Shipman and I had many discussions on the unsatisfactory remuneration of our ministers. He took the question very seriously to heart, and called a meeting (in 1866) of laymen at the Memorial Hall, to state his views and to urge the necessity of some steps being taken in the way of improvement. He was immersed in a great law business, and his leisure was of the scantiest. So it became my part to put our views before the public by contributions to the newspapers, by circular, and otherwise. Thus was laid the foundation of a serious effort made at the Triennial Conference of Free Churches in Liverpool in 1882, which led to the foundation of the "Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund."

The Unitarian Home Missionary Board, projected in 1854 by Dr. Beard, long suffered seriously from the lack of suitable accommodation. At first the students assembled in the vestry of the Strangeways Chapel; then rooms were taken over some offices in Marsden-street; but at the best these were unsatisfactory. Mr. Gaskell's comment was, that he liked the "Board" well enough, but that the "Lodgings" were bad. Then the enterprising mind and indomitable courage of Dr. Beard sketched the scheme of the Memorial Hall, opened in 1864, and ever since the convenient home of Tutors and Students. Nor would it be easy to recount the valuable services it has rendered in the foundation of new, and the expansion of other religious and educational institutions, to which the trustees have always extended a generous hospitality.

I bring these rambling notes to a close with a feeling of devout gratitude that I have been permitted to act, in various matters, with a long succession of earnest and excellent men, filling prominent positions in educational, religious and philanthropic work, whose friendship was a cherished possession, and to co-operate with whom was an honour that could not be too highly prized.

SOME NOTES ON IBSEN.

Ibsen is not a zephyr. Those who love parterres and the shelter of pleasant thought-gardens will make him unwelcome.

Perhaps the chief of the reasons which get him the respect of those who, while not pessimists, refuse to view life through rose-spectacles, is his moral courage. He is not an intellectual drunkard or opium-eater. He will not forego the integrity of daylight. There is a sense of duty in all he writes: a sense of aboriginal power: he cares for no man, but he seeks to serve all. Had one to "class" him, one would include him with Emerson, Tolstoy, Whitman, and Carlyle.

Ibsen's life, until after its meridian, was a martyrdom to his ideas. Dr. Stockman, in the play, An Enemy of the People, makes two notable utterances. One is to his brother, the great man of their district, on the occasion of his setting aside the health of his mind for the health of his position and purse: "Peter, you are the most abominable plebeian I have ever met!" The other is when, having to choose isolation and principle or popularity and complaisance, he accepts the former, exclaiming: "The greatest man is he who can stand most alone." Dr. Stockman is taken for an indication of Ibsen himself. Ibsen, in an age when palace-building and yacht-keeping fortunes are secured by hands deft at juggling with meat-tins, tea-packets, and by other much less commendable means, found himself a very near neighbour to starvation. It is not notoriety or public recognition that has given Ibsen greatness; it is his mental uprightness and his self-reliance. He was great before he was known, but his greatness was bought with a price. He cannot be expected to bring round to the door of a century that so treated him a barrel-organ full of conventional tunes.

Ibsen's suffering must have been accentuated by his lack of humour. Humour is not only a shield; it may become wings out of Hades. A sense of the ridiculous, a perception that the tragedy is no tragedy at all in intent, but only through the bungling and blind actions of the rest, leads to toleration. Ibsen has a certain humour of the grim sort, but of the quality of perceiving the absurdity of allowing the heart-gear under the waistcoat to become dislocated by the percentage of absurdity incarnate in human ideas, organisations, systems, habits, he is barren. Consequently he is so ruffled by the inadequate and the pretentious that he has no time to dwell on things lovely, honest, pure and of good report which are as much incarnate in man's life as the former. He keeps busy with only one side of the shield; but the root of all his outward gruesomeness is the desire and dream of the Golden Age. It may be said of him that he is an apostle and that his Christ is Truth, but in the same way that Jesus to no two disciples appeared identically the same, so to Ibsen Truth appears only in part.

This may account for the hatred his name inspires in some quarters. Two lectures were given here (Stratford-on-Avon)—the first dealt with his biography; the second with his play The Pillars of Society, a play which concludes with the statement that the said Pillars are Freedom and Truth. Remembering who is accepted as the speaker of "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," and, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth," it was queer to have a certain local section, great in numbers, seeking to prevent the lectures. By all means let those who dislike Ibsen, dislike him to the full; but that they should attempt to stop others from knowing of him is another matter. One of our hon. secs. was even requested by his landlady—not acting on her own initiative—to displace from his window a small bill of announcement he had hung up. It is surely enough to "disturb the bones" of him here who wrote,

> "Ignorance is the curse of God,
> Knowledge the wings wherewith we fly to Heav'n."

That it is sheer ignorance of Ibsen's aim, and probably of his work as a whole, that leads to such fear of him, there can be but small question. It is as if children watched the superficial horror of a post-mortem without being able to realise that the knowledge sought was for the preservation and betterment of the life of the future: that if unpleasant to watch it was worse to be done: that only a stern sense of duty could lead to its being done at all.

That you must have a good constitution to derive benefit from the Ibsen country may be held true. Ibsen is Norway in print, a Viking sailing moral seas. Fierce, resolute, implacable; a destroyer; a strong man preying on ease—but the ease he preys on is unworthy, and the cause he serves is that of humanity. He is the north wind: if you are habituated to drawing-rooms, and the walled security of towns, to oily summer seas, to delicate life, he will shiver and depress you. He will blow your hat off, and tear your coat: it is idle for you to attempt opposition: you had best seek where soft breezes dally with last season's leaves, and fan them up and down again in gentle controversy. This man is a hurricane in the boughs: all that is weak and rotten comes creaking and hurtling down; but the north wind is the henchman of summer, and an indispensable part of the creation of God. Ernest Betham.

Stratford-on-Avon.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—On Wednesday Miss Ethel Chamberlain, youngest daughter of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, was married to Mr. Whitmore L. Richards, barrister-at-law. The bride was given away by her father, the marriage service being conducted by the Rev. L. P. Jacks. The church was beautifully decorated with palms and lilies. The wedding hymn, "O Perfect Love," was sung before the benediction.

Liscard.—On Monday, Aug. 20, the marriage took place at the Memorial Church, of Mr. Ernest J. Johnson, who is one of the wardens of the church and an active member of the gymnasium, to Miss Amie Parr, who is also a member of the church, and niece of Mr. J. Birkett Fisher. In the absence of a settled minister, the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman officiated.

London: Kentish Town.—The services in the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, on Aug. 19, were conducted by Mr. Armytage Bakewell. In the morning the discourse was on "War," when it was pointed out that the nature of man was combative, and had been so from the necessity of contest with the primeval fauna and with his fellow savage.

Amongst virile peoples even the games were games of contest, and we ourselves rejoiced in cricket, football, chess—the last the greatest. It was inevitable that wars must arise until, not so much from the softening of man's nature, as from the perfection of wide-reaching instruments of destruction; wars would cease, for the up-lifted hand would be stayed by fear. Now, however, war was often the only remedy for injustice. War, too, was the stern teacher of virility, and though its horrors were great, there were many things worse than war, such, for example, as the loss of the sense for truth, for justice, and for honour in a nation. It was a matter for rejoicing and for renewed trust in the Divine government of the world to perceive, as we were forced to do, the humanising effects of war, the fraternisation of a great and wide-spread people, of officers and men under the stress of privation and danger, and even of the combatants who, learning to respect each other, and in hospital sharing little comforts, found that the demon spectre of the battle was after all a brother-man. In the evening the subject was "Peace," which had ever been the aspiration of man; but peace came from the strong man on guard. The ideas of peace in various times and religions were referred to. There was, however, a spiritual peace obtainable in all circumstances, irrespective of age, of rank, of wealth, of poverty; a peace that even men of war, like General Gordon, could attain in the midst of military duty, the peace of a conscience void of offence, the peace of God which passeth all understanding—a true Nirvana of the soul.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Sunday last the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., preached farewell sermons. His ministry here has extended over a period of five-and-a-half years. At a social meeting of the congregation held on Monday evening last, Mr. John Heys, on behalf of the members and friends, presented Mr. Harris with a picture, "At Evening Time there shall be Light," after B. W. Leader, R.A. At a meeting of the Ladies' Church Aid Society, held on 15th inst., a gold brooch was presented to Mrs. Harris, who has held the office of president for the past five years.

Northiam.—The monthly service at the pretty little chapel in this beautiful Sussex village was taken last Sunday by Dr. Greaves. Friends wanting country air might well resort to Northiam, which now has a light railway from Robertsbridge on the S.E.R.

Portsmouth.—A handsome memorial, in white marble, with a life-size medallion portrait, has been erected in Kingston cemetery, of the Rev. Thomas Timmins, the founder (with Mr. G. T. Angell) of the American Band of Mercy Movement, and at one time minister of the High-street Church. Mr. Timmins died Aug. 19, 1898. The memorial has been erected by the Committee of the British Empire Division of the Universal Mercy Band.

Port St. Mary (Isle of Man).—The first of a series of services, for which the Missionary Conference has made arrangements, was held in the Town Hall on Sunday morning last. From an early hour the rain poured down persistently, but, notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, a congregation of twenty-seven assembled, among whom were visitors from Liscard, Bolton, Norwich, &c., and several residents in the island. The preacher was the Rev. J. C. Hirst.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—Contributions are still being received by Mr. Ion Pritchard at Essex Hall, and the need for generous help is by no means at an end. A further list of acknowledgments will be published next week. The Indian Messenger of Aug. 5 publishes a touching letter from an Indian student at Tokyo, telling how appeals have been made in the colleges and schools of Japan, and how eager the response has been.

THOSE of our friends who are interested in the opening of Willaston School will note that the date previously advertised has been altered to Sept. 27, a week later than was originally intended. We understand that there is to be no public ceremony in connection with the opening, but some future occasion, when the school has got into thorough working order, will doubtless be taken to draw public attention to its distinctive principles and aims.

THE authorities of the Presbyterian Church of England have issued a little pamphlet by the Rev. A. H. Drysdale, M.A., author of "The History of the Presbyterians in England," on "The Use of the Name 'Presbyterian' by Unitarians" (publishing office, 14, Paternoster-square, E.C. 1d). It is a sore point with orthodox Trinitarian Presbyterians, that some of our old chapels, which for generations have been known as "Presbyterian," should retain their historic name, while the congregations have become Unitarian, and no vestige of Presbyterian church government remains; and Mr. Drysdale suggests that "in the interests of truth and equity," as well as from courtesy towards the churches which are actually Presbyterian in their organisation, such congregations should relinquish their old name.

MR. DRYSDALE professes to write "not in any controversial spirit, but simply by way of information," but when he suggests that the old Nonconformists of last century, who in the freedom of their congregations adopted Arian views, "were not open and honest enough to confess it," and that this broadening of religious thought, which became at last humanitarian and Unitarian (with no Presbyterian authority to call the ministers in question), was the result of "laxity in an age of laxity of morals and religion," he can hardly be acquitted of importing a highly controversial element into his statement. The name Presbyterian in connection with those old congregations has been preserved and honoured, because in the course of a natural historical development, to which no shadow of dishonour can rightly be attached, it came to denote not a mode of government, but a principle of open religious fellowship. The plea of "truth and equity," therefore, will not hold, and 'courtesy" may be asked on both sides.

A CORRESPONDENT in Wednesday's Standard reports a scheme promoted by a London company, in conjunction with the Windermere and District Electric Supply Company, to introduce electric trams, on the overhead trolley system, between Bowness, Windermere and Ambleside, widening and levelling roads for the purpose. The thought of the hideous spider-web of the overhead trolley spanning those roads is intolerable, especially when one thinks of it creeping on, as it doubtless would, past Rydal to Grasmere, past Dove Cottage and up to Wordsworth's grave; and then why not over Dunmail Raise to Thirlmere, and on to Keswick, until it penetrated to the very heart of Borrowdale? The Standard, in a strong leading article on the subject, thinks that very cogent reasons would have to be shown before such a desecration of the Lake District, which is rightly regarded as a priceless national possession, could be allowed. For our own part we should almost prefer a railway, which would leave the high roads alone. The Commissioners' inquiry is fixed for Sept. 24, and we earnestly hope that an effective opposition may at once make an end of the scheme.

THE September number of the Mill Hill Pulpit consists of a sermon by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, entitled "Violence in Vain" with reference to the assassination of the King of Italy. Such a crime of violence must be regarded, Mr. Hargrove says, as a symptom of national disease, and not a mere isolated act of an eccentric individual; and society must take home to itself the responsibility, in which all have a share.

The defect of the whole body discovers itself in the individual member. And when from out the multitude a hand is lifted to strike at the object of universal honour, to destroy one for whose preservation the prayers of all the people are uplifted, it means something. The people may fight the police to get at the murderer, and tear him in their rage, yet they cannot escape complicity in his act. "It was one of ourselves," they must confess, "one brought up among us and by us, made what he was by what he heard and saw and learnt among us, who was prompted to this deed. As we have fashioned him such he is." And it is not one class of the people who should say so, but all, from highest to lowest. For society produces out of itself all varieties, fair and foul. Prince and pauper, nun and harlot, fine lady and slatternly drudge, flunky and anarchist, cultured man of letters and East End rough, all alike are of its make, children of its begetting and bringing up, in whose features, fair and foul, it may see its own image.

AND if it is asked, how comes it that there should be such a one, and more than one, driven to such a detestable crime, the answer is:—

The root out of which is gendered the disposition to this kind of murder, murder which can bring no gain, and whose certain outcome is severest punishment, is the growing consciousness in mankind of the wrong and misery of the world. Things ought not to be as they are. We all admit it, and every inquiry made by royal commissions, or public authorities, or philanthropic agencies, as to the condition of the submerged millions, bears witness to the uneasiness of the public conscience. If in the human body we find one limb wasted and powerless while the rest of the body is well nourished, we recognise at once the presence of disease; it is an obviously abnormal condition, it is not natural or right. So when in the social body we find a large lowest class, in which want is chronic, and misery breeds vice and vice again misery, we know that we are somehow to blame. That multitudes should have more than is needful for healthy and happy life, while others are stinted of bare necessaries—that some should be able to earn only scant and precarious livelihood by unremitting toil, while others have little or nothing to do and plenty without working for it—this cannot be right. The earth is not stingy or used up, the resources on which our race thrives are not exhausted; there is plenty for each and all. The fault is in our wastefulness and the difficulties of communication. We are like an army scattered over a wide territory, and some sections are in sore want all the while that supplies are accumulating and going to waste at headquarters, because the communications are broken. So is it as between those who have abundance and those who have nothing; we don't as yet know how to relieve and raise the destitute masses of the people. Mere giving wont do it, may make matters worse, may create a whole class of paupers relying on public charity. So much more is wanted than merely to fill empty stomachs, and what should be done we are always trying to find out.

Meanwhile—while men and women and children are herding in the slums of great cities and in the hovels of the country, ill-nourished, ill-clothed, ill-educated — we spend hundreds of millions in drink and armaments and luxury. Italy has felt the pinch of hunger and misery more than any nation of Europe or perhaps of the world, and in proportion to her means has spent more lavishly than any on needless wars, and preparations for war only to be justified if at all by fear of foreign violence. Hence Italy has been the headquarters of anarchy, the centre whence has gone forth the protest against the misrule whose results are grinding poverty and bankruptcy, and universal discontent, and ill-suppressed revolution.

CRIMES of violence cannot remedy the ills of which we are so keenly conscious. And yet when we cry out against the insane fury of the assassin we are reminded that he is not alone in that evil passion.

Is not the trust of all the nations in violence? Whatever be the occasion of offence, is not the appeal, if made in earnest, made to the rifle and the sword? Have we not a certain contempt for the powers of reason and gentleness and persuasion in human and especially in international affairs? The savage instinct lurks always in the civilised man, and prompts him to settle his disputes by a blow: we have for the most part silenced these promptings of the wild beast in our private quarrels; as between nations, this old rule, only law of the days before the voice of reason or humanity had yet been heard, still prevails. Violence rules the world, and for the present might is right. The doctrine is now set forth undisguisedly and unblushingly. "Internationally the world knows nothing of honesty," writes a London newspaper. "Might is right, and a disposition to think otherwise has always been regarded as a sign of decadence." A sign of decadence when a people begins to put its trust in the righteousness of its cause! Those who argue for justice and forbearance, says a political writer, "would govern the world on Sunday-school principles," which means would govern it on the supposition that the Christian professions of the peoples are not all hypocrisy and cant.

"Force is no remedy," said John Bright. Anarchists and despots should long ago have learnt so obvious a fact. He did not say that force was never necessary, but that it had no healing virtue. The strait waistcoat does not make the madman sane, it only prevents his doing harm. Garrisons and prisons cannot make a people subject and content, much less will they conciliate goodwill and amicable relations; all they can do is to repel invasion and compel submission and win new territories.

But if force is sometimes just and necessary, violence is never so. For violence is force backed up by passion, stimulated to action by malice and hatred and envy and the lust for vengeance. So violence—violence of the anarchist, or of the monarch, of the press, or of the people, of Parliament, or of the mob—is treason to our common humanity, it is a reversion to savagery, a renunciation of the higher motives which stir civilised man, an apostasy from religion, a confession of the impotence of reason, a denial of God's sovereignty, a defiance of His law.

IN view of the recent Zionist Congress it is interesting to recall a lecture delivered last December by Mr. C. G. Montefiore, as president of the Jewish Historical Society of England, and published in the Jewish Quarterly Review for January, under the title "Nation or Religious Community?" While in bygone ages Mr. Montefiore holds that the Jewish religion was helped by its nationalism, and the people were preserved by its religion, it is also a fact that the religion was harmed by its nationalist trappings and prepossessions, and the nation was, as it were, diluted and weakened by its religion.

The essential universalism of the Jewish religion unfitted it to be a purely national creed. The religion was too good and true to be the property of a single race; it was too big a thing to leave the race which carried it unaffected. It compelled the nation to be other than a nation. By its own inner power it transformed the nation into the religious community.

But the new Zionist movement, in Mr. Montefiore's view, points in a different direction. If the Jews are a nation, and determine to unite in the new movement, the development of their religion will inevitably be affected.

If the Jews were again to form a State in Palestine, it could only be on the most modern lines. The State would have to leave religion severely alone. But, while the pressure of modernity would prevent any strong revival of the religion in strictly national dress, the very existence of the State would be extremely unfavourable to the effective denationalisation of the religion as a living and spiritual force. It is not without significance that the chief continental leaders of the nationalist movement should be men who have little or no interest in the Jewish religion. That is perfectly logical.

Mr. Montefiore's own ideal, on the other hand, is that the religion, stript of all that is peculiar and separatist, may be so transformed as to take its place among the universal religions of the world. He strongly holds that Jews can be true Europeans, in all the best and most distinctive elements of European civilisation. "The marvel is how rapidly in a few decades of liberty the majority of emancipated Jews have become so closely identified in thought and feeling with the countries in which they live." And while the anti-Jewish agitation in certain countries of Europe may give only too painful justification for the nationalist counter-movement among the Jews themselves, he evidently would rather see a perfecting of the religious community that would surrender nationalism and become a wholesome leaven in countries where the way of freedom was open.

THE death of Henry Sidgwick, which occurred on Tuesday, brings a great loss to the University of Cambridge and the cause of higher education throughout the country. It is only a few weeks ago that Dr. Sidgwick was compelled by illness to resign his post as Knightsbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, which he had held since 1883. A native of Skipton, in Yorkshire, he was educated at Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge. His "Methods of Ethics," published in 1874, was followed by other admirable works on "Outlines of the History of Ethics," "Principles of Political Economy," "Elements of Politics," and "Practical Ethics." Professor Sidgwick took a prominent part in the higher education of women, and was closely associated with the founding of Newnham College, of which Mrs. Sidgwick, who is a sister of Mr. A. J. Balfour's, is now the Principal. The Daily News, in a leading article on Thursday, wrote of Dr. Sidgwick:—

He had the mind of a statesman as well as the mind of a philosopher, and those who disagreed with him were not those who least valued his judgment upon public affairs. No thinker of our time brought to bear upon current politics a more thorough knowledge, an acuter insight, or a more dispassionate love of justice and truth. . . . . A gentler, kinder, more tolerant Socrates, he was the best counsellor of youth, and the most genial companion of all ages. All those who knew him will agree that he was a perfect embodiment of that complex quality which goes by the good old name of wisdom.

MIST.

"They reckon ill who leave me out.
I am the doubter, and the doubt."
—Emerson.

MORNING mist grey
Enwrapped the earth and sea as doubt my heart;
No kindly ray
Of light had come the sullen folds to part;
Doubt of the good in man,
Doubt of the might of love,
Doubt that there's God above,
With gracious plan.

"Come in your power,
Glad beams," I prayed, "and chase these mists away
That round me lower,
And make of this sad dawn a perfect day.
Let me see good in man,
Hatred subdued by love,
Justice all wrongs above,
God's gracious plan."

Then like a dream
Melted the cloud from sea and sky and hill,
And with a gleam
Of clearer sight faith came my heart to fill,
Faith in the good in man,
Faith that there's truth above,
Faith in a God of love,
With gracious plan.

Later there came
A solemn voice, as light blazed on my heart
With sunrise flame.
"God's are the clouds that gather and that part;
God's is the good in man,
His, too, the power of love.
Justice below, above
Is His great plan."

"Didst thou not know
That God Himself was hidden in the mist,
As in the glow
That afterwards each radiant hilltop kissed?
As in the beam of faith,
So in doubt's gloomy pall
Dwelleth the Soul of all,
Breath of our breath."

RITSCHLIAN THEOLOGY.—III.

AS CRITICISED AT MANSFIELD.*

The Rev. A. E. Garvie, of Montrose, gave a course of lectures on "Ritschlian Theology" two winters ago at Mansfield College, Oxford, and these lectures, expanded and revised, have been published in a volume which well deserves to be known by all divinity students. It has, we believe, found its way to the studies of a good many ministers, and it should find its way to those of busy men who are either not able to give the time which a complete study of the subject would demand, or not eager to embark upon such a study without some previous information as to the special tracts of thought which lie before them. Mr. Garvie's book is described fairly as "an exposition and an estimate," and it must be considered the work of a friend, if not of an advocate.

It introduces the subject with a chapter on the double problem which the Ritschlian system attempts to meet—namely, whether the stress of criticism can be warded off from the vital centre of the Christian religion, and whether a social gospel can be proclaimed adequate to the needs of our age; and to this preliminary sketch are added some useful historical particulars respecting the class of writers under examination. The work then divides into two main sections, the first describing the critical side of Ritschlianism, the second its constructive side. A short but fairly adequate "estimate" of the significance and validity of the new system brings it to a close.

In the section dealing with the critical aspect of the new theology the author brings before us in turn its salient features—namely, its exclusion of "metaphysics," its rejection of "speculative theism," its condemnation of "ecclesiastical dogma," and its antagonism to religious "mysticism." The reader's attention is here mainly directed upon Ritschl's own writings, though Kaftan, Hermann, and Harnack are also brought under study—the last-named especially in connection with the relation of Ritschlians to dogma. The Mansfield scholar has much less sympathy with Ritschl's attitude towards "metaphysics" than with his attack on any rationalist philosophy that seeks to attain a knowledge of God outside of the Christian revelation. The chapters in which these philosophical views are set forth are useful as summaries of the voluminous and—as many critics have shown—not always consistent arguments of the founder of the new school; but the author's comments often reveal by implication rather than in explicit terms the differences between himself and Ritschl. These are apparently differences of temperament as well as of opinion, and it is clear that the horror of "intellectualism" which stamps the Ritschlian school has not affected Mr. Garvie to any serious extent. As regards "dogma," the author clearly thinks Professor Harnack has gone too far in the directions alike of impoverishing the original Gospel contents, and of limiting the significance of later thought in the Christian Church. It is noticeable with how much relief Mr. Garvie, speaking at Mansfield, finds that Ritschl himself was by no means as ruthless as his illustrious disciple at Berlin is in dealing with the miraculous element in the New Testament; and is it not rather significant that the author makes a point of avowing his own belief in this element?

The attack of Ritschl and his followers on "mysticism" has been deplored even by some who, in other regards, exhibit much sympathy with them. It would seem to have its origin in a determination to drive the religious mind from all its refuges until it betakes itself to the unique revelation in the "person" of Jesus. But this mode of Christian evangelising has its dangers. While we are burning our neighbours' houses our own may be on fire; and, if they, who are taught to distrust what has somehow brought them good, imbibe the lesson with an atom too much of eagerness, they may go on to distrust what we ourselves most confidently offer them. Mr. Garvie is again relieved to find that, after all that Ritschl and Hermann have said against "mysticism," there are indications in their writings that the immediate communion of spirit with Spirit was not wholly unperceived or disallowed by them. On the whole, we find, it is not on its "critical" side that the author is most disposed to regard Ritschlianism as defective.

When we turn to the "constructive" side of the system we come upon matters which lend themselves more easily to exposition and definite treatment, and Mr. Garvie's criticisms adopt a firmer tone. In the first place, Ritschl's celebrated definition of religious knowledge as consisting of "value-judgments" comes under review. As an illustration of the significance of this definition we may take a passage from Stählin:—

> In predicating deity of Christ we are, according to Ritschl, pronouncing a "value-judgment." What does this mean? Is Christ in himself, objectively considered, God? No, replies Ritschl; the predicate "deity" merely expresses the value which Christ's human, historical work has for the mind or the consciousness of the believer. . . . If deity is to be attributed to Christ, it is solely in the sense that such is the value set on him by his Church. It cannot be regarded as in any sense an attribute objectively inhering in Christ; it denotes nothing that exists objectively and independently of our consciousness. The deity of Christ exists only in us.

So far this able critic of the new theology. Other critics have seized upon this idea and have not failed to expose its dangerous implications, which are sufficiently obvious. The "theoretical-judgments" of science, however, have met with more adequate recognition in later Ritschlian works; so that Mr. Garvie is able, with his usual geniality, to defend the new theology against the most pointed attacks of some of the older school, which through its overweening wisdom has largely provoked Ritschl's revulsion to an attitude of almost perfect scepticism on objective reality. But even the author is fain to admit that the principle of "value-judgments" as the standard of religious knowledge sadly limits that knowledge, and he would find room in theology for a study of the inferences "which offer an explanation of, and give certainty," he adds, "to the contents of the value-judgments."

The "historical character of revelation" is the next point in Mr. Garvie's review; and here he finds a serious defect. The full meaning and worth of the Holy Scriptures appear to have been missed, he thinks, by the Ritschlians; though the degree of their error differs in different writers. On the one hand we have Hermann, whose work on "Communion with God" is well known to many of our readers, and who has startled some of them with his suggestion that the "inner life" of Jesus is the first means of real revelation to the sinner, and that after it imparts that certainty of God and of His love and forgiving grace which nothing else could, it opens the way to a reception of what Scripture teaches regarding "Christ's Person," the Atonement, Resurrection, Virgin-Birth, and so forth. Belief in the miracles is, in this view, a consequence of faith in Christ as an irresistible manifestation of the divine; an attitude which, as has been recently pointed out, marked a stage in the development of modern Unitarian thought.

Mr. Garvie evidently shrinks from admitting, with Harnack, the necessity of the task of detecting a "Gospel within the Gospel," an indubitable core by which the worth of surrounding material is to be judged. The task is, indeed, no easy one, and they who attempt it must be prepared for pitfalls and mindful of the seductions of personal preference. Even when the utmost care has been exercised there may be great differences as to what constitutes this inner core; Renan, Arnold, Harnack—who shall decide between such critics? Yet when Mr. Garvie speaks (p. 214) of the life of Christ as "an organic unity" of which "no feature," "no factor," "can be insignificant and valueless," he suggests a wholesale method which we are pretty sure he neither really follows nor would approve. Ever since Origen concluded that Jesus was to each and all whatever they fancied him to be for their edification, the "subjective" bias has been potent in determining what was the real and central revelation in him. The Ritschlians frankly admit this, and shape their theories accordingly. Others, of whom Mr. Garvie is one, evidently incline to the thought, to which a natural wish is parent, that Scripture provides an assurance against the weaknesses of individual opinion and the uncertainties of unverifiable "experiences." As long as Christian teaching retains its character as a theory first about Christ, and only subsequently about the relations between the soul and God, it will be necessary, we should think, in the case of most teachers, to refer in this way to the norm of the New Testament. The question of its authority and of the genuineness of its contents is another matter.

Mr. Garvie similarly finds Ritschl's doctrine of the Kingdom of God "defective"; but he naturally exhibits most concern in regard to the question as to whether the Ritschlian doctrine of the "Person and Work of Christ" is sound. His conclusions are, on the whole, reassuring to those who are not too exacting as to the terms in which "the divinity" of Christ is set forth, and who are themselves conscious of a degree of withdrawal from the extremely confident propositions of the creeds respecting the Trinity. That there are not a few in this position is generally believed. It is possible that some of these brethren, in the communions where Mr. Garvie's work is likely to have most influence, will not be greatly dismayed to find that in his endeavour to establish the principle that every predicate applicable to Christ must ultimately be applicable to believers in union with him, Ritschl has involved himself in some degree of confusion, as the author thinks. Probably St. Paul would not be altogether absolved from the charge of a similar error. It is only the purely "intellectual" teacher, himself able to distinguish exactly where the divine leaves off and the human begins, that will be free from this "defect."

Here we may leave the reader to make for himself that further study of Mr. Garvie's book which these remarks are intended to stimulate. It has been seen that the author is disposed to make the most of the Ritschlian movement, to minimise its faults and to commend its merits. If it has abandoned the New Testament standards somewhat recklessly it has left room for, and shown some signs of, advance towards what he considers a wiser attitude. If in consequence of this "arbitrary" use of the New Testament scriptures it has lost touch with the idea of Christ's Person and Work in some very important relations, if the "entirety" of the historic reality of Jesus is not yet seized, nevertheless Mr. Garvie gladly recognises that what has been apprehended is vividly and tenaciously apprehended. And if the "practical" aspect of the Christian life is exalted in Ritschlian works above the theoretical, if dominion over the "world" is regarded as of higher importance than the felt union of the soul with God through Christ, it is still a genuine Christian life that is in view, and the full-orbed richness may be reached by-and-by. Such are, in brief, Mr. Garvie's feelings in this matter. He goes on to praise the Ritschlian theology for opposing "speculative rationalism"—the philosophy which "affirms its origin in a universal and permanent reason." We expect such a philosophy will find itself none the worse by-and-by for the attacks of Ritschlianism. Already, before a dozen years have passed over the grave of its founder, the school of Ritschl shows unmistakable signs of cleavage. On the one hand are those who, from no unworthy motives, draw as close as they can to orthodoxy; on the other are the advanced guard, deniers of miracles, rigorous critics of Scripture, simplifiers of the religious life to its elements as uttered in the Sermon on the Mount. It will be interesting to see whether the left wing or the right will prove stronger. It will be more than interesting if the nett results of the new movement prove to be conservative in the best sense—not as multiplying the number of those who say "Lord, Lord," but of those who, however quickened to a sense of the divine, seek to do the will of the Father.

You find yourself occupying a given position in the world. It has its appointed duties—its special opportunities of usefulness—trials also, difficulties and temptations of its own. Take your lot as it is assigned you without murmuring. Make the best of it; and if in the eyes of men it seem unhonoured and unenviable, ennoble it by your own spirit, and work your way through it by character and honest industry to something better and happier.—J. J. Tayler.

LITERATURE.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL MAGAZINES.

Among several able papers and notices of books in the July number of Mind are two noteworthy articles on Absolute Idealism, or Hegelianism, which are of special interest to all students of the philosophy of ethics and religion. One of these articles, which is entitled "The Absolute of Hegelianism," is a most powerful impeachment of this philosophy on metaphysical grounds; while in the other article, on "The Doctrine of the Summum Bonum," it is the chief ethical implications of Hegelianism which are examined and found to lack sound psychological foundation. In the former of these papers the main contention of the author, Mr. A. K. Rogres, is that the consistent Hegelianism, which identifies reality with thought, cannot give any intelligible account of the nature of God and of His relation to the ever-changing process of physical and psychological evolution. This he shows, in the first place, by the fact that recent Hegelian writers, such as the late Professor Wallace, Professor Dewey, Mr. McTaggart, Professor Jones, Dr. Bosanquet, &c., are hopelessly at variance with one another on the question whether God or the ultimate reality is, or is not, a timeless principle, that is one in reference to whom all ideas of activity and work are wholly inapplicable. And, in the second place, Mr. Rogres insists, in opposition to Professor Dewey and others, that the Hegelian philosophy cannot without palpable inconsistency escape from the limitations of a merely subjective idealism; for that the analysis of individual thought and experience does not in the least degree directly reveal the existence of a universal or eternal consciousness, and that, therefore, if the Supreme Being is, as Theists believe, such a consciousness, the insight into His reality and His nature must be reached by an appeal to principles essentially different from those on which Absolute Idealism professes to found itself.

The other paper, which treats of the "Summum Bonum," is by Mr. Henry Sturt, of Oxford University, who in the International Journal of Ethics for April, 1898, treated of a kindred subject in a very able article on "Self-realisation as a Working Moral Principle." It is a somewhat startling fact that an Oxford tutor should boldly defend the thesis that both Aristotle and the Hegelians are fundamentally in error in one of the most important features of ethical theory; and that the current Christian conception of morality is both different from and higher than that set forth in most of the present academic text-books on ethics. Mr. Sturt begins his paper with the remark that:—

> The least observant student of the moral philosophy predominant in England just now must have noticed that its teachings are very much at variance with those of the preacher and practical moralist.

The explanation of this which is generally given is that "if the philosophers and the preachers disagree, so much the worse for the preachers. On a question of the theory of virtue the expert is to be believed." In most cases, no doubt, this would be a sound answer, but we entirely agree with Mr. Sturt that both in this and in some similar cases it is quite otherwise, for "here the facts are complicated, and we have inherited a mass of misleading theory. The instinct and experience of the practical man have been truer guides than the teaching of the schools." Mr. Sturt rejects the doctrine that Eudaemonia or personal happiness is the true test of moral principles, on the ground that when we decide that certain unselfish conduct is morally obligatory we do not mean that it satisfies some desire and so conduces to our personal happiness or self-realisation. We rise highest morally when the thought of our personal satisfaction in any form entirely vanishes, and the righteous course is taken simply because it is felt to be intrinsically good and to be enjoined upon us by an authority which we recognise as absolute and therefore unquestionable. Hence while the Hegelian moral theory and the Christian moral theory have much in common, there is this serious difference between them, that the former says that conduct is right because it brings the highest satisfaction to the agent, while the latter says that conduct is right because it is enjoined upon us by the immanent God who reveals Himself in our moral consciousness. Mr. Sturt, accordingly, says:—

> It may startle some to hear T. H. Green classed as a eudaemonist; but it is evident that he was quite captured by the fundamental doctrines of the school which he spent his life in opposing. This is too ordinary a phenomenon in the history of philosophy to cause astonishment. "The common characteristic of the good is that it satisfies some desire." "In all enacted desire self-satisfaction is sought." These two quotations suffice to stamp Green's ethical position. At the same time Green was a man of deep moral insight, and so his pages are full of truths about self-denial and devotion which are totally inconsistent with the framework of his theory.

Elsewhere Mr. Sturt brilliantly and truly says of this ethics of absolute idealism which makes morality the realisation of the social self:—

> The content of this moral system is noble; but it is totally inconsistent with the eudaemonistic presuppositions at its base. It is a well-meaning attempt to pour the new wine of modern civic devotion into the old bottles of the Hellenic ethical formulae.

We well remember Dr. Martineau, who knew T. H. Green well, and warmly admired his character and genius, expressing in the course of conversation an estimate of Green's ethical philosophy quite tantamount to the above. The following sentences from the concluding paragraph of Mr. Sturt's notable paper, express a profound truth which Oxford culture would do well to take to heart:—

> You never hear a preacher talk in this eudaemonistic way of the supreme good or undertake to tell us what it is. His language is pervaded by quite another tone. The fact is that the conceptions which lie at the root of eudaemonism are totally inconsistent with the spirit of the practical morality of the modern world. Between the ethical spirit of pagan and of Christian ages there is a most important and evident difference. . . . There is no term but "Christian" to express the general spirit of modern morality, the outcome of the centuries of moral experience and experiment which divide us from Hellenic civilisation. Now modern experience has decided that the pagan conceptions, though very important, are secondary to the others. It is the fault of eudaemonism that it reverses their relative position. Among the materialistic eudaemonists this may be explained by obtuseness to spiritual facts; among the idealistic eudaemonists by an excessive admiration for the age of Pericles. In this latter form the Summum Bonum doctrine is a recrudescence of paganism.

The ethical teaching in the International Journal of Ethics for July is of a different complexion from that of the article in Mind which we have just been considering. In an interesting lecture on "The Source of Moral Obligation," Professor J. S. Mackenzie thus expresses himself in favour of the Hegelian view:—

If the source of our moral obligations were some external law, whether of the state or of a divine power, we might learn it by rote and follow it blindly—"ours not to reason why." Or if we had simply to listen to the voice of conscience, we might afford to let our reason and all our other powers fall asleep. Or if the end were merely happiness, we might hope to reckon it out and have done with it. The idea that the source of our moral obligations is the demand for the complete realisation of human powers, is the only idea that makes incalculable demands upon us, and calls for constant wakefulness. But for beings like us, I believe that a demand of that kind is the most truly encouraging.

This passage suggests the criticism that Professor Mackenzie in no way explains how it comes about that the righteous man feels at times morally obliged to sacrifice not only the realisation of his own powers but even his own life in the cause of truth. And surely the very "demand" which we feel at times to set the claims of humanity before our own personal claims can only be described as just one of those direct intuitions of the conscience, the authority of which Professor Mackenzie has in the above passage been denying.

This number also contains a thoughtful and readable article by Professor Everett, of Brown University, on "The Relation of Ethics to Religion." He maintains that as human thought and civilisation advance religion essentially associates itself with ethics; but he denies that the converse is true, and contends that the science of ethics may be constructed independently of religious belief.

A scientific treatment of ethics [he says] seeks to find the sanctions of morality in the natural and inevitable results of the conduct itself, and to establish morality on a rational basis by exhibiting the inescapable consequences of right and wrong action, of good and evil character, as in themselves sufficient grounds for the choice of the one and the avoidance of the other.

Professor Everett appears here to forget that an adequate science of ethics has not only to explain that certain lines of conduct pay best in the long run, but it has also to explain the psychological fact that men feel an imperative obligation to do what they feel to be right; and we contend that no complete explanation of this feeling of obligation can be given which does not involve either the germ or the fully-developed form of some positive theological belief.

The first article in the Philosophical Review, by Professor James Sully, is very cheerful reading, as might be expected from its title—namely, "Prolegomena to a Theory of Laughter." Professor Sully admits that it is a somewhat puzzling business to fully realise in consciousness the genuine spirit of fun and laughter at the very moment when the mind is intent on the serious and difficult task of seeking to analyse this psychological experience, and to explain its genesis and cause. It must be admitted that our author has furnished a brilliant introduction to an important study, and has clearly indicated that the mirth of men and the directions of their jesting are not only valuable as adding to the sum of human enjoyment, but "have also a real significance as determining forces in the stability and the progress of communities." In opposition to Lord Bacon, Professor Sully declines to restrict the perception of the ridiculous to man, and says that "among all things human surely laughter ought least of all to be afraid of recognising its humble kinsfolk." There is also in this number a good paper on "Conscience and Obligation in Butler's Ethical System"; but we think that the author, Dr. A. Lefevre, is by no means successful in his attempt to show that "Butler is the first modern moralist who anticipated the cardinal truth set forth in that type of ethical thought which has received the name of the Self-realisation or the Eudaemonistic theory."

A WHITE WOMAN IN CENTRAL AFRICA.*

SINCE the days of Ida Pfeiffer the number of women who become travellers in the old romantic sense of the word—i.e., who undertake long and difficult journeys into distant and unfrequented countries for the ever delightful pleasure of seeing new lands and customs—is continually on the increase. Possessed by sane ideas of their relations to the world around them, they go forth with modest courage on their quest and attain great success, their tact and power of sympathy with the elements of humanity standing them in good stead. Africa is exercising her fascination upon them—Egypt, West Africa and the South have drawn the women in; and Central Africa can boast of its visitor who now records her experiences.

Miss Caddick left England in January, 1898, and returned home by Christmas; she had already made a considerable journey through various parts of South Africa—not narrated here—when she reached Beira on the East coast; hence she took steamer to Chinde, on one of the mouths of the Zambesi. The course of her expedition, which occupied from June to September, lay along the Zambesi and the Shiré rivers to Katunga, thence overland through Blantyre and Zomba to the southern point of Lake Nyasa. Voyaging up the "lake of storms," which took eight days for its 360 miles of length, the traveller landed at Karonga, and crossed the plateau through Fife to Kituta on the Lake Tanganyika. Here a great disappointment awaited her, the steamer was temporarily disabled and she could only go a short way on to the great lake which was the goal of her journey; she saw, however, the southern end, its mountains, its mists, and its crocodiles. On her return journey she spent some time in German Kondeland to the north of Lake Nyasa, making many excursions into a beautiful and little-known country without meeting a single European; halting at Makerere, a station at the foot of the Livingstone mountains, with her "boys" or machila bearers for a couple of days to enjoy that lovely place. Then on to Kondowe, a mission station on Lake Nyasa, to await the steamer, and so back thence to Chinde as she came. Her route thus lay for the most part through British territory and Livingstone's country, all of which only forty-five years ago was unknown to the white man.

Miss Caddick's simple and unaffected narrative, told in a clear and easy style, with occasional touches of humour, presents "aspects and incidents of native life in British Central Africa which I hope will interest and amuse those who have neither time nor inclination to travel so far. Also," declares the authoress, "I should like them to know how kind and attentive the natives, who are spoken of in England as 'savages,' can be to a lady travelling absolutely alone with them." Her spirit of cheerful confidence in the natives won their faithful service, and gave her access to many a pleasant experience among them. In the morning "they would sign for me to get into the machila (a hammock slung on a pole, in which she was carried overland), and off they went, singing and ready for all sorts of games. They were a happy set of boys, just like a lot of children, and I often wished I could talk more to them. . . . The natives have any amount of patient endurance, and also a keen sense of humour—two very excellent qualities on a journey. I invariably found them perfectly honest, and I am certain white men would not have been more careful of me or have behaved better, while they certainly would not have been so entertaining." One day when at Lake Tanganyika, while hunting for shells, she was beset by crowds of children. "I tried hard not to mind them, for I knew how queer I must seem to them; and I thought of how we Britishers, in much the same way, mob any special hero or heroine. . . . At last I put on a very grave look, and turning round slowly, almost solemnly, faced them, raised my hand, and, pointing towards their village, said, quietly but with emphasis, 'Go!' The effect was magical. They did not stop to 'go,' they simply fled, tumbling over one another in their wild haste to get away." For a time she had peace, but as they returned she made the girls show her their wire bangles and ornaments, the method of making which is described, and amused herself with them.

Of the civilised arts among the natives such as fine work in metals, the weaving of baskets that will hold liquids, and the careful building of their dwellings, we find many details in this interesting book. The authoress did not glean much as to religious observances, but she tells the following, apropos of the custom of placing the cooking utensils, calabashes, and other things of the departed on his grave. "An official once asked a native why he put such offerings of food and drink on the grave, adding, 'You know the dead cannot eat or see these things.' The native gave the excellent answer, 'Of course, we know they do not eat them, but even you don't know that they cannot see them, and are not pleased at finding that we still think of them.'"

The volume is supplied with some good illustrations, but it lacks a map to render it more complete. We must thank Miss Caddick for a very pleasant little book of old-fashioned "travels," which we hope may find many readers.

SHORT NOTICES.

IN his Economics of Distribution (a handy volume of 360 pages), Mr. J. A. Hobson has worked out a theory of the distribution of wealth, which is largely novel, and likely to prove of much practical interest. He takes Ricardo's theory of rent, and shows how that is applicable to other elements in production besides land, how the wages of the labourer or superintendent, and the profits of the capitalist or the trader may be greatly increased by elements which are strictly analogous to the rent received by the owner of land more valuable than that which is just good enough to be utilised. He has also carefully analysed the nature of the bargaining which actually determines all questions of distribution of wealth, and has given a very good account of the "forced gains" which may be won by the stronger party within certain limits of a maximum and a minimum price. He shows how largely the element of monopoly, temporary as well as permanent, enters into price. It follows that the taxation which can be laid on economic rent of land, and cannot thence be shifted by the owner, may also be laid with equal propriety and advantage on the corresponding element of "rent" in wages and profits, and the best way to do this in the interests of the whole community is an important political problem. Where there is great inequality in the strength of the two parties to a bargain, the "forced gain" accruing to the stronger side will be another appropriate fund for taxation, if it is not better to seek to promote more equality between the bargainers by some State interference. Where this cannot be done, where there is a strong monopoly whose holders cannot be made to contribute their fair share towards the welfare of the community, there is the best case for making such monopoly the property of the State. There is considerable interest in such problems as these, and Mr. Hobson takes much pains to make his meaning clear and his suggestions practical. (Macmillan and Co.)

H. SHAEN SOLLY.

The Council of Constance to the Death of John Hus is the subject of the Ford Lectures for 1900, by James Hamilton Wylie, M.A.—Mr. Wylie is known to some of our readers from his connection with our churches; to others as one of H.M.'s Inspectors of Schools, and to others again as the author of a work of immense research, the "History of Henry IV.," successive volumes of which were noticed in THE INQUIRER as they appeared. Though this work was too elaborate to become popular, it will be valued by students for a long time to come, and already has received recognition from two Universities. The University of London has adopted it as a text-book, while the University of Oxford invited its author to deliver the Ford Lectures in the present year. Hence this volume on "The Council of Constance," which we hope will introduce Mr. Wylie, as historian, to a much larger circle of readers. In a closing note, entitled "L'Envoi," Mr. Wylie refers with a certain austerity to "favourite authors," who make picturesque writing of history do duty for verification from original sources. The rebuke is well deserved, and we may hope rather than believe that it will be taken to heart by certain notorious offenders. If in "Henry IV." Mr. Wylie illustrated the opposite characteristics to those of the said picturesque writers, he has certainly succeeded in his present work in weaving together the results of independent research into a vivid narrative. Peace, faith, and virtue were the ends avowedly sought at the Council of Constance; and sorely indeed were they needed. Three rivals were contending for St. Peter's chair, chief of whom, John, was in actual possession. Of this choice vicar of Jesus Christ the President, speaking in the name of the Council, declared that he "by his wicked life and detestable ways had set an example of bad living to the world; that from his youth up he had been of evil disposition, irreverent, immodest, untruthful, disobedient to his parents, and addicted to every vice." Much more he added in a terrible and scathing condemnation, and yet this monster of iniquity received every tenderness and consideration from the very body that condemned to death John Hus, a man of irreproachable life, but of suspected orthodoxy. For the story of Hus's base betrayal by the Emperor Sigismund after the latter had promised a safe conduct, of his mock trial, of his torture and death, we must refer our readers to Mr. Wylie's pages; they are most impressive. Little wonder that a council which could be guilty of such a crime as the murder of Hus in the interests of faith, forsooth, should have postponed the remaining object of its meeting—Virtue. For the Emperor knew "that they would have to begin," as he said, "not with the minorities, but with the majorities, otherwise it would only be a case of the big thieves harrying the little thieves, while Peter's stomach could only be really purged by getting the twenty-three Cardinals, 300 Archbishops and Bishops, and the same number of curials, and dropping them altogether for three days into the Rhine." The world—even the ecclesiastical world, usually the last to reform itself—has progressed since those days, and though Church Councils still meet it may safely be said that the scandals of Constance will never be repeated. Joey and Louie; or, the Fairy's Gift, by Edith A. Gibbs, is a story for children who enjoy fanciful fairy tales. Two small children, steeped in fairy lore, are bent on escaping one moonlight night into the dark fir-wood above the cottage where they are staying in the country, in order to get into communication with the wonderful little people. How they manage to escape is vividly told, although in the end it proves to have been only the boy's dream, for they could not keep awake; and the rest of the story tells of his wonderful adventures. A shorter story, "Pickles," is added to complete the volume, with a wholesome moral in the sketch of a boy's skating adventure. The little book has four good illustrations. (Partridge and Co. 1s.).

OBITUARY.

ALDERMAN ELLIS, J.P.

OUR churches have sustained a heavy loss in the death of Mr. Alderman Charles Ellis, J.P., of Maidstone, which occurred on Sunday afternoon last. Mr. Ellis was the son of Mr. Alderman Chas. Ellis, J.P., and his wife Catherine, a daughter of the Rev. Abraham Harris, some time minister of Earl-street Chapel, Maidstone, and was born on Dec. 26, 1823. He was for forty years a member of the Town Council, and for twenty-eight years an Alderman. He was three times elected Mayor. The late Alderman was a man of very high character, of remarkable ability and of great resolution, and played a conspicuous and uniformly beneficent part in the life of the town. He was in his time Chairman of the Waterworks, Guardian of the Poor, Director of the Kent Friendly Society, Founder and Captain of the Fire Brigade, a Rochester Bridge Warden, several times being Chairman, Senior Justice of the Peace, Governor of Boys' and Girls' Grammar Schools, Treasurer of School of Art, Hon. Secretary and afterwards President of the Mechanics' Institution and later associated with the Technical Institute, Member of the Burial Board, Chairman of the Sanitary Authority, Member of the Kent County Council, Chairman of the Cutbush Charity, and a Trustee of Fisher's, Duke's, and Emett's Charities.

The mere recital of these activities is sufficient to indicate with what energy he devoted himself to the public work of Maidstone. The deceased Alderman was, however, in addition, for many years leader of the Liberal party in the Borough, and was always a warm supporter of Mr. Gladstone. His labours were recognised on more than one occasion. The two great municipal undertakings with which he was most notably identified were the system of Main Drainage, which cost upwards of £30,000, and the new bridge which now spans the Medway. On the opening of the latter in his third Mayoralty, the late Alderman was presented with the Ellis Cup, a fine specimen of the silversmith's art, which now forms part of the Corporation plate. In 1881 he was entertained at a public banquet and presented by his personal and political friends with a testimonial consisting of a silver epergne, with four dessert stands, "in token of their esteem for his private and public worth, and to mark their sense of his valuable services to the town and his devotion to Liberal principles.

Amongst the subscribers were Sir Sydney Waterlow, Sir John Lubbock (Lord Avebury), and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. The latter, who as a near neighbour knew Mr. Ellis well and esteemed him highly, wrote of him on this occasion in the following terms:—"As a politician and an active member of the Liberal party, I know few men to compare to him. The soundness and thoroughness of his opinions, his loyalty to Liberal principles, his sagacity, his perfect straightforwardness, his energy, his cheery manner—I cannot go over the circle of his qualities; but they make him a model politician." Mr. Ellis was a life-long member of the Earl Street (Unitarian) Chapel, and was widely known and deeply respected throughout the denomination, but especially, of course, in the home counties.

Notwithstanding his many public duties, Mr. Ellis, by his wide reading, made himself familiar with the best thought of the time, and he was thus a man of culture in the truest sense of the term. He was a gracious host, as all will testify who have been privileged to be his guests, and his place will not easily be filled. Of him it may indeed be said that, "He feared God and worked hard," and has left an example which those who come after will do well to emulate. The interment took place on Wednesday last, the funeral service being conducted by the Rev. Harold Rylett, a former minister of Earl Street Chapel.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I told you last week how I had had the pleasure of going in one of the largest ships across the Atlantic to the United States, and I think, perhaps, you may like to take a peep at one or two pictures in my Memory Gallery. The one I want to show you to-day is of a city about ninety miles south-west of New York, where our good ship, Ivernia, had landed us. If you will get out your map of the United States and look just where I have told you the city stands, you will easily find it—Philadelphia, the third largest city in the States, so the guide-book says. You will notice that it lies between two rivers, so that ships can easily bring and take away goods; that, of course, gives it an excellent position for business, and partly explains why it is such an important place. Two hundred and twenty years ago there was no city there at all; but in 1682 the good Quaker, William Penn, bought the ground from the Indians, with whom he was on very friendly terms, and he began to map out the town. You have seen that there is a river along each side; so the first thing to be done, he thought, was to make a road across from one to the other to join the two. Then a Broad-street was made along the whole length of the town, and thus these two streets formed a cross. People flocked to the new city, and streets were added, and always set at right angles to each other; so that if you look at a plan of Philadelphia it seems to be almost like a chess-board. All the streets across are 1st or 2nd, 3rd, 4th, &c., streets, while those lengthways, parallel with Broad-street, have other names, many being called after trees, such as Chestnut, Walnut, Spruce, and Pine. We found the numbering of the houses a little perplexing at first; fancy being told to go to No. 2364; how easily one might make a mistake, and what a long time it would be before we could find our friends if we had done so; but when we were told that the numbers on each cross street began with a fresh hundred, instead of starting altogether again; so that the 2364 house meant the 64th house in the 23rd street, it seems to be a simpler arrangement than we had thought at first.

This chess-board method of arranging towns is frequently used in the States, and when once understood it makes it much easier for getting about; though the tramcars and omnibuses have a way of twining in and out until you wonder where you have got to sometimes.

There are many grand buildings in Philadelphia, and just at the crossing point of Penn's two roads there are some fine City buildings (Town Hall, &c.), on the top of which is a statue of Penn himself. But the building that I want to speak of—the one which all true Americans must love to visit, most of all, I think—is a plain brick building, with a little steeple, which, however, was not there originally. This is called Independence Hall; and it was here that the thirteen "United Colonies," which had hitherto belonged to England, declared themselves to be henceforward "Free and Independent States," on the memorable July 4, 1776—henceforth to be styled United States. The Union flag had on it thirteen stars—one for each of the States who had joined—and thirteen stripes; emblems, it is said by some, of the stripes they had received in the past, and of their springing up like new stars in the heavens now that their freedom was assured. Each time that a fresh State joined the Union another star and another stripe was added. The rooms are kept, so far as possible, in the same state as when the congress assembled there to sign the document, which, to the American citizen of to-day, stands for his charter of Liberty. As we walked through the rooms one could almost feel the heart-throbs of the past, and there on the walls were many pictures and portraits, each with its special reminder. Most of these were named, but presently we came upon a portrait without any such mark. We wondered whose it was, and why there was no name attached; but passing on we found others evidently of the same man—usually in soldier's garb—and still no word to tell who he might be. Then we found out that these were portraits of George Washington, he who, from his magnificent devotion to the cause, came to be called the father of his country; and when we know this we understood that his children did not need to be told whose portrait it was.

Later on we visited the beautiful city of Washington, named after this beloved leader and first President; and everywhere we came across tokens of the love and reverence in which his memory is still held. And it seemed to me that, though his leading of the army and his wise administration were quite sufficient to have won him fame, the real hold he had on the affections of the people was even more the result of what he gave up. For having spent his best efforts for his country, and having served as President for three years, he might naturally have expected some great reward in worldly honours. And these his country would have willingly accorded him; indeed, he was begged to allow himself to be re-elected President, but he refused. The question of length of service had been discussed, he said, and it had been thought best for the country that there should be a change every three years, and, therefore, he adhered to his decision to resign. So George Washington gave up his state and went back to live in his modest house at Mt. Vernon, near the capital, and he remained there leading a quite peaceful life until his death, only once coming back for a short time into public life when there seemed likely to be danger from a foreign foe. Such an example of doing service and hoping for nothing again is as beautiful as it is rare, and his country may well honour and love such a man. One morning we went by steamer a few miles up the Potomac river to visit Mt. Vernon. One white-haired negro showed us over part of the grounds, and when we entered the house a tall fat negress was presiding over a bowl of new milk, ready to ladle it out for anyone who wished to have a glassful. Some years ago it was found that the house had been neglected, and so the women of the various States agreed to have it put in proper repair; old-fashioned furniture was procured, and all the rooms were furnished exactly according to the style used in the time of George Washington, so we could really fancy we were back in the last century.

But you may ask, Why did the States want to be free from England? We are good friends to our Colonies, and our Colonies are good friends to us—why separate? Well, the story of the War of Independence is a sad one in many ways, and we were not quite wise in those times, and, indeed, we still have much to learn. To me that which happened seems rather like what happens in a family sometimes; when the sons and daughters are no longer children, if parents are unwise and forget that the time of childhood is past, they are apt to impose restrictions and conditions that are too irksome to be borne, and after some painful scenes the grown-up sons and daughters separate themselves from the home nest. It was in some such way that our break came with America. But just as in families, when Time has helped to heal the breach, when the memories of old love and friendship overcome all bitterness of feeling, and hearts are once more drawn together, so with the people of the once United Colonies—now United States—it was quite beautiful to note the underlying tenderness for everything belonging to the Mother-country that was constantly being made manifest, and we rejoiced to feel that we were at one in heart as in ancestry with so many of our American cousins. At the same time we have to remember that there are many more than thirteen stars on the flag now, and many more nations uniting with our own in peopling the New World. This mixture of races makes many difficulties, of course; but in that very fact may lie the future power of bringing a sense of universal brotherhood between all nations and all races. May these things be!

Marian Pritchard.

It is a true saying, however hard to a stoic's self-reliance, that it is beyond the power of man to lift himself; he can only prevent himself from sinking. It is not we that set the lights before us at which we aim; they gleam upon us from beyond us, if not by the immediate gift of God; and our part is complete if we keep our eye intent to see them, and our foot resolute to climb whither they show us the way. The beacon aloft is given; the path to reach it alone is found.—James Martineau.

Much is said in regard to building castles in the air, and one who is given to this building is not always looked upon with favour. But castles in the air are always necessary before we can have castles on the ground, before we can have castles in which to live. The trouble with the one who gives himself to building castles in the air is not that he builds them in the air, but that he does not go further and actualise in life, in character in material form, the castle he thus builds. —Ralph Waldo Trine.

JOWETT'S RELIGIOUS TEACHING.

BENJAMIN JOWETT, for more than twenty years Master of Balliol, and for nearly sixty years closely associated with his college and with Oxford, was a teacher whose striking personality must have a strong attractive interest even for those who never saw his face, because of the profound influence he is known to have exerted upon those who were his pupils and his friends. The life of the late Master of Balliol has been admirably written, and the book was fully noticed at the time of its appearance in these columns. The purpose of the present article is to call attention to another memorial, much more limited in its scope, but none the less worthy of its subject, and of special interest as the fruit of a pupil's reverence and gratitude. In the preface to his Hibbert Lectures in 1892, Mr. C. G. MONTEFIORE referred to the Master of Balliol, expressing the hope that he had approached the subject of his lectures "in the spirit of one to whom in matters of religion I owe more than to any other living man." That was in the year before JOWETT'S death. In this year's January number of the Jewish Quarterly Review Mr. MONTEFIORE published an article, filling seventy-eight closely-printed pages, on "The Religious Teaching of Jowett," in which he gathered up a large number of passages of the deepest interest from the Master's writings, with only so much commentary as to explain his purpose and to complete a very attractive picture of his teacher, as a man of profound thought and of the most sincere religious life.

Mr. MONTEFIORE'S selections are made from JOWETT'S "Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans," his contribution to "Essays and Reviews," the Introductions to his translation of the Dialogues of Plato, the letters and notes quoted in the Life, the two volumes of "College Sermons," and "Sermons Biographical and Miscellaneous," and also other sermons published at the time of their delivery in various Oxford journals. A promised third volume of "Doctrinal Sermons" Mr. MONTEFIORE was not able to use, and therefore contemplates a probable enlargement and amplification of his article, if it should be republished as a book, after the appearance of that volume—a purpose which we must hope may be accomplished at no very distant date. What we propose here is simply to quote some of the most striking of the extracts, to show how great is the wealth to be found in the article itself.

JOWETT'S religion Mr. MONTEFIORE describes as "a Christian Theism," but belonging partly to a sphere "where the purer Judaism and the purer Christianity fade into each other, where the accuracy of labels becomes doubtful, and differences merge into a higher and more Catholic unity." His Theism was simpleand profound, holding firmly to the essential things; simple, "not in its remoteness from life, but in its direct appeal to the heart, to the mind, and to the will." The positive side of the Master's teaching, Mr. MONTEFIORE thinks, is too little known and appreciated. He is too often regarded simply as a sceptic, but what appears to be scepticism was in reality a fearless penetrating to the abiding realities. "The intense piety of the man, his deep religious fervour, his unshaken faith in the divine escaped notice. Yet these were the greatest realities of his nature and character."

Fully aware of the difficulties which beset our thought of GOD, JOWETT yet remained a firm believer in the divine authorship of the world and of the human mind. Grappling with those difficulties he thus expresses his faith :—

We are far from saying that we know nothing of him, because all that we know is subject to the conditions of human thought. To the old belief in him we return, but with corrections. He is a person, but not like ourselves; a mind, but not a human mind; a cause, but not a material cause, nor yet a maker or artificer. The words which we use are imperfect expressions of his true nature; but we do not therefore lose faith in what is best and highest in ourselves and in the world. "A little philosophy takes us away from God; a great deal brings us back to him." When we begin to reflect, our first thoughts respecting him and ourselves are apt to be sceptical. For we can analyse our religious as well as our other ideas; we can trace their history; we can criticise their perversion; we see that they are relative to the human mind and to one another. But when we have carried our criticism to the furthest point, they still remain a necessity of our moral nature, better known and understood by us, and less liable to be shaken, because we are more aware of their necessary imperfection. They come to us with "better opinion, better confirmation," not merely as the inspirations either of ourselves or of another, but deeply rooted in history and in the human mind.

How this faith of JOWETT'S was related to the life of prayer may be seen from the following passage :—

The advantage of public worship is that it is also private: any reasonable act of devotion may form part of it; we may offer up to God our studies, entreating him to give us the power so to use our natural talents that they may be the instruments of his service. We may consecrate to him our business, praying that the gains which we make may be employed in his service, and sometimes devising plans of charity or philanthropy. We may review our faults, begging him to take from us all vanity, levity, sensuality, and to infuse into us a new mind and character. . . . Or, once more, we may ask of him to illumine our minds with the spirit of truth, with fairness and judgment, with accuracy and clearness, that in some way, whether by teaching or writing, we may assist in the education of mankind; so many topics of thought are there on which we may reflect and at the same time wish, for prayer is a time for wishing and thinking, not as some imagine a mere enthusiasm, or act of prostration, but requiring the highest exercise of the intellect as well as the deepest affection of the heart. God does not demand of us that we should lie down before him, like worms crawling in the sunshine, but that with our reason, the highest of his gifts, we should seek to recognise the truth of his nature—that we should watch what experience teaches about his modes of dealing with us—that we should turn again to that image of himself, transcending experience, which he has set in the human heart.

Of CHRIST he spoke in a sermon of 1882 as follows :—

Christ has a greater witness than the witness of men. He feels that God is his witness. Without God he could not have lived such a life, or died such a death. To those who say, "Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us," he only replies, "I am the manifestation of the Father." Righteousness witnesses to itself, but it has also the witness of God. The Jews said, "This is blasphemy," and so it was for Simon Magus, or any other false prophet, who had no truth in him, to declare that he was the "great power of God." But it was not blasphemy for Christ, feeling in his own soul the love of God, the truth of God, the righteousness of God, feeling that in all his words, works, thoughts, he was reflecting the will of God, to declare himself one with God. The creed tells us that he was "equal to the Father as touching his godhead, inferior to the Father as touching his manhood." But is it not more intelligible to us and more instructive to think of him as one with God, because Christ and God are one with righteousness and truth? Christ does not so much assume to be God as he naturally loses himself in God.

JOWETT was strongly convinced that a living faith is attained only through practical faithfulness. "If you begin," he once said, "by seeking to do the will of God, more and more of His will shall be revealed to you. You shall live more and more in the light of His presence. You shall see Him as He is, not disfigured by the traditions of men, and His grace shall be perfected in you." And Mr. Montefiore gives a number of extracts, which show how practical his teaching was, including in its scope every aspect of daily life. There are some beautiful references to the relative duties of masters and servants, and we are reminded how, in his college sermons, he dealt with such common-place subjects as the duty of keeping accounts, shyness, conversation, eating and drinking, but so as to make it clear that such subjects could be transfigured with a religious light. As an instance, a passage from the end of the sermon on "Conversation" is quoted:—

The apostle St. Paul, after attempting to make rules and to draw distinctions about meats and drinks, finally sums up the conclusion in the following words:—"Whether we eat or drink, let us do all to the glory of God." And so, leaving the niceties of self-observation, we too may say, "Whatever we utter, whether in jest or earnest, let us speak only to the glory of God; let our tongue still be employed in his service." We cannot always have the thought of God present to us, but we may feel in our intercourse with others some restraining influence, some inspiring power, coming we know not whence. When we suppress the egotistical remark, the ill-natured story, the weak comparison of ourselves with others, the impure imagination, although we do not expressly refer our words to him, we may be truly said to speak unto the Lord and not to man. When we regard truth more than the entertainment of the company, when we seek to do justice to others and feel kindly towards them, then, although in a limited and imperfect manner, we reflect his attributes. When there is peace and goodwill in a society, there he is in the midst of them; when there is joy on earth, then in a figure there is joy too in heaven.

And, finally, we must give one more extract, from the sermon on "The Joys and Aspirations of Youth":—

And now for the words "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth," I will venture to substitute other words, "Rejoice, whether young or old, in the service of God"; rejoice in the beauty of this world, in its fair scenes, in its great interests, in the hope and promise of knowledge. Rejoice in the thought of another life to which as we grow older we are drawing nearer. Rejoice in the companionship and affection of others, in the home to which no place can compare, in the friends whom nothing but death can part. Rejoice if the dead, more happy than the living, not as the Preacher says because they are without sense, but because "they are in the hands of God, and there shall no evil touch them." Rejoice in the work which God has given us to do here, knowing that it is His work, and the preparation for a higher, which we shall carry on far beyond what we are capable of thinking or imagining at present. Rejoice that we have got rid of the burden of selfishness, and egotism, and conceit, and those littlenesses and meannesses, which drag us down to earth, that our consciences are as the noonday clear, that we do not willingly allow ourselves in any sin. Rejoice that we are at peace, and can be resigned to the will of God, whatever it may have in store for us. Rejoice that we can live no longer for ourselves, but for God and our fellow men. Rejoice, too, in the truth, whatever that may be, which is slowly unveiling itself before our eyes, for God is truth, and every addition to truth is an addition to our knowledge of Him. He will purge away the mists that environ us, and give us clearness, and "the mind through all her powers irradiate." Rejoice last of all in the love of Christ, who gave himself for us, and in the love of all other men who, bearing his image, have sacrificed themselves for the good of others. And, to sum up all, in the language of the apostle, "Rejoice in the Lord always: and again I say, Rejoice."

WHAT THE AVERAGE TEACHER MAY DO.*

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

II.

But even this arrangement of Sunday-school time leaves the teacher half-an-hour to fill, and, of course, if he be a teacher above the average he can fill that half-hour, and yet not much more. At least, if his scholars—even young men—be only average, he can't fill them with much more than what he can put into them in an active half-hour.

Still there is the average teacher who—except occasionally—finds twenty minutes long enough. What of him or her?

Well, when I come to my final and, as I think, my most important point, you will quickly see how much of this extra ten minutes which is troubling us can be well and wisely used.

At present, remember, we are concerned with the lessons which the average teacher can give. And, with the average teacher and scholar in my mind, I want to speak up once again for a good old method which was abandoned, because carried to an extreme in the past—as good things are apt to be just because they are so good, until there comes a reaction and we are apt to throw the good thing, along with its abuse, utterly away. I refer to the custom of memorising, or "learning by heart," as our fathers and mothers called it. I have heard all the stock arguments against this, and have, as far as I can, duly weighed and tested them; and they do not alter the result of my experience. Would not most of us, if we had our own time to come over again, take some trouble to store our memories and thus furnish our minds with more of the great words of Poet and Prose-Writer, of Psalm and Gospel, of Prophet and Apostle? For these things, learned in childhood and youth, become, as has been said, not merely "memory gems but memory germs," which grow with our growth, and unfold new depths of help and inspiration, as the experiences of life enable us more and more to understand the great things stored up within our memories in childhood and youth.

Long since I have given up the notion that you must only teach a child what he fully understands. At that rate you would have to teach him next to nothing. Moreover, how do you know what he does or does not understand? I believe a child often understands as much as a man, especially in spiritual things; and all the more so when you don't confuse him by an intellectual explanation. "Do you understand now?" demanded a mother from her boy to whom she had read and then explained a great poem. "No, mother," said he, "I'm afraid I don't now; and yet I did before you explained!"

Let me then advise the average teacher to spend some of the time every Sunday in this menory work with your scholars. Don't attempt a great deal. And you yourself do all that you ask his scholars to do. Whatever you choose for learning let it be worth learning. It is as easy to learn grand words as it is to learn trivial ones. As you would not hang any daub in your drawing-room, do not dare to hang any trash within the palace chamber of a child's memory, or your own. A good hymn (by instalments), a noble verse of Scripture, a few lines of some true poet, a golden sentence from some spiritual teacher—make your choice among these (and if you cannot trust yourself ask somebody's help). In any case make the treasured words your very own, by taking them into your own heart first and loving them; then teach them, in your own way, to the children. They will understand sufficiently if you teach reverently. Some day—though not now—they will stay themselves, in danger, in temptation, in sorrow, in sickness, in misfortune, and in death—as I have seen both men and women do—on these memorised words, especially of hymns and Scripture, which they once "learned by heart" in the Sunday-school class.

Time fails me to go into further details on this point, as to the children learning the words at home as well as with you at school, and as to getting whatever words you teach them so engraved upon their memories, or I would rather say so engrafted in their minds and hearts, that if you ask for the words at any time, almost if you woke them from their sleep, they should remember them and love to remember them, not only for what the words mean but for the happy and sacred associations in which you enshrined them. My point, you recollect, is that this is a kind of Sunday-school work—and very important work too—which any average teacher can do. And, as you see, that extra ten minutes which we did not know what to do with will all be taken up by this memory work. My own opinion is that it is best to begin your class work with these repetitions. This gives you that point of contact which average teachers often find difficult to get, but without which your lesson is not likely to go well. In other words, this opening memory work together puts you and the scholars mentally in touch with each other at the outset, and then they are ready for your lesson. So you slip into your twenty-minutes' lesson. If you can link on your lesson to the sentiment or idea contained in the words you have been learning together, so much the better. And this, of course, can easily be done if your lesson be from the Bible,

* A lecture delivered at the Summer School for Teachers, in Manchester College, Oxford, on Friday, July 13.

Whether it be one of the lovely old Genesis stories, or a psalm, or a parable, you can usually, with some care, select a verse which contains the central thought or the leading idea. Let this be learned first by the whole class, and said together (quietly) and, in some cases, separately. That verse learned by all, you can go on with the reading of the story, the psalm, or the parable, to, at least, some helpful purpose. Even if you are not able to explain every phrase in the reading, or elucidate the full meaning of each verse, you, at any rate, have that governing note—that central thought or leading idea contained in the text learned—you have that to guide you and your class in understanding the chapter you read. Nay, if you and your scholars go from school that afternoon with nothing in your minds but just those golden words you have learned together, you may have done them more moral and spiritual good than if you had been clever enough to have entered into a critical examination of each line and paragraph, and clean forgotten that greater thing, the sense of God in the soul of children, which even the average teacher can appeal to and can so use Scripture as to give wondrous power to his appeal.

Need I say, in this presence, that no teacher can know the Scriptures too well, either critically, historically, or in any other way. If he possessed all Mr. Carpenter's vast and varied knowledge of the Bible he would not know too much. The more a teacher knows of the Scriptures, if he is a wise man, the more reasonably and reverently and helpfully will he interpret their great lessons to old and young. But I want the average teacher to feel that the moral and spiritual lessons of the Bible are the best which any—even the highest—teacher can ever give, and that, in his measure, it is just these lessons which the average teacher can give by the method I have suggested, And do not forget that it is better in one day to fix one great living truth in the minds of your scholars than it is to daze them with a mass of explanations and opinions, however true.

One other word to the average teacher on this matter of lessons I must not forget. It is this: Whatever subject you are taking, give your scholars plenty to do in the course of the lesson. Do not treat them as buckets into which you pour, pour, pour, and they remain silent and still. Let them co-operate with you. They like to be in at it actively. Ask them questions. Never talk long without asking them about it, and see if they are taking it in. Let them say something separately and together. Or get them to write something down. Make use of pictures and objects. Invent ways by which your scholars—and especially the lively ones—may share in the lesson. Only take care that everything you utilise does tend to the teaching. Always keep clearly in mind that it is the lesson, and not the mere activity, which is the main thing; and utilise activity only in so far as it advances the lesson. "How many bad boys does it take to make a good one?" asked a teacher, half in fun; and the troublesome boy himself answered with a smile, "Only one, if you know how to treat him!"

And this brings me to that final and crowning thing which an average teacher can do. I might have put it first, for it comes first. But it also comes last, and ought to come all the way through a teacher's connection with his class. It is this: The average teacher can easily be the friend of his (or her) scholars. "I had a friend" was the master secret of Charles Kingsley's life, to which fact he attributed all that was good in him. And the same is true in millions of other lives. More good is wrought by friendship than this world dreams of. God has made it so. Almost the dearest thing anyone here possesses at this moment is friendship or a friend. Think now of your scholars. In their human hearts also is that divine hunger, "I need a friend." Are you somewhat older than they? That is an advantage to them. Are you socially a little above them? That may be all the better too. They believe that you are wiser and better than they, and to be believed in and trusted in this way is a moral and spiritual education to yourself. Were I to tell you of some of the blessed results of true friendship between teacher and scholars, beginning in school and lasting till death, you would almost feel that the best work of the Sunday-school had been accomplished by such friendship. There is no sin in desiring to be well thought of. And I have never yet seen any surer or more lasting way of winning the love and gratitude of those you work for than that of being the friend and teacher of Sunday-school scholars.

And it is so easy to be on friendly terms with your scholars. Only you must be really friendly. There must be no such thing as force on one side and fear on the other. And there must be no patronising or condescending in the matter. Moreover, the friendship must not be merely general—that is with a class as a whole. Have a friendly word or two with each of your scholars individually, if you can. You will find what a difference it makes. He becomes yours, you become his, by a personal tie. And don't confine all this to Sundays. A real friend is a friend all the week through. True friendship does not depend on day or dress.

As to details of how to do these things, few directions are needed when once the average teacher's heart has got to work. Friendship finds its own way of expressing itself, and, what is equally important, of fostering and caring for itself. As the old Scripture has it: "He that would have friends must make himself friendly." Even truest friendship requires consideration, forethought, tact, and life.

For example, even if it be only once a year, it is a good thing to invite your scholars to your own house. If your house is not big enough, it is the next best thing to have them by themselves at the school in a social way on a week evening.

Equally good is it in the summer to make a little garden party for your scholars, if you have a lawn, or a friend will lend you one. It is good to go for a country ramble together—you and your scholars alone. As a rule, it is not good, or it is not quite the best, to invite a lot of others to these parties or meetings between you and your scholars. The parties should be special to you and them if they are to serve the special purpose of knitting more closely and more finely the friendly bonds that bind you together. Many classes that I know have a picnic or excursion with their teacher at least once a year, going off by wagonnette or railway to some chosen place. This costs money; for each scholar, as a rule, pays his or her own way. The money has been previously saved for the purpose, at anything a week which any scholar can afford. For months the teacher acts as banker, and receives the small deposits of the scholars each Sunday. This paying in and booking is often done during that school half hour we spoke of, and takes up some of that ten minutes over-plus of time. It sometimes leads to a little talk about the places already visited, or about the place they are going to visit. Yes and there may be an ethical, certainly a social, yea, at times even a spiritual education in all this. Clearly these are very practicable means whereby the friendly feelings between teacher and scholar can be helpfully exercised, and, however feeble his actual twenty minutes' lesson may be, that average teacher is no failure who, towards his scholars, even in these ways, succeeds in being their trusted friend.

So to the average teacher I want to say: Lift up your heart. Go on with your work. Improve it all you can. But believe that, such as it is, your work is good; the kingdom of goodness is the better for what you do; and what you do is not unrecognised.

I remember reading recently in an American paper an editorial on "The Patience of Sunday-school Teachers," which elicited my sympathy. It seemed to me to apply especially to the average teacher. Speaking of such a teacher the editor said: "'He is told how ignorant he is, how neglectful of his opportunities, how unsystematic and unscientific, and how meagre are the results of his efforts.' He not only takes it all in good nature, but goes where he can hear more, hoping that thereby he may get some hints whereby he may improve. No one rates him any lower than he does himself. He is criticised by ministers who never have made a success of teaching themselves, by professional teachers who can be equalled only as one devotes his whole time to his art, by theorists who never have taught, but who know better than anyone else just how to teach! Buffeted from all sides the [average] teacher goes on with his work, conscientiously doing the best he can, and succeeds in doing more for the Kingdom than many of his critics."

Now note the words in which this article concludes:—

"The world does not furnish a better illustration of Christian charity than the faithful Sunday-school teacher. He 'beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.' And, though he goes weeping into the broad and often wintry fields of common life, bearing precious seed, he will doubtless come again with rejoicing, bearing his sheaves with him. Some day he will himself be transfigured with the glory of his harvest."

No man, woman or child can tell how much may grow out of their present fidelity. Perhaps it may be our chief judgment in the other world to see how much has grown out of our unfaithfulness.—W. H. Channing.

VEGETARIANISM.

SIR,—May I pass a few remarks on the Rev. W. G. Tarrant's article in this week's INQUIRER. He appears to feel some sympathy for "our poor relations," as he calls them (I prefer the term little brothers and sisters), but his sympathy amounts to less than one is led to expect. For my own part I read his paper with pleasure, lured on by hope, but disappointment was my reward. I had fondly hoped that the outcome would be an earnest plea for the sparing of life—in other words, an advocacy of vegetarianism. It seems strange that so merciful a conclusion should remain quite outside Mr. Tarrant's philosophy! Perhaps like many another he believes the fleshpot to be essential to the scheme of things domestic. But had he been so blessed as to come in contact with the charming verb "to vegetare," and studied its full significance, he would have known that the truest and best economy goes with a diet drawn from the products of the earth. To the question, "What do you vegetarians eat?" those who have come out from the land of bondage (the atmosphere of butchers' bills, cruelty and disease) reply, "All food stuffs that can be obtained without the shedding of blood or infliction of pain." Cereals, with fruit, nuts, eggs, milk, butter, and of common vegetables—these contain everything man's body needs. By this mild system mental and bodily vigour are preserved, and all desire for strong drink is allayed. It is well known that meat has a tendency to stimulate, it therefore creates thirst, hence alcohol is oftener used by flesh-eaters than by vegetarians. Indeed, it is an indisputable fact that vegetarianism and total abstinence go hand in hand.

I will only add that it is a pity so few of our Unitarians will take any interest in this subject—vegetarianism—but perhaps time will bring about a change. Surely now that temperance has at last forced itself to the front, against heavy odds, we may hope for this reform also.

Information respecting vegetarianism, including some simple recipes, can be had from the Secretary, Vegetarian Federal Union, 16, Farringdon-street, London, E.C. (Free literature.)

Aug. 26. RUTH MILLS.

SIR,—Mr. Tarrant has ably set forth the fact that the animals to a large extent share our common lot, and rejoice in the same mysterious life as ourselves. He has pleaded well for a large measure of consideration and kindness in our dealings with the sub-human races, and a better appreciation of the part they play in the drama of existence, but he has left untouched the one question which naturally suggests itself to every reader of his article, the question which is now agitating the hearts and minds of many of our most earnest men and women—viz., Shall we continue to give our countenance and support to the torture and premature death of millions of sensitive creatures in order that men may indulge in a food which is certainly not essential to human existence; in brief, Shall we eat our poor relations?

Cruelty to a tram-horse or a donkey is bad, and every right-minded man and woman is bound to denounce such wherever found; cruelty also in connection with so-called sport or science is an evil which deserves continued reprimand; but the sum-total of all the brutality of the streets, the hunting-field, and the laboratory is a mere drop in the bucket compared with the hell of suffering inflicted and endured in cattle markets, cattle-trains, cattle-ships, and slaughter-houses.

People who know the business only in theory speak and write under the conviction that cruelty is not essential to the preparation of animals for food, they hear of "improved methods of transit," and "painless execution of cattle," and imagine that it is only necessary for the present or the improved law to be put in operation and all such cruelty would vanish. The thing is impossible; improve cattle-ships as you will the sea transit of cattle will always be a martyrdom, and even in this direction the limit is soon reached beyond which improvement means a prohibitive price in the finished product which spells loss of trade. Greener cattle-killers are better than the pole-axe, but they cannot prevent the doomed animal scenting the blood of former victims, and being filled with terror as it is forced to the place of murder. At Chicago, the preparation of animal flesh has been reduced to a science, and as a matter of fact animals there are daily flayed alive; one might quote pages of testimony of eye-witnesses (flesh-eaters too) who agree that the amount of suffering is altogether indescribable. The larger the demand for "meat" (misused word) the more certain the increase of animal suffering; already complaints are loud as to the price of this dearest form of food, but every fresh consideration for the victims, every new legal restriction, means an addition to the price per pound.

Even if the hope that cruelty was an incident in the food supply that was destined soon to be removed were true, there still remains the question: Have we any right to kill our "poor relations," save in actual self-defence? Surely they enjoy their life, surely also they cling to it as tenaciously as we to ours, and if it is true that only earth-life is given to them, there is every reason that they should be allowed their full share of what is evidently so precious, and so it is within the range of probability that in the sight of God he that killeth an ox is as he that killeth a man.

About one-half the population of the earth is engaged in demonstrating that health and vigour can be sustained on a diet in which the flesh of animals is excluded; in our own country hundreds of men and women are daily disproving the fallacy that vegetarianism is impossible in this latitude, men and women foremost in very department of life and bearing no small share in the world's active work. In the ministry of the Free or Unitarian Churches are over a dozen abstainers from the cannibalistic habits of the majority of their fellows, and when it is known that of their company are such strenuous workers as James C. Street and Alexander Webster it need not be feared that humanity in diet spells physical or mental weakness.

A change of diet seems to some little less than a revolution, and in point of fact such it is, but a revolution which is easily brought about. Fears of the effect of a sudden change in this direction are groundless; once a man is convinced that he has no right to kill and eat his "poor relations" the course before him is plain enough and not really difficult. Bread and butter are sufficient to sustain life (brown bread, of course), and such food even, though monotonous, would (I am dealing with an extreme case) be infinitely preferable to a banquet bought at the cost of innocent blood.

Those who pity the over-driven tram horse will surely not be indifferent to the fate of their relatives, the down-trodden and unfortunate members of their own family. The awful degradation of human life involved in connection with the slaughtering of cattle and the preparation of their dead bodies for human consumption, though not often mentioned, is none the less a sore spot in the body social. The men, and worse still, the women employed in these trades will one day rise in judgment against those whose want of thought heavily handicapped their struggling souls.

Religious men and women feeling the sense of brotherhood strong within them have, for the sake of the weaker members, renounced the more or less questionable luxury of alcoholic liquors. Considerations of logic, hygiene and humanity alike demand that those who recognise in the animals their "little brothers and sisters" should wash their hands of all complicity in their torture and unnecessary death. As Mr. Tarrant says, "this subject of the treatment of the sub-human races is not a mere superfluous adjunct to religion," it is part of our religion; the West has to learn what the East taught long ago.

All existence is sacred, and sentient life may not be ruthlessly destroyed without injury to the religious development of the destroyer and of the community in which he lives.

Again—

He prayeth best who loveth best
All creatures great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all.

ARTHUR HARVIE.

FREE SPEECH IN THE PULPIT.

SIR,—There is much wisdom in Captain Cuttle's remark, "The bearings of this observation lies on the application thereof." Mr. Gow and Mr. Street have laid down with admirable force and clearness the general principles regulating the treatment of burning questions in sermons. But the difficulty lies in their application. The leader of a congregation assembling for worship and edification is under restrictions from which the Hebrew prophets were free. One that is very simple and obvious results from the conditions under which he speaks. He may not be contradicted. His hearers have no right to reply; and they have not ordinarily the liberty of going out as a silent protest. The hearers are bound, and that in honour imposes considerable restrictions upon the liberty of the speaker. There may be many things which it would be his plain duty to say in a public meeting, which it would be his duty not to say in the pulpit, however strongly he might feel. He is on his honour not to make statements which some of the congregation might indignantly repudiate, but for their respect for the place and the occasion. Large demands are made upon mutual consideration and forbearance, demands which it is sometimes very difficult to satisfy and yet essential. The minister is not thereby exempted from his obligations as a preacher of righteousness; but he is necessarily restricted in his pulpit utterances. And if at any time he should be urgently moved to declare his convictions on disputed matters of fact when he could not honourably impose them on a silenced audience, which is often the case with burning questions, then his only course seem to be to make some other opportunity for delivering his soul. It might sometimes be well to give a week-night lecture in the schoolroom. That would not protect him from intolerance and prejudice, but it would clear himself of the dishonourable charge of abusing the immunities of the pulpit, and he would be free from the sometimes galling restrictions imposed by that immunity from interruption, and by the general purpose of a meeting for worship and edification.

C. D. BADLAND.

Yarmouth, Aug. 28.

SIR,—I think that both Mr. Gow and my friend Mr. Street have done well, in the consideration of this subject, to emphasise the fact that a minister, feeling it his duty "to speak out the whole word of the Lord which he feels committed to him," has no right to complain if his congregation or any of its members stop away or decline to accept his message, saying: "It is no word of the Lord to us, and therefore we had better part." Mr. Street, in strong glowing words, points out the duty that is laid on a minister "to speak his whole soul," and condemns the intolerance of congregations "which would charge the minister with exceeding his office and abusing his trust when he speaks as necessity is laid upon him to do." He evidently believes that attempts are often made by congregations to "muzzle" their ministers and interfere with the "proud freedom" of their vocation. It may be so, but I should want to hear both sides before I took it for granted, as I should also wish to know both sides of the case of the Congregational minister and his people mentioned in your paper by Miss Florence Hill.

Not only have I been intimately connected with Unitarian congregations for over half a century, but in the case of ruptures between ministers and congregations have often been behind the scenes, and I have been amazed at the consideration and tolerance shown by congregations, especially to the young unfledged ministers who were passing through the crude, immature but dogmatic phases of thought, and were perfectly certain for the time being that they were possessed of "the whole word of the Lord." In riper years two of such men have said to me, "What rubbish I used to talk, I wonder how you (the congregation) put up with me!"

Wise men, in congregations, are generally, I think, very lenient indeed to such manifestations of thought and growth, and inclined to exercise all possible forbearance so long as the interests of the Church at large are not seriously and prejudicially affected. But there comes a time possibly when—acting on the view that both Mr. Gow and Mr. Street take that members are perfectly justified in staying away if they find the preaching distasteful to them—the congregation is in a state of disintegration, the offertory decreases, and the minister gets ominous warnings that his stipend is insecure. Under such conditions as these, the cry of intolerance is often raised, not only by the minister himself, but possibly also by the section of the congregation who stand by him. He leaves, he is supposed to be a martyr who has declined to be "muzzled," and is bearing the prophet's burden!

This condition of things is generally brought about by the minister having taken up the position of a violent partisan with respect to some subject on which the feelings of the community are very strong and in which, as he may think, vital principles are concerned. It may be Home Rule, Socialism, or the War in South Africa. These are all of them very important questions and every man should try to have clear well-matured views on them. They are also subjects upon which men of equal ability, and of the most cultured moral natures differ. They include so many complex problems and are so far-reaching in their consequences, that it is almost a crime for anyone to speak dogmatically on them, except he has tried his very best to master the subject and to understand and even to sympathise with the views which least commend themselves to his own mind. In my opinion they are absolutely unfit topics for religious discourses, and, as a rule, ministers' opinions on them are of no more value than those of the "man in the street." Do I want to "muzzle" the minister? Certainly not. I recognise that he is a man first and a minister afterwards. If he wishes on a public platform to advocate Socialism, Home Rule, or the upholding of Corrupt Oligarchies, under the impression that they are heroic peoples struggling to be free, I have no right to complain, although I may think he could find better occupation in connection with his ministerial work, but I want him to recollect that, for the time being, he is charged with the welfare of a congregation, and that its present and future prosperity depend greatly on his actions and his words as its minister. Laymen don't, as a rule, object to outspokenness or boldness of utterance in the pulpit. If they really desire the pulpit still to be a power in the world, they ask that their minister shall boldly proclaim the principles that he believes should underlie opinions and actions, that he should investigate and so far as he is able place before them those eternal principles of right and wrong which if grasped do much in the formation of opinions, but that from the pulpit he studiously refrain from taking sides, and carefully recognises that even when certain principles of action are recognised and admitted, they result in diversity of opinion according to temperament and trend of nature.

A minister may "speak his whole soul" in this way, do the utmost possible good, and retain and increase the respect and love of his congregation; but directly he becomes the champion of a party and takes sides in the pulpit his best influence is gone. He is taking advantage of his position to advocate his personal opinions, and although there may be many laymen before him quite capable of combatting them, they can neither do so nor enunciate their own with the same advantages which he possesses. At the risk of giving offence, I must say that however much reverence and respect I have for ministers of any and all denominations—and I have a great deal—they are not as a rule good advisers in practical matters. And all such subjects as I have mentioned are very practical matters indeed. I often wonder they don't recognise this themselves; it would do much to prevent difficulties between the pulpit and the pew. It is no fault of theirs, it is incidental to their training and their life, and it will always be so while the system of preparation for the ministerial office is what it is. The Spectator, last week, in an article on "The Future of Thought," wisely observed that "our thinking is done for us too much by men who live in the Closet, and are too widely separated from the actual facts of life to be fully in sympathy with movement. They are apt to perceive everything about the forces around them except that they are modes of motion."

"BEYOND OUR KEN."

SIR,—When discussing the profound problem dealt with in the leading article of your last issue, the almost invariable custom on our side is to appeal to the teaching of Jesus; on the side of our orthodox brethren the appeal as invariably is made to his personality, the contention being that only in the light of the latter—especially as interpreted by John or Paul—can the former be rightly understood.

This view is put forward with so much frankness in Professor Peake's recent essay on the Pauline theology, that perhaps readers of THE INQUIRER may be interested in a further quotation from it:—

> The phrase "the return to Christ" . . . bears a different meaning on different lips, and according to the meaning put into it we must pronounce it true or false. That the cry for a fuller return to Christ's teaching was needed is, I think, certain. . . . So far as the return to Christ means that we lay as the foundation of our theology the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, so far it is to be entirely welcomed. . . . But while it is Christ who puts us at the perfectly right point of view for constructing our theology . . . we cannot make the teaching of Christ the norm of a full Christian faith. What he taught was of less moment than what he was and what he did. . . . We must refuse to make it (namely, Christ's teaching) a standard for a complete Christian belief.

Whether the opinion so candidly expressed by Professor Peake is as a matter of fact the true one, or whether it contains any measure of truth, are different questions altogether; but it seems of importance that we should know clearly the considerations that are being urged on the other side by scholars and thinkers of recognised ability.

Aug. 28. J. WARSCHAUER.

THERE is hardly anything which official Christendom has valued less than the teaching of its Master.—James Drummond.

MEADROW CHAPEL, GODALMING.

"We cannot traverse the county of Surrey without thinking of its chronicles," writes Walter Cooper Dendy. "Throughout merry England there is many a beauty spot, blushing in quiet loveliness, or frowning in its wild magnificence, illumined and enriched withal by the charm of tradition. There are few more worth the gleaning than the leys and the hills and the moorlands that lie along the centre of the fair land of Surrey, almost at the threshold of London City."

Then he tells us how rich it is in flora and fauna, in great men and fair women, and, sad to relate, in villains also—but the latter, for the most part, are long since dead. He does not tell us one of the great advantages of the neighbourhood of Guildford—that even a stranger rarely loses his Wey.

"Godalming, God-helming, or Godelminge is Englished by one wiseacre, Godiva's Alms; and by another, the Shadow of God's gift." Our task is not to trace or invent exciting traditions, but to patiently explore a quiet corner of history. The story of our little country congregation at Meadrow, running though it does on lines parallel to some of our other churches of General Baptist foundation in the district, has, like the rest, especial features of its own; and the records contained in its oldest minute-books are worth spending some time to decipher. The meetings of this church were originally held at Farnham and at Worpleston, and a few entries from both of these places are still extant in the same minute-book which contains the earliest records of Meadrow.

Dr. Adam Taylor, in his "History of the English General Baptists," tells us that it was usual for a group of neighbouring churches to meet periodically in some central place, each congregation choosing two or more representatives to attend. The meeting was called an association, and the business usually transacted was "the reformation of inconsistent or immoral conduct; the prevention or suppression of heresy; the reconciling of differences between members and churches; the giving advice in difficult cases, whether respecting individuals or societies; the proposing of plans of usefulness; the recommending of cases that required pecuniary support; and, in short, the devising of the most effectual means of promoting the prosperity of religion in the world at large, but especially in their own churches." From these "associations" seems to have grown the annual meeting of the General Baptist Assembly in London; and it is probably one of the local association meetings that is reported in the earliest Meadrow minute-book as being held on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of March, 1702. One or two of the resolutions carried are almost word for word a copy of others passed at a meeting of the Assembly in London in 1689.

Among the items are:—"A question was brought whether ye choice of an elder must be by ye assent and consent of every indevidiall member. Resolved in ye negative."

"Whether ye baptising any persons judgd fitt for ye holy ordinance by ye minestor and ye maien part of ye congregation; though ye same be performed privetly ought to give offence to any member of ye same congregation or not. Resoulved in ye negative."

"Whether any, except messengers or elders ought to adminester the said ordinance of baptisiam and the Lord's Super or not; baptism may be adminesterred but the Lord's Super may not."

"Whether any believer who hath atained to Sound knolidge of ye holy scripturs may take vpon him to preach publikly without aprobation; Resoulved in ye negative."

"How members of good morals; tho' otherwise Stuburn and high minded, ought to be dealt with; they ought if affter offen admonition they walk disorderly to be withdrawn from."

"Whether persons are blame worthy who pass a rash censure without vnderstanding ye merrit of ye cause passed; they are blameworthy."

The question being brought to ye Assembly whether ye Lord Jesus Christ be a man only; or also a created spirit changed into a body of flesh; it is deemed an error and do abhor that opinion." (sic.)

Then follows a somewhat doubtful pronouncement of opinion on the question whether the marrying out of the denomination might be in any way countenanced by the church. "We are in great straits. . . . ." say the brethren. "Yet know it is better to incline to mercy than severity"; and so they almost pass a verdict of "not guilty, but don't do it oftener than you can help."

Starting now at the other beginning of the book we find:—

"The accounts of all the members, by there names that are in Communion in this meeting now in Worpels-den: Richard Nobb our Elder, farely chosen without any opposing, the 12th day of October, 1699; and ordained by Mathew Cafin ye 24 day of ye same month; Jane Nobb, ye wife of Richard Nobb."

A list of over 150 names follows, several with the dates of their baptism affixed; there were additions as late as 1813. In 1756 it is recorded: "All thes 5 persons was baptised by Mr. Wm. Evershed of Billingshurst in Susex."

"Sept. 19, 1762.—Margrett Lee—Mr. Walker's Maid—was baptised by Mr. Wm. Evershed."

"Augst 25, 1766.—Mis Sar. Parson, of Guildford, was under laying on of hands with us; and was admitted to communion on her producing a cirtivecate signed by Mr. Borruf of Barbican, that she was baptised there some years ago."

"June the 13th, 1784.—Mary the wife of John Pisely was baptised, at the same time Ann the daughter of John and Mary Pisely was baptised at Farnham by John Ellis. . . . Each of these persons had hands laid on them July 18th, and was admitted to the Lord's Supper by John Ellis, senior."

Among the names familiar in the annals of our other churches, we find Browne, Billinghurst, Godard, Potter, Martin, Marten, Wells, Tasker, Chitty, Geere, Drinkwater, Mott, &c. One gathers that the entries did not always closely follow the events related:—

1754.—"Abraham Smith and Ann Luxford was baptised I think by Rob. Barrat."

"Hannh Barrat was Baptised many years ago."

Following the list of members, and in the same handwriting as the earliest names on the roll:—

"Vppon consideration of the Mis-carriges of Sume persons in there worldly conserns, it was concluded vpon, and thoug very nessesary at a Church Meeting the first day of October, 1700 That wheras any persons belonging to this meetting when taking of farmes or entering vpon great deallings in the world, or contracting of Marriage ither men or women; or Servants hiring themselves. . . it is Agreed vpon at this Meetting that they Advise with the Church on such concerns as above-mentioned for there own good and ye honnor of there profession."

"The 3 day of December, 1700.—It was then Agreed vpon and concluded very nessesary att a Church Meetting: That whensoever the goverment of the nation shall call for a day to be kept as a fast or a day of thanks-giving that wee also observe that day by meetting together and Spending of that day in Relidgous worship to God as wee may see most meet."

"The 3 day of June, 1701.—It was given as advise at ye Church Meeting that friends should omitt all bisness on the first day, that may be disshonerabell to God or Reprochfull to the truth whish wee profess."

"Sept. the 9, 1701.—Then at a church meetting it was Agreed and resolved vpon that that if any friend in communion should at any time be invitted to a Sprinkling feast (Christening Party?) the the Churshes advice in Jenerall to such persons is not to goe."

Were these "Sprinkling feasts" conducted after the manner of Irish Wakes? The next entry bears date,—

"September the 29, 1703.—Then at A Church meetting it was joyntly concluded whereas John Gord have bin formerly Admonished for, and Advised from going to Sprinkling feastes; yet notwithstanding contrary to Christian Advise and Christian Admonition he still persistes in such disorders, and have of late Spent part of a day and the whole night at Such a feast and great part of the time in dancing and such like vannitys; to the dishonor of god and and the reproch of Christ and his truths, and the griefe of friends, Therefore it is joyntly concluded for these and such like disorders; to withdrawe from him and publicly to declare against him as a disorderly person, att present not fit for church communion."

One would suppose he must have been readmitted before the date of the next entry, if we had not evidence from other old church books that even ex-communicated persons were still under some sort of brotherly supervision.

"Oct. the 15th, 1708. . . . Having discors with old John Gourde. . . . for his reproachfall princepaull and his vngodly acting" (in relation to the sanctity of marriage) "we with drawe from him in the name of the Lord Jesus."

Four years later a member "has bine Accused for Thift an other gros disorders which has bine proved vpon her plainly it is judged meet publicly to declare. . . . that shee is a sinere at present not fitt for communion with the Church of Christ."

Eleven of the members showed their desire to avoid even the appearance of evil:—

"At a church meeting held at Webstone, 19th Sept., 1762. It was considdrd whether gaming and plays is to be allowed among Christians and as some persons had sometimes used such things, they profess't not to want to continue it, that bad consequences did offten attend it and to avoid which, as well as not to give offence they would take heed not to follow it for the future."

Reasonable excuses are sometimes offered, and apparently accepted by the church, for non-performance of religious duties :—

"Brothers John and Thomas Pisely and John Ellis hath viseted Sister Cobbett according to appointment and report her not attending the Public worship on the Lord's day more frequently on account of incombrances, Largeness of Famely, small children and her bad state of health."

Twenty-eight years later, after the principal services of the two churches of Worpleston and Farnham had been transferred to Meadrow, the fullest account I have ever come across is given. One would hope it is also fairly representative of the general spirit of these visitations.

"March 22, 1815.

"REPORT.

"Pursuant to our appointment by the church meeting of the 25th Jany, 1815, we proceeded to visit our friends James and Elizabeth . . . As they had been apprised of our coming and object, we immediately proceeded to read the resolutions of the church meeting, and the 3rd chap. Thess. verses 6 to 17. We stated that it was not from resentment, pride nor contempt that we bore the reproof but from brotherly love and an earnest desire to promote their good. This statement was readily admitted, but James replied that they had done nothing (as he conceived) to merit such censure. We then reminded them that their poverty and distress (which was great) evidently arose from their indolence, mismanagement of business and want of economy—that their promises and engagements had been repeatedly broken, and their neglect of morality and religion had become habitual and notorious. This charge supported and proved by a reference to existing facts was reluctantly admitted to be just, and after we had admonished, exhorted and advised to repentance and reformation they expressed their contrition and sorrow and the unhappiness which they had long experienced, and their sincere desire and purpose to return to their duty and to walk worthy of their Christian profession, We closed our visit with an address to the throne of grace, that the Lord would in his mercy heal their backsliding and lead them in the way wherein they should go. We then took our leave of them, commending them to God, and to the word of his grace, and assuring them of our hearty wishes and constant prayer for their present and everlasting welfare.

"(Signed) THOMAS MOORE.
"THOMAS CROUCH."

Carried out in so brotherly a spirit, it is perhaps natural that it is recorded of another culprit similarly visited : "He acknowledged his errors and cordially received our admonition." E. KENSETT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Sunday-school Treats.

Successful summer treats are reported from Sunderland and South Shields, jointly, on Aug. 13, Whitchurch on Aug. 21, and Percy-street, Oxford, on Aug. 23, when prizes were distributed for regular attendance during the past year.

Chester.—The bi-centenary of Matthew Henry's Chapel will be celebrated shortly. Notice of a book, "Matthew Henry and his Chapel," is made in our advertisement columns, and the Rev. H. D. Roberts will be glad to hear from ministers or others who possess copies of sermons preached in the chapel, or any such information about the chapel history or its ministers as is not generally accessible.

East London Unitarian Sunday school Union.—The fifth annual aggregate service in connection with the Union was held on Sunday afternoon last at the Mansford-street Church. There were present, in addition to the Mansford-street scholars and teachers, those from Stepney, Stratford, and Walthamstow. The service, which was very bright throughout, was conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard, who took as the subject of her address "Chivalry," and explained in a most pleasing, interesting, and helpful way the true meaning of the term, and showed how boys and girls could best practise chivalry at the present day. The six hymns taken from the Sunday-school Hymn-book were very well sung ; Miss Cadman presided at the organ. On the previous afternoon the annual outing took place, when twenty-six teachers connected with the Union met at Higham's Park, and after partaking of tea enjoyed a few hours pleasant recreation. The papers to be read at the forthcoming meetings, to be held from October to March next, are as follows :—"Echoes from the Oxford Summer Session," by Miss Rosa Browning ; "Our Scholars and Reverence," by Mr. A. Thompson ; "The Teacher's Chief Power," by Mr. Thomas Elliot ; "The Higher Criticism of the Bible and its Possibilities in Sunday-School Teaching," by Mr. Frank Talbot ; "Christian Endeavour," by Mr. C. A. Ginever ; and an address by the President, Mr. Lucking Tavener.

Hull.—Park-street Church reopened its doors on the 19th, after an interval of four weeks, during which it has remained closed for the purpose of installing the electric light and the execution of much-needed cleaning and repairs. It now presents an appearance of comfort and cheerfulness which is appreciated by all, the electric lighting particularly affording much gratification, replacing as it does a not very effective or desirable system of gas lighting. The reopening services were conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A. On the 26th, upon the continuation of these services, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, preached morning and evening to excellent congregations, making a deep impression by his earnestness and thrilling eloquence.

Tavistock.—A small grant made recently by Watts' Charity Trustees for books has been spent in purchasing Leviticus, Joshua, Judges, Psalms, Isaiah, of the Polychrome Bible. These books will be placed in the Abbey Chapel, where they will be easy of access to all who wish to read them.

HAMPSTEAD HEATH (close to). Lovely views.—TO LET, for about six weeks, a well-furnished HOUSE, standing high, just thoroughly cleaned and done up. Three sitting, five or six bed, one dressing, rooms. Bath (hot and cold), three w.c.'s, good kitchen, &c. Garden, with summer house and bicycle place. Only small adult family, careful tenants, accepted. Convenient for trains, trams, &c. Moderate terms. — Write, "Speranza," care of Miss Cole, Rosslyn-hill, N.W.

BIRTHS.

BRACE—On the 21st August, at 30, Rutland-avenue, Liverpool, the wife of George R. Brace, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

HARRISON—MATHERS — On Thursday, the 30th August, at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., assisted by the Rev. J. S. Mathers, M.A. (brother of the bride), William Harrison, Solicitor, son of John Harrison, Solicitor, Leeds, to Kate, third daughter of the late John Shackleton Mathers, J.P., also of this city. No cards.

NOTCUTT—TURNER—On the 29th August, at the Parish Church, Westerfield, Ipswich, by the Rector, the Rev. R. H. Cautley, Stephen Abbott Notcutt, of Ipswich, to Constance, younger daughter of the late William and Rosa Turner, of Ipswich.

DEATHS.

ELLIS—On the 26th August, at his residence, Rocky Hill, Maidstone, Charles Ellis, J.P., aged 77 years.

LAST Saturday Lord Roberts proclaimed the annexation of the Transvaal, the Queen's warrant authorising him to do so being dated July 4, the anniversary of the American Declaration of Independence. It is thus assumed by the Government of this country that the two Republics are now part of the British Empire. That there should be a United South Africa, associated with the Empire, as there is already a United Australia, may be eventually the happiest thing for that distracted country, but that it should be violently achieved by means of the tragic conflict which is not yet at an end, and through a period of forcible rule, must remain to us a bitter humiliation. Nothing that has since been brought to light has altered the feeling with which we had to endure the beginning of the war, or the dismay with which we contemplate the moral burden it has laid upon our people.

THE Ethical World of Sept. 1 contains the first part of a sketch of "The African Boer," by Olive Schreiner, which is to be continued in successive numbers. What the value of this contribution to the burning question of the hour may be we cannot judge from this first instalment, which consists chiefly of a recapitulation of well-known facts in the past history of South Africa; but whatever Olive Schreiner writes ought to command the respectful and sympathetic attention of Englishmen.

THE British Association for the Advancement of Science entered upon the work of its annual meeting at Bradford on Wednesday evening, when Sir William Turner, F.R.S., delivered his Presidential address. The chair was taken by Sir Henry Roscoe, in the absence of the retiring president, Sir Michael Foster, M.P., in America. Sir William Turner, who is a native of Lancaster, where he was born in 1832, has been for the greater part of his life connected with the University of Edinburgh. There in 1854 he was appointed Demonstrator, and since 1867 has been Professor of Anatomy. It was natural, therefore, that he should deal in his Presidential Address with the subject, which, as he said, had been the occupation of his life. On the last meeting of the Association in the present century, he gave a sketch of the progress of Biological science during the past hundred years, showing especially what immense advances in the knowledge of the structure of animals have been rendered possible and have been achieved through the perfecting of the microscope and the use of other mechanical methods. A fascinating story was told of the growing knowledge of cells and of cell plasm as the mysterious basis of all forms of life, and the significance of this in the evolution of the marvellously varied life of the earth. "We know not," said the President, "as regards time, when the fiat went forth, Let there be Life, and there was Life" :—

All we can say is that it must have been in the far-distant past, at a period so remote from the present that mind fails to grasp the duration of the interval. Prior to its genesis our earth consisted of barren rock and desolate ocean. When matter became endowed with life, with the capacity of self-maintenance and of resisting external disintegrating forces, the face of nature began to undergo a momentous change. Living organisms multiplied, the land became covered with vegetation, and multitudinous varieties of plants, from the humble fungus and moss to the stately palm and oak, beautified its surface and fitted it to sustain higher kinds of living beings. Animal forms appeared, in the first instance simple in structure, to be followed by others more complex, until the mamalian type was produced. The ocean also becomes peopled with plant and animal organisms, from the microscopic diatom to the huge leviathan. Plants and animals acted and reacted on each other, on the atmosphere which surrounded them, and on the earth on which they dwelt, the surface of which became modified in character and aspect. At last Man came into existence.

And the address concluded with an eloquent description of the progress of man from the condition of a rude savage to that of the highest civilisation, with its mastery of Nature, and the boundless possibilities of future achievement. The thanks of the Association were given to the President for his Address on the motion of Sir J. Burdon-Sanderson, seconded by the Bishop of Ripon.

THE Rev. Abraham W. Jackson, A.M. whose book on "James Martineau: a Biography and a Study," (with a portrait, crown 8vo, 12s. 6d.) Messrs. Longmans and Co. announce among their September publications, is an American Unitarian minister, who has long been a devoted student of Dr. Martineau's writings, and has more than once been in this country obtaining material for his biography. Mr. Jackson was born in 1843, and ordained to the ministry at the age of thirty. For some time he has had no regular ministerial charge, and is resident at Concord, Mass. Some little time ago he published a volume of sermons on "The Divine Immanence," and has been a contributor to The New World. We shall look with the greatest interest for the appearance of Mr. Jackson's new book, though it naturally cannot take the place of the Biography of Dr. Martineau on which Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton are engaged.

DRESDEN seems to have taken the lead among the great cities of Germany in the endeavour to make provision for the social well-being of the people, on the lines of Sir Walter Besant's "Palace of Delight" and the actual People's Palace for East London, in the Whitechapel-road. At Dresden the members of the "People's Welfare" Society have established, not indeed one great palace, but five "People's Homes" in different quarters. The earliest of these was founded in 1889, and is known as the "Paulinengarten" in the Neustadt. On the ground floor of the house is a kitchen and a large reading-room, used mid day also as a dining-room for members. Upstairs there is a library and another reading-room, supplied with standard works, books of reference, magazines, and writing materials. During the winter months these rooms are used for classes. There is also a lecture and concert hall. But the great charm of this Home is a large garden, part of which is devoted as a play-place to the children, while the rest, laid out with pleasant walks and seats, and with a beautiful view over the Elbe, is for the elders. There in summer hundreds of the members, who are chiefly workers in the neighbouring factories, are accustomed to take their dinner, which is supplied, with simple but good fare, at the popular price of threepence.

Another of the Dresden "People's Homes" is practically a little park just outside the town, furnished not only with restaurant, but an open-air theatre, and a wilderness in which hundreds of children are able to play. In none of the "Homes" is there any pressure put on members to partake of the refreshments which are supplied at fixed popular prices. The annual subscription for membership is seldom more than two shillings, and the "Homes," in which there is no distinction of class or social position, very soon prove to be more than self-supporting, so far as working expenses are concerned. A close parallel to the town "Homes" will be found, we believe, in the Social Club at Lower Mosley-street, Manchester. In Germany, the example of Dresden has been followed by Leipzig, Stuttgart, Bremen, and a few other cities. The article to which we are indebted for our knowledge of the "Homes" describes also a similar foundation by a generous citizen in Amsterdam, known as "Ons Huis," the purpose of which is described in a pamphlet issued at the time of its opening some nine years ago, and which may fairly represent the ideal aimed at in all the "People's Homes."

Ons Huis is not founded in the interests of the working classes alone, but just as much of the wealthier classes. Here the opportunity is given to them of making the acquaintance of the workers and their families, and of sharing with them the best they have of knowledge and experience. Here the learned may bring their wisdom, the artist his art, experts their knowledge, for the benefit of those who otherwise would have no opportunity of hearing or learning of such things. Here in frank intercourse, unaffected friendliness and social gatherings, the one may be brought nearer to the other, and mutual appreciation be gained, which must be beneficial to both.

The September Seed Sower opens with an address on "The Spiritualising of Ethics" by the Rev. Joseph Wood, which we commend to the earnest attention of our readers. Our Free Churches, of which it has always been the characteristic to make much of Ethics, have failed, Mr. Wood thinks, to adequately appreciate the inward and spiritual aspects of religion, and he draws an unattractive picture of the excellent and conscientious man, "the ethical man," who is oppressed by the sense of duty, and lacks "the freedom and the joy of the truly religious life." How far the characterisation is true of members of our body readers will be able to judge from their own experience, but we are inclined to think that there is more to be said, than Mr. Wood seems to allow, both for the attractiveness and the effectiveness of a purely ethical passion, even where unhappily there is no further vision of its divine significance—as, e.g., in the noble self-devotion of John Stuart Mill. At the same time we are entirely with Mr. Wood in his plea for the love of goodness as the will of God, which gives the strongest motive power for ethical conduct, a goodness most clearly seen and loved in its highest embodiment in the humanity of Jesus.

This number of the Seed-Sower is full of pleasant and interesting matter, and seems to us most admirably to fulfil its purpose as a healthy and useful parish magazine. As adopted by congregations and enclosed in a special cover, and perhaps with further extra pages, for congregational announcements and other matter, it may be of great service in different localities. The Essex Church Calendar, which is one of those which incorporate the Seed-Sower, is publishing on two of its extra pages a series of interesting chapters on the history of the church; the present number, in chapter viii., gives an account of the Rev. Thomas Madge, with a good reproduction of the well-known portrait of that venerable man.

The current number of The Liberator contains an interesting note on the new Nonconformist Marriage Act, summarising the Parliamentary return issued last month, which showed how far the Act had been adopted up to the end of March, that is to say, during the first year in which it was in force. The number of chapels registered for marriages, and to which alone the Act is applicable, is 12,285; but the number of "authorised persons," that is, persons authorised to officiate without the registrar, is only 1,346. These are divided among the denominations as follows:—

Wesleyan Methodist	670
United Methodist Free Church ...	93
Methodist New Connexion	26
Primitive Methodists	67
Calvinistic Methodists...	29
	885
Congregationalists	256
Baptists	134
Other denominations	71
Total	1,346

It is stated that of the persons appointed seven have relinquished the office.

The number of marriages celebrated under the Act is 3,738. [The number of marriages in Nonconformist buildings in a year is usually over 32,000.] Serious irregularities have occurred in a few cases only. In four, the marriages were celebrated without the production of the superintendent registrar's certificate, or license; and in three of them the parties had to be re-married. That happened also in two other cases, in which the marriage was not performed by an "authorised person." In a published communication it is stated that the Registrar-General is of opinion that the Act has worked smoothly.

In the September number of The Coming Day the Rev. J. Page Hopps has the following note under the title, "Beyond the Veil":—"At the funeral of Mrs. Gladstone, the Princess of Wales sent a wreath and a few lines of poetry, which were generally taken as her own. The lines were very pathetic, but with a strange beauty in them. They were written by the famous American, Ella Wheeler Wilcox. The following verses give the full thought of the poem:—

It seemeth such a little way to me,
Across to that strange country, the beyond.
And yet not strange, for it has grown to be
The home of those of whom I am so fond.
It makes it seem familiar and most dear,
As journeying friends bring distant regions near.

So close it lies that when my sight is clear
I think I almost see the gleaming strand.
I know I feel those who have gone from here
Come close enough sometimes to touch my hand.
I often think, but for our veiled eyes,
It would be known that heaven all round us lies.

And so for me there is no sting to death,
And so the grave has lost its victory.
It is but crossing with abated breath,
And with set face, a little strip of sea,
To find the loved ones waiting on the shore,
More beautiful, more precious than before."

At the end of the first article of "Some Reminiscences of a Manchester Unitarian," published in The Inquirer of Aug. 18, the "Mr. James Woodley" mentioned was a misprint for Woolley. Concerning the Rev. Abraham Bennett, to whom reference was made in the second article, we have received several communications, from which we have gleaned the following particulars.

Abraham Bennett was born in London 1771, and was in early life a Wesleyan Methodist lay-preacher, but under the influence chiefly of Mr. Vidler became a very strenuous Unitarian. In 1803 he accepted an invitation to become minister of the General Baptist congregation at Ditchling, and there is still an old member of the Horsham congregation (aet. 95) who remembers him there. For some time Mr. Bennett preached at Cuckfield as well as Ditchling, and later was for some years evening lecturer at Brighton. In 1807 he preached before the general assembly of General Baptists at Worship-street, London, and his sermon, from the text "Whose Son is He?" which is said to have created a great sensation, was published. Four years later he also preached at the annual meeting of the Cambridge and Lincolnshire Unitarian Association, his sermon being to show "that Unitarianism comprises all the principles, consolations, and motives which render religion important and desirable." In 1817 Mr. Bennett became minister at Poole, and in 1826 removed to Manchester, to become ministerial secretary of the Village Missionary Society of that district. Growing infirmities, however, soon obliged him to relinquish his post, though for some years he still continued to preach as an occasional supply and eked out a scanty income by teaching a few young children. He died in 1846, and was interred in the graveyard of Upper Brook-street Church. His widow died four years later, at Pendleton.

Some of our older readers remember that excellent minister, the Rev. Franklin Baker, M.A., of Bolton, who was uncle of the late Archbishop Benson and brother of Sir Thomas Baker, formerly Mayor of Manchester. There are interesting references to both his Unitarian uncles in the recently published Life of the Archbishop. Writing in 1870 of his old Birmingham master, Dr. Prince Lee, afterwards the first Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Benson says: "When I think of his affection for my Unitarian uncle and Dr. Russell [of Birmingham, Secretary of the Ministers' Benevolent Society], and how he has often said to me, 'Your uncle at Bolton is a good man, a very good man—I wish he was with us: only such a man can never really be against us—he is one of the best clergymen in my diocese,' I could but feel that my own horizon of charity had been indefinitely extended by him."

MEADROW CHAPEL, GODALMING.

II.

LONG ministries marked the history of this church, and its predecessors at Worpleston and Farnham. In last week's article mention was made of the appointment of Richard Nobb in 1699. A minute dated July, 1737, records: "Wee, the Church of Christ meeting at Worbolstone and Farnham, having under our consideration our present state and condition; it having pleased Almighty God to remove from us our dear Bro. and Faithfull Pastor Richard Nobb, by which means we are destitute of an Elder to take the charge and care of us. And knowing how much it condusethe to the honor of God, the promotion of the Christian Cause and the edifying of the body, the Church of Christ to be furnisht with proper Ministers and Pastors; and hoping and believing we have men among us, whom God in som good measure gifted and Qualify'd to serve us in the Pastorall office we have therefore according to Gospel rule made choice of, and do hereby declare that wee have chosen our Brethren John Geere and Robert Barrat to serve us joyntly in the Pastorall office and doe desire them to accept of ordination in order thereunto, we, the members of these Churches subscribe our names as follows":— . . .

Of the forty signatures attached it is noteworthy that fully one-half are women's. The chosen pastors were ordained by Richard Drinkwater and Bro. Mellor (?), but the name of Robert Barrat does not again occur. In 1771 we get:—

"At and by a meeting held at farnham meeting house by the members of the Baptis Church of farnham and Worplesdon . . . It is agreed by Churchas aforesaid to agree with and and to except of Mr. John Ellis, of Charlwood in Surry" (Sussex) "for a minister and preacher, as an assistant to John Geere our elder, and that he, the said John Ellis shall be entittled to the income that shall yearely arise from the donation of Mrs. Smallpiece (?) and the seven pounds a year given by the late Mrs. Sarah Parson which shall becom due from and after the said John Ellis shall come and settle with us and so long as he shall maintain the six principles of the doctrine of the Christian Religion according to hebrews the sixth and virses the first and sacond, and the Doctrine of Generall Redemption and is esteemed by the aforesaid church to live a Life agreeable to the gospel of Christ and worthy a minister of the Same."

The page is endorsed by six members of the church, on its behalf, and below is written apparently by the said John Ellis:—"The above Church Agreement is Agreed to and Excepted of by me." So began the long and honourable connection of the family of Ellis with this church. John Ellis probably succeeded to the sole pastorate on the death of John Geere, the last entry in whose hand-writing occurs in 1780. His own death is thus recorded:—

"John Ellis, Senr. Pastor of this Church departed this life, in the Christian faith, July 5, 1804, and was interred at Billingshurst."

So the first three ministries, which had covered over a century, ended with the beginning of the new one; but not before the then new meeting-house, which has an adjoining cottage, had been built. No flourish of trumpets or formal laying of memorial stones seem to have greeted its erection; the reticence of our forbears is exemplified in the following, only, references to the building:—"Wednsday, June the 4th 1783 at A church meeting held at Brother William Evershed's at Easking Godalming it was agreed that a more convenient Place for Public worship may conduce much to the Ease and prosperity of this church. Agreed that a meeting-house Be Erected at meadrow Godalming for that purpose."

"1784 att a Church meeting Held at Worpleston, May 7th To consider of Bro Wm Kingsford's Plan and other matters, agreed that it is the oppinion of this congregasion that it is worthey of our approbation."

On June 24th, 1810, John Ellis, on whose stone at Meadrow it is recorded that he was one of the founders of, and principal contributors to the church, succeeded his father in the office of elder, in conjunction with Joseph Brent, of Portsmouth; they were ordained by John Marsom and John Evans.

An obituary notice of the Rev. Joseph Brent, in the General Baptist Advocate of November, 1833, tells that he commenced to assist in the Sunday evening services at Portsmouth while still a young man, giving up time and attention to that "delightful duty," while engrossed in business, and finding it a hard struggle to maintain his family; he also relinquished his claim to a legacy of £1,000 in favour of that church, from an over-scrupulous sense of honour. It goes on to say: "In 1808 (?) he accepted a unanimous invitation from the General Baptist Church at Godalmin, to become the regular assistant of their aged (?) minister Mr. Ellis. Here a new scene of active usefulness presented itself in which he labored with zeal and delight; his labours were crowned with manifold success, and his name is still held by many individuals and families of that society and neighborhood in grateful and affectionate remembrance. Among other useful plans, he introduced a Sunday School, in which writing and arithmetic were taught; and this being the first, combining those advantages, in that populous agricultural district was attended with the most happy and beneficial results. So well did this society estimate his worth and usefulness, that nothing but the prospect of his temporal advantage could resign them to his loss. From Godalmin in 1814 he was called by his friends at Portsmouth, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of their pastor, the Rev. Jno. Mills. . . . His last Sabbath on earth was rendered the more interesting by his witnessing the addition by baptism of two young members to his church, the ordinance being administered by his highly-esteemed friend, the Rev. Thomas Moore of Godalmin."

After Mr. Brent's return to Portsmouth, Thomas Moore was appointed as assistant to Mr. Ellis at a yearly salary of £52, out of which he paid the rent (£11) of the cottage beside the chapel, with the garden and land adjoining. On the death of Mr. Ellis, in 1823, he was ordained as pastor by Mr. James Gilchrist, and he held the office until 1840. He is still remembered with reverence and esteem in the district. Originally a carpenter and frame-work knitter, with few advantages of education, he succeeded by diligent self-culture in obtaining a large share of general information. He thought his own way into, and out of, a society of Calvinistic Unitarians, and, step by step, grew more and more broad in opinion and wise and tender in dealing with his fellow men. He joined the General Baptist Connection, bringing with him several of the members of his own family and his personal friends. He began his preaching in that body, at Worpleston, Meadrow, and the Crown Pits, Godalming. He commenced, in 1811, to conduct the services at Billingshurst, and walked to and fro thither ninety times in three successive years, a distance of three thousand miles. Only a few times did he receive any help on these journeys, not being able to afford the hire of a horse, or to lose any time from his work as a journeyman. It is little wonder that he tells us, near the close of his life, that he still feels the effect of the over-exertion of that period.

He took a somewhat active part in the debates of the General Baptist Assembly. At its annual meeting, which in 1833 was held in Godalming, "which was attended by the elders and other friends from the churches of Billingshurst, Ditchling, Horsham, Coles-street and Worship-street, London," he said, "I like to hear the voice of another in my pulpit, especially the voice of a sympathizing brother. . . . I read and reflect and compare Scripture with Scripture. I think with Mr. Means that the Scriptures are neglected, and quite agree with the preacher's exhortation to study them." He referred later on to the French Revolution, and to the change going on in this country. He was one of the Moderators in 1834, at Coles-street, and mentioned that he was "an advocate for the Advocate" (the General Baptist Advocate, which was then being carried on by Mr. Means).

At Billingshurst, in the autumn, we find his name coupled with negro emancipation. He had to mourn the loss of one of his family of nine children the same year, and in 1835 a still greater bereavement befel him in the death of his wife, after a union of thirty-seven years. He continued the services at Worplestone with a congregation varying from ten to thirty, and at the annual tea meeting reaching the numbers of eighty to one hundred; in 1836 he assisted in the formation of a Mechanics' Institute, and a little before was instrumental in commencing the "Meadrow Christian Tract Society." Under his influence the church broadened its rules, and in 1818 it was unanimously agreed "That good Christian characters of every denomination, though not members of this or any other General Baptist Church, shall be at liberty to sit down with us to break bread at the Lord's Table." The year after his ministry ceased, whilst he was still a constant worshipper, they were admitted to the full privileges of membership.

In 1828 only one trustee, James Cooper, survived, and considerable trouble and expense was incurred in consequence of this negligence, he having emigrated to North America; however, power of attorney was procured, and the property again made safe; it is held for a lease of one thousand years.

Like our other southern congregations, Meadrow suffered at the beginning of this century from the tide of emigration, and the minute-books give a list of twelve persons who went over "on account of gloomy prospects and distresses in this country," and who carried with them letters of recommendation "to the notice, regard, and fellowship of our Brethren in Christ, among whom they may sojourn."

In a sermon preached by the Rev. Jno. Martin, of Dover and Canterbury, in 1832, the following passage occurs:—

"No sect of Christians has felt the pernicious effect of emigration more than the General Baptists. Liberal in religion, they are also Liberal in politics. They cannot sit contented under a despotic or a corrupt government; and rather than live in a country where an honest man cannot obtain a comfortable livelihood they associate together, and quit in companies the scenes of infancy and their native homes for ever."

This theory is borne out by the endorsement of the lists of Church members at Horsham, Ditchling and Billingshurst.

LITERATURE.

VIEWS OF THE ATONEMENT.*

IN a leading article on March 24, we drew attention to the remarkable series of articles on "The Atonement in Modern Religious Thought" which had been regularly appearing in the Christian World from Nov. 9 of last year until March 1. A further article by Dr. T. T. Munger, of New Haven, U.S., appeared on May 17; and these seventeen articles are now republished in a welcome volume, in type that is very pleasant to read, and with plenty of margin for notes. The names of the seventeen contributors are printed on the title-page and in a subsequent list, classified in four groups. First come the distinguished foreign professors Godet, Harnack and Sabatier, next the Americans, Lyman Abbot, Washington Gladden and Dr. Munger, thirdly two Deans of the Church of England, Farrar and Fremantle, and finally a group of nine Nonconformists. The contributions, however, do not appear in that order, and as the book has no index we will print the list in the actual order of the papers, with the pages for convenience of reference for those who turn to the volume itself:—

	Page
R. J. Campbell, B.A., Brighton ...	3
F. W. Farrar, D.D., Dean of Canterbury	33
P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D., Cambridge	61
Lyman Abbot, D.D., New York ...	91
Adolf Harnack, D.D., Professor of Church History in the University of Berlin	107
R. F. Horton, M.A., D.D., Hampstead, formerly Fellow of New College, Oxford	127
W. F. Adeney, M.A., Professor of N.T. Exegesis, History and Criticism, New College, London	143
W. H. Fremantle, D.D., Dean of Ripon	159
Marcus Dodd, D.D., Professor of N.T. Exegesis in New College, Edinburgh	177
Auguste Sabatier, Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology of the University of Paris ...	195
Washington Gladden, D.D., Columbus	227
Alfred Cave, B.A., D.D., Principal of Hackney College	241
Bernard J. Snell, M.A., B.Sc., Brixton	259

John Hunter, D.D., Glasgow	301
Frédéric Godet, D.D., Neuchâtel ...	331
T. T. Munger, D.D., New Haven, U.S.	355

It should further be noted (although the publisher gives us no hint of this) that Mr. Campbell's contribution with which the volume opens is not the article which he originally wrote for the series, but a fresh statement which he doubtless judged to be required by the place it was to hold in such company.

In our former article on this Symposium we expressed special gratitude for what Dr. Hunter and Mr. Snell had written, so fearless in its outspokennesss, strong in a healthy humanity and instinct with spiritual wisdom. Dr. Munger's contribution, which was subsequently added, ranks with these two as among the most decided in the broader ground taken as to the religious significance of Atonement. Christ, says Dr. Munger, was in the line of the prophets, and not of the priests, and for that very reason "shut off those theories of the Atonement that wear the priestly garb."

But, in spite of His own definition of His work, it was early transferred to the other camp and became priestly in form and spirit. Christ is made an oblation and His blood atones. This interpretation puts Him where He refused to stand. An altar is put in place of the cross He endured and laid on every man's shoulder, and blood is made to do the work of obedience. The prophetic element fell into abeyance, and the priestly came to the front, so hard was it to rid the mind of magical conceptions of religion and to realise the force of moral laws.

"The Fatherhood of God," Dr. Munger adds, "dominated all in Christ, and embraced all in Him and in His work. Whatever cannot be found in Fatherhood cannot be found in Christ, nor in anything done by Him, or that proceeds from Him. Absolute Fatherhood and absolute Sonship, this is the good news of the Gospel; it is the religion of humanity; it makes Christianity universal and eternal."

Thus Atonement simply carries out the true relations between Father and Son.

Everything is simple, natural, universal. A son obeys; if he disobeys he incurs suffering and misery in body and spirit; if he repents he is forgiven and restored. Christ thus put the process of recovery from sin into the parable of the lost son. To omit from it the very thing that constitutes it is to trifle with it as a teaching. To supplement it by making addenda of expiatory sacrifice or governmental necessity is to remind Christ that He forgot to include them. The prodigal has come back to the Father's house, humble and penitent, and is forgiven out of the fulness of paternal love, in order that he may once more enter into sonship. This parable was Christ's supreme teaching upon the restoration of lost relations between father and son, i.e., between God and man.

That all men, in a true Brotherhood, may become one with God and Christ is the great end to be attained. Jesus made clear to us the life we are all to live, as children of the Father in heaven.

Christ saved the world not by theology but by a life. It is not, however, untheological; nothing in theology has a sounder basis than that Christ saved the world by Himself becoming a redeemer; that is, by passing through those moral processes that in themselves constitute salvation. It follows as day the night that the process must be the same for every man. However, in the Epistles, the sacrifice of Christ runs off into Hebraic or mystical expression, it continually returns to the norm of Sonship and obedience, for here only its law or nature can be found. It may be spread out so as to touch life at many points, but it is at heart the living obedience of the Son to the Father. It covers sin, but it covers as much more of life as there is more in life than sin. It is difficult to get out of the dogmatic circle, and harder still to escape the narrowing effect of words and phrases; hardest of all to put due meaning into the universal and eternal truths and forces that made up the life of Christ as the revelation of the Father. The Atonement of Christ is the reconcilement of humanity in all the length and breadth of its complex duties and experiences. Hence he summons every man to a fellowship with His own life—not only to follow Him, but to become one with Him.

These extracts will make Dr. Munger's position clear, rejoicing in a new liberty and a universal hope, while, as he says, "there are great churches whose inheritance of dogma and ritual hang like millstones about their necks."

Dr. Munger's article concludes as follows:—

The world is fast becoming one,' and thought must widen to comprehend it. Provincialism has had its day. Human nature with its eternal laws is coming to the front. Under its language the Babel of conflicting and local creeds is passing away, and men can speak in the common language of their hearts and passions. The problem before the Church in the opening century is the problem of missions. It is the logic of the unfolding world. But Christianity will not evangelise the nations on the strength of an inspired Bible and a doctrine of the Atonement struck through with Hebrew ritualism, and construed by mediæval logic from facts that have turned out to be composite legends. But Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; Love, Forgiveness, Righteousness—these in their simple and direct form are at home the world over, and are full of God's power because He hath made of one blood all nations of men, and is the Father of all.

That is a good ending also for the whole book.

OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL.*

THIS little book gathers together five of Mr. Gannett's delightful papers, which, as the Preface says, have all been printed before in one form or another, and of which a good deal has been re-written. The subjects are: "Of Faces and their Making," "Culture without College," "The Thorn-Bearer," "A Recipe for Good Cheer," and "The House Beautiful." "There are," says Mr. Gannett, "many echoes from other minds in all of them. One or two seem to be almost compact of echoes. All thanks to the originators of whatever may be good." And thanks, we say, to the friend who has gathered up these treasures, adding so much wisdom of his own, and giving to the whole the impress of a mind beautiful in its rejoicing over all things pure and lovely and of good report, and skilful to make others see and share in that delight.

and "A Cup of Cold Water" will know what to expect in this little book, and they will not be disappointed. There is a good example of the "echoes" Mr. Gannett gathers up for us in "A Recipe for Good Cheer," illustrating the doctrine that it is not circumstances which make happiness, but the spirit in which circumstances are taken. It is one of several stories from the newspapers:—

This time it was an old negro auntie, found in a New York garret. She had been a slave set free by the war, who had somehow found her way to that corner of the great northern city. A city missionary, stumbling through the dirt of a dark entry, heard a voice say, "Who's there, Honey?" Striking a match, he caught a vision of earthly want and suffering, of saintly trust and peace, "cut in ebony"—calm, appealing eyes set amid the wrinkles of a pinched black face that lay on a tattered bed. It was a bitter night in February, and she had no fire, no fuel, no light. She had had no supper, no dinner, no breakfast. She seemed to have nothing but rheumatism and faith in God. One could not well be more completely exiled from all pleasantness of circumstances. Yet the favourite song of this old creature ran:

"Nobody knows de trouble I see,
Nobody knows but Jesus;
Nobody knows de trouble I see,—
Sing Glory Hallelu!

"Sometimes I'm up, sometimes I'm down,
Sometimes I'm level with the groun',
Sometimes the glory shines aroun',—
Sing Glory Hallelu!"

And so it went on: "Nobody knows de work I does," "Nobody knows de griefs I has," the constant refrain being the "Glory Hallelu!" until the last verse rose:

"Nobody knows de joys I has,
Nobody knows but Jesus!"

"Troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed": it takes great Bible words to tell the cheer of that old negro auntie.

"The House Beautiful" taking for a text, "Except the Lord build the house," begins at the beginning to show how in its very materials it is "a building of God," and then deals with "House-furnishing," what it is that makes Home, the ideal of beauty, flowers, books, and guests. In the section on Books, Mr. Gannett says:—

There are three or four books which a man owes to his family as much as he owes them dinner or clothes—a good newspaper (that is, one new book daily), a good dictionary, a good atlas, and, if he can possibly afford it, a good cyclopædia. A boy asked his mother a difficult question and got the answer, "I don't know." "Well," said he, "I think mothers ought to know. They ought to be well educated, or else have an encyclopædia."

The final section is on "The dear Togetherness," the most important thing of all in furnishing "the House Beautiful," the home love, which makes us "glad that we are alive together." That expression Mr. Gannett takes from "The Story of William and Lucy Smith," of which he speaks as the best love story that he knows among the books, and all the better for being true.

One more quotation we must give from the first paper, "Of Faces and their Making." He has been speaking of how the real beauty of a face comes from within.

Some Quaker eyes are organised spirituality; they bring heaven-thoughts to the simplest or the roughest. "The peace of God that passeth understanding" translates itself through them. A young girl often met a certain old Quaker lady in the horse-car. One day, acting on a sudden impulse, the girl turned and said, "Won't you let me kiss you?" "Yes, dear, certainly." The friendship, thus beginning, ripened, and then the maiden, recalling this quaint first moment of it, asked, "Weren't you surprised that time in the horse-car, when I asked you to let me kiss you?" "O no, dear," was the answer, "they often ask me that."

Have you never had yourself the beautiful surprises of the street—met the man "who had the Ten Commandments written on his face"; seen the face which Bacon speaks of—"a face as of one who pities men"; caught in a girl's fresh morning eyes,

"The look of one who bears away Glad tidings from the hills of day"; or, best of all, upon some happy day beheld

"A sweet attractive kind of grace,
A full assurance given by lookes,
Continuall comfort in a face,
The lineaments of Gospel bookes"?

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

"MAN'S 'POOR RELATIONS.'"

SIR,—I cannot wonder, and certainly do not regret, that some of my vegetarian friends have publicly or privately expressed their interest in my sermon with the above title, published by you, Aug. 25. That they do not find the subject to have been exhaustively treated is, I fear, no uncommon verdict in the case of sermons. May I thank them for their suggestive supplements, and offer a few explanatory remarks?

I find in Mr. Ellis's letter of last week a statement of the function of the preacher which very fairly expresses my own views of the subject. He says that the preacher should "proclaim the principles that he believes should underlie opinions and actions," rather than dictate particular courses of action. Exceptional cases may occur, but this ideal of the general function of the preacher appears wise and healthful; and in dealing with questions of conduct, whether personal or national, I, for one, try to abide by it, and not to lower the pulpit to a one-sided discussion platform. In the sermon referred to, such a general principle was emphasised—the principle of merciful consideration for the animals with which we have to do; and this principle, I urged, should be borne in mind even when we have to kill.

It cannot be doubted that your correspondents on the subject agree fully with this contention. But the crux comes in deciding "when we have to kill," and here opinions and practices differ very seriously. That "there is a time to kill" Mr. Harvie does not deny. In his excellent letter he clearly implies that we may kill our "poor relations" in "actual self-defence." But without stopping to examine the grounds upon which this claim may be justified, other questions press upon us. Is it only in "self-defence" that we may lawfully kill, without breach of the fundamental principles of mercy? Even if it be so, what degree of danger from the animal justifies the act? Is impending loss to our goods, our food, crops, flowers, poultry-farm, a sufficient reason for it? May man's mere comfort, apart from matters of substantial injury, become a fit reason for animal destruction? If it be so in any case, where are the limits? Again, may a man kill for gain—for the feathers, fur, hide, bones, tusks, horns, or other parts of the creature? May he at all kill as a hunter does at times, caring little about the quarry and a great deal about the chase? May he by killing an animal defend it against what he may consider the worse evils of lingering disease—may he kill the dog that he loves too much to see it hopelessly suffer, or the horse that has smashed his fetlock? May a boy kill a butterfly some hours before its normal death on the plea that he wants to add this specimen to his "collection"; or may the man shoot a kingfisher for the town museum?

Here are samples sufficient to illustrate the width and scope of the inquiry as to when man may kill these "poor relations" of his. To them all, as to the matter of killing for food, the same general principle which I sought to express—of merciful swiftness and reasoned judgment in executing "the sentence of death"—appears to me undoubtedly applicable. But the precise action to recommend in any particular class of cases could only be justly indicated after preliminary inquiries which would make a sermon into a treatise. If your columns are open to a discussion on these topics, no doubt it will be interesting and profitable in proportion as it deals with the whole subject of practice in regard to the animal world. It was not in the least my intention to initiate or take part in such a discussion, but to discharge a much humbler, and yet, I trust, a useful function.

But one of my friendly critics tells me that the logical result of a perception of the rights of animals to merciful consideration is that, leaving all other questions of killing untouched, I ought certainly to take no part in killing for food. It has probably occurred to others, it has occurred to myself on previous occasions, to be told by friends that the general principle advocated in a sermon leads inevitably to some particular application to which the several critics most incline. In such cases all one can do is to think the other man entitled to his opinion, and honestly abide by one's own. At the close of another sermon given many years ago on this subject of mercy towards animals, a respected friend of mine, an excellent man of much practical wisdom, declared that I ought to side with him in a crusade against horse-traction. What is life, even to a horse, he asked, without liberty? Human slavery and equine slavery—what distinguishes them? So argued my good friend. Pleading on behalf of mutual helpfulness has drawn forth the remark that one ought to join the Socialists. Upholding the dignity of a freely thinking and independent mind brings me a note claiming me as an ally in an association for promoting as much dissociation as possible. Protesting against the passion for militarism elicits the jubilant exclamation of another man that I have become like him a thorough "Tolstoyan"—or, at least, that logically I ought to become so. It is in keeping with experiences like these to be told that if I plead for mercy I ought not to kill for food.

Nevertheless, I hope that if I keep to my usual diet, I may not be excluded from the gracious theme of kindness, or from such efforts as I can make towards mitigating the evils of the animal world. Vegetarians may be right in their theory that a diet which does not include flesh is best for man. They might be right, if they should plead that, whether it is best or not for man to adopt a vegetarian diet, his doing so would be best for the tribes that now are reared in multitudes and are ultimately killed for food. These and similar questions are arguable. But it is surely not a wise policy to narrow the vision of mercy to one special aspect of it, or to render anyone, not a vegetarian, at all disinclined to raise a voice on behalf of kindness to animals lest he should bring on himself and the majority of his fellows in the ministry a charge of indulging in what one of your correspondents, with an obviously imperfect sense of the meaning of the words, describes as "cannibalistic habits"! W. G. TARRANT.

VEGETARIANISM.

SIR,—We are invited to adopt a vegetarian diet because of the "cruelty" of killing for food "our little brothers and sisters."

What is cruelty? The dictionaries define it as "inflicting unnecessary pain"—a very fair definition, but implying that there is a necessary pain which may be inflicted without cruelty.

How, then, are we to distinguish between pain that is necessary, and that which is unnecessary and cruel? There is no absolute line to be drawn. There never is an absolute line to be drawn between the moral right and wrong of a purely physical action, because moral right and wrong have no connection with purely physical actions. The morality depends entirely upon the motive, the mental purpose, of the actor. The Mosaic law says, baldly, "Thou shalt not kill," which, as it stands, is impracticable, not to say absurd.

A tender-hearted and high-minded woman like Ruth Mills (and we all know her and admire her here for her beautiful and useful life, and her poetic temperament) thinks it cruel to shoot rabbits for food; but how about the black beetles in her kitchen? or the caterpillars and smotherflies in her garden? the mice in the cheese cupboard, or the beautiful tigers that eat our Indian children? The only possible reply is that these little brothers and sisters must be killed when it is necessary for the well-being of the human race. The problem is then narrowed down to the question, Is animal food necessary for the human race? Vegetarians should limit their argument to this point; the cruelty argument is altogether untenable. The value of animal food cannot be proved by any narrow or individual evidence. Individual lives may be maintained for long periods on bread and water. But the broad question can only be settled by statistics and averages and scientific deductions. Let it be remembered that from the very earliest prehistoric times man has been a flesh eater. If there have been certain tribes who from necessity or superstition have lived on vegetable food only, such tribes have been of little account in the world's history. Nutriment for the human body is much more concentrated in flesh than it is in vegetable tissue. Animals which live on grass have to take in vast quantities, and spend most of their time in getting it. In seeds such as corn pulse and nuts, nutriment is much more concentrated, but we have no record of any dominant race which has lived on such food alone.

Man's nearest relatives are the monkeys, and these are vegetable feeders. It seems probable that in some far back age some omnivorous animal had two children of slightly different tastes and habits. One had a leaning towards fruits, the other towards meat. These divers tendencies developed in succeeding generations, one culminating in monkeys, the other in men. If this be true it would seem wise to adhere to our old habit of flesh-eating.

F. T. MOTT.

Crescent House, Leicester, Sept. 2.

ON this subject of Vegetarianism another correspondent writes, sending the following quotation from the late Professor Huxley:—

"It may be worth while to point out that mere chemical analysis is, however, by itself, a very insufficient guide as to the usefulness and nutritive value of an article of food. A substance to be nutritious must not only contain some or other of the above food-stuffs, but contain them in an available, that is a digestible form. A piece of beefsteak is far more nourishing than a quantity of pease-pudding containing even a larger proportion of proteid material, because the former is far more digestible than the latter. And a small piece of dry hard cheese, though of high nutritive value as judged by mere chemical analysis, will not satisfy the more subtle criticism of the stomach."

FREE SPEECH IN THE PULPIT.

SIR,—It is a difficult matter, but permit me to say that I heartily agree, in the main, with Mr. Badland and Mr. Ellis, as to the desirability of keeping Sunday and Church free from the dust of the political arena and "the questions of the day." The minister needs as much as any one the > Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,

> Bridal of earth and sky.

On the other hand, what an upsetting confession an opponent could find in Mr. Ellis's fatal admission: "Ministers are not, as a rule, good advisers in practical matters. . . . It is no fault of theirs: it is incidental to their training and their life." It is rather dreadful to think of—that a minister's training and life make him unpractical. But Mr. Ellis's wishes, if fully carried out, appear to involve that training and life. It is a curious impasse! I sometimes wonder whether the end of it all will be no pulpits and pews, no ministers and churches. But there is a precious golden mean, entirely possible if ministers are not expected to live all the seven days of the week like a sort of cowed third sex—neither women nor men. The minister ought to be "a good soldier" of Jesus Christ, and be ready to stand up for his ideals like a man, from Monday morning to Saturday night, but

> Sundaies the pillars are,
> On which heaven's palace arched lies.
> . . . . . .
> They are the fruitfull beds and borders
> In God's rich garden.

If we will all only discriminate, churches may still go on; but ministers and churches have been terribly discounted lately, with their reeking sacrifices to "The God of Battles."

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SIR,—Allusion has often been made in your columns to the Willaston School, which will open at Nantwich on Sept. 27. Its aims are, therefore, familiar to your readers, and they, I think, approve them.

I venture to call the attention of any who sympathise with us to the need of a library of both reading and reference books for the new school. A grant of a considerable sum from the Governing Body, and a present of some few score volumes from our friend Mr. R. D. Darbishire, has enabled a gratifying start to be made. But the school is already a public school in miniature, and its needs in literature are various and pressing. The library wants books of fiction, biography, history, science, sport, travel, poetry, criticism, and dictionaries and encyclopædias for all kinds of reference. There may be many friends whom yet we do not know, or even among those who have already contributed to the building fund, who will now come forward with welcome assistance in the form of volumes or money, either of which will be very acceptable.

I shall be glad to acknowledge any parcels or contributions received at the school, or to help intending donors by information as to books already possessed or promised. GUY LEWIS.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From William Smith's "Gravenhurst."

ALL the apocalyptic visions you have ever read cannot rival a meadow in springtime. That simple field, with its buttercups and clover blossoms, outshines the imagination of all the poet-prophets that have ever lived. Thank God, all you who have a spark of rational piety in your hearts, for the glorious commonplace of earth and sky—for this cloud-embosomed planet in which you pass your lives.

An interesting race, these human beings. As I pass the meadow, I lean upon the gate that opens into it; I see a little child, almost an infant, toddling alone in the high grass. The tall buttercups have outgrown the child; they and the ox-eyed daisies shut out from its view that neighbouring cottage which is its home; the child has lost its way amidst the flowers it had come to gather, knows not where to turn in this jungle of soft grass. I hear a plaintive cry of distress. Another child, some two years older, as I guess, runs to its aid, caresses, calms it; leads it back to the cottage home of both. How prettily it protects!—how proudly!—seeing that this older one can look above the grass. You perceive that the little fond, and sympathetic, and imitative creature has learnt that tender care from their common mother; you note with a smile the already complex sentiment (sense of power mingled with love) revealed in that protection; you observe how soon the thread of life, and even when it is silken-soft, is spun of pain and pleasure; you know, moreover, that beneath the thatch of that cottage, to which these children hand-in-hand are walking, there beats some true and tender mother-heart, the source of this love to one another—some tender heart whose very anxieties you would hardly dare to diminish.

. . . . .

Of course we make our outcries against the miseries of life; and there is real evil and indisputable sorrow amongst us. But we strike down the evil where we can, and we soothe the sorrow where we can. And then this energy with which we strike, and this tenderness with which we soothe—I think we should not, after due deliberation, forfeit these for an immunity from pain and sorrow. Some evils, you will say, do not prompt action—rouse no energy—are simply to be endured. Well, this endurance conquers them, wrings a strength and pride out of them. They prompt this energy of fortitude. I go back to the meadow where I saw the children amongst the flowers. Childhood itself shall give my illustration. Some days afterwards I encountered the eldest one alone; she did not perceive me; I could watch her unobserved. There was a very luxuriant crop of nettles growing beside the hedge. I saw her put her little tender hand, slowly and deliberately, to the leaf of the stinging nettle. She wanted to try if she could bear the pain. The grave little Spartan! I asked her if she knew that the nettle stung. "Oh, yes! she knew it"; but added, blushing, partly with pain and partly at being observed, "mother says that unless we can bear pain we shall be cowards and useless people. I wanted to try—it is not so very bad." Ah, little Annie Foster! there was no need to go in search for the nettle. But you bore the trial well, and greater trials, I doubt not, you will bear bravely. Again I draw the inference that there was a brave as well as tender mother bestirring herself under the thatch of that cottage.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Picture to yourselves a bright, crisp, clear sunshiny day in the beginning of May; fancy that a black waiter, with smiling face, has just seen you out of the comfortable hotel where you had arrived late the night before; and now, that you have turned down the wooden pathway by the side of a short road which leads you on to a stretch of greenery, with many a yellow flowering shrub dotted here and there. What do you see on the other side of the greenery? Water. Is it a river? Not an ordinary river, anyway; for instead of the water going quietly on, smoothly and sedately on its way, it dashes and scrambles along very noisily, every now and again bearing on its surface huge blocks of ice which, in spite of the rocky boulders which try to hinder their passage, it carries off in triumph and hurries away and away, right out of sight.

Ah! here we come to a bridge. Let us cross over. How the water hisses and boils as it surges below! The bridge goes across one or two tiny islets which interrupt the flow of the river, and now we reach Goat Island, where the bridge ends. Goat Island! what a pretty little bit of woodland it is, with its pathways winding in and out amid trees and grass; there is the delicate anemone peeping out, and here are other little wild-flowers. "Do not harm the shrubs and flowers" is written on the board we are just passing; no, indeed, we will not, for it is all so beautiful that we want everyone who comes to enjoy it as much as we are doing.

And now, do you want to know where we are, and whither I am leading you? Look on that board and see what it says: "To the Horse-shoe Falls and the Three Sister Islands." Can you guess where you are? No. Listen: Do you hear a big, rushing sound? Follow the path on—on—a little further. Now, now! Oh, the glory of that view. See the dash of snow-white feathery spray as it falls over, down a drop of 160 feet, into a boiling cauldron below. And look! as it falls the spray catches the sunlight and, even as we are speaking, behold one, two, three rainbows appear over the Falls.

You have guessed by this time where you are, I think. Only the wonderful Falls of Niagara could bring us such a marvellous picture of dash, and noise, of onward rush as this—Niagara, whose very name, meaning "Thunder of Waters," proclaims its character. Let us stand and watch it for a little while; we do not want to speak—words are too cold and tame—but we want to "drink in" the scene with our whole being, silent before such a revelation of awful grandeur.

No wonder that the Indian tribes who used to live round about believed that these falls were some Great Spirit; they thought he was so mighty and revengeful that he needed to be propitiated by human sacrifice. It is said that, in former times, once a year a maiden would be bound down in a frail boat which was sent along the stream until it reached the green curve of water bending over the top of the Falls; and then down, down, down it went; far, far below the surface of the water, which there drops quite 200 ft.; so deep, indeed, is the drop that the water above is not troubled in the least by the mighty rush, but lies in sluggish fashion above, quite heedless of the tumult underneath. Yonder little steamer, the Maid of the Mist, would have taken us for a little trip around almost under the very Falls themselves, had we made our visit a fortnight later; but its season has not begun yet.

Now let us turn away from the Falls and walk round the pretty little Goat Island. You see it just stands in the pathway of the river, dividing it into two parts; the bank which faces us on the north side is Canada, whose people are fellow subjects with ourselves of Queen Victoria—indeed, the Park which runs along the shore is called by her name; while if we look south, and face the hotel where we slept last night, it is American soil that we see. And so the two nations both enjoy the privilege of touching this great Wonder of Nature, and the two big Falls are called the American and the Canadian Falls respectively.

The morning has gone and we are still on Goat Island; we hurry back to Prospect House to dinner where we are waited on by our friendly black waiter who hovers around, ready to do anything we want. Indeed, he even goes a little further than that; for we flinch rather as he takes up a potato in its skin and, holding it in his black hands—which we hope are clean—breaks it into our plate. We feel that we should have preferred doing that for ourselves, but he looks so happy and smiling over it all, that we soon look happy too.

Dinner over, back we go to Niagara, and this time we follow the stream as it leaves the Falls. By degrees the sluggishness which we noted this morning changes to ripples, as the bubbling mass of water below gradually makes its way to the surface until—the river becoming narrower—the billows mount higher and higher, and the Rapids, as they are called, rush rioting onwards, pushing and fighting and tumbling over each other until they seem to eddy round like seething oil; whirling, whirling, whirling, and sucking in anything and everything with which they come in contact. It is on these Rapids that Captain Webb, the great swimmer, was rash enough to venture, and it was here that he lost his life.

Do you want to get nearer to those wonderful Falls before we go back? Well, then, we will cross this bridge here; and now we are actually in Canada, walking along the Queen Victoria Park, facing the American Falls. How fortunate we are! The afternoon sun is streaming over the water, and a glorious rainbow stretches across from one Fall to the other, uniting the two by one beautiful arch. The lighting is perfect.

Here is Table Rock House. We go in and are helped into waterproof garments that cover us in from top to toe. How comical we look, to be sure! Now we are let down in a lift by the side of the rock; and now, we are actually on a ledge, holding the steady hand of the guide. A curtain of spray is falling in front, and every now and then some roguish river imp seems to be playing a practical joke, for oh! such a cold douche of water comes dashing over us. How lucky for us we are so well protected; as it is it is only our faces that catch the shower bath, and we draw our breath and feel rather like "little Johnnie head-in-air" when he was drawn out of the water. But as we afterwards remove our dripping waterproofs we are glad to feel that we have really been in contact with the mighty Niagara itself; and as we re-cross the bridge and make our way back, our hearts and heads are full, and we gaze and gaze in silent awe and reverence at the wonderful scene to which we promise ourselves another visit to-morrow.

HOLIDAY MEMORIES.

" AND he wandered away and away,
With Nature, the dear old nurse,
Who sang to him night and day
The rhymes of the universe."

So LONGFELLOW sang of AGASSIZ, the naturalist. It is a beautiful companionship. " Mother Nature " we like to say, for we feel at home here on the green earth ; we have our own place amid all the varied life that is about us. And in the open country we can be more perfectly surrendered to the influence of Nature, and let her myriad voices speak to us. We feel the fresh life quickening our blood, nerving us with new strength, filling us with more vivid delight.

By the seashore there is the fresh salt breeze and the constant music of the breaking waves, or the silent harmony of a perfect calm ; there are the long stretches of level sand, or the splendid cliffs and rocky headlands of a broken coast ; and then there is the fairy-land under the clear, still waters of little creeks and bays, or pools among the rocks, where a new world seems to have its own forests and gardens of wondrous growth. Or, if the wind is up, and breakers are dashed upon the rocks, there is that glorious tumult, and the vigorous delight of standing against the storm. Then, with all the changing colours of the sea and the sky, there is always the beautiful contrast of the friendly land, with its green meadows and, perhaps, wooded hills in sight. One sees it from the shore, but with what far greater joy, if it is the first token of home-coming, after a long voyage out of sight of land !

But " the strength of the hills is his also," and inland, among the mountains, one finds no less a boundless wealth of beauty and delight. The strength of the hills, that is what one feels when standing in their midst, perhaps from some great height looking over ridge upon ridge, tracing the lines of the valleys, as they run up into hidden recesses, or where the pass goes over into further lands—the great forms of the mountains lying there silent and immovable, as they have been for countless ages, and yet with a meaning and purpose which are not dead. For down their slopes flow the living waters, and the meadows are green where the sheep and cattle graze, while below are cultivated fields and gardens, and the homesteads of a hardy race dotted about or gathered into little villages. One sees how the mountains make the land what it is. Here are some of the first lines of a great purpose, which has formed and moulded the earth, rich in treasures to be gained by patient strenuous labour, a fit home for brave and faithful men.

But this is not all of which the mountains speak to us. While we read in their silent steadfastness this good purpose, and like to think of them as the bones and sinews of our land, they have a life of their own, apart from our special human interest—a life of grandeur and beauty—and it is in companionship with these that we find the special delight of a holiday among the hills. There is so much to uplift the heart, such visions of calmness and strength, such largeness of view, and often in the marvellous lights and shadows of sunset, such purity and peace. We say, there is a voice in the silence and the solitude, a presence among the hills ; Nature is speaking to us in parables. And so she does : but in truth it is the voice and it is the presence of the living GOD.

While we are enjoying a glorious ascent, or threading our way along some charming valley, we do not, perhaps, think of it. We are simply given over to the pleasure of the moment—and it does us good. It is rest. It is re-invigoration. But then we come to feel that we are filled with new life, we realise the greater strength and capacity of our manhood, and are eager for fresh service. And there comes to us quiet moments in which it is clear who has given us this life—who through that keen air breathes new vigour into us, who in the solemn silence of the hills, in the beauty of which we have no words to speak, come with a benediction upon our souls. Thus in the solitude we are with Him, and He shows to us of the infinite riches of His loving kindness.

Whether it is among the mountains or down by the sea, or in any quiet, beautiful country place, the truth comes home to us with new vividness : This is the temple of His praise. We are glad to go up into it, and give thanks to Him.

MISTS ON THE CUMBERLAND FELLS.

AFTER three days of brilliant sunshine and unclouded sky, the mists gathered about Great Gable and Scawfell Pike, drifted over Eskdale, covered the heights of Bow Fell and Rossett Crag, and then crept slowly down into the vale that lies between the Langdale Pikes and Pike O'Blisco.

It was Sunday, and I had thought to go over the lower fells from Dungeon Ghyll to Easedale, and so down into Grasmere, and perhaps to the old church there, in which, for more than fifty years, Wordsworth had loved to worship. But the gathering mists changed my purpose, and I went up the valley at the head of Great Langdale to watch them as they wreathed the heights and moved, silent and shadowy, along the slopes.

How wonderful is the change which these masses of soft, grey vapour effect among the hills, where is their native home. The summits, showing here and there above them, look so much higher, and the crags, now hidden and now bare, seem more sternly rugged than when the sky is clear, and the sunlight clothes them. The Langdale Pikes that Sunday morning took on a majesty of impressive power, such as, being of no great height, a stranger to them had not thought to see. And once, when the long, slanting edge of Stickle Pike was visible as a sharp black line, cutting the grey folds of mist high up towards the hidden sky, a sense of the grandeur and mystery of mountain forms was borne in upon the mind.

As morning drew towards noon and the mists crept lower, it was curious to watch them flow through the deep gullies which the streams, or Ghylls, as the Dalesmen call them, had worn into the mountain sides. I saw one of them, when about half way down, suddenly reach an arm across, at a sharp right angle to its course ; and this continued over the slope until it reached another ghyll, thus joining the two downward currents of vapour. A great square was thus marked off on the side of the hill, the top of which was hidden in dense cloud. This dark square mass, edged by the pale mist steadily flowing on three sides, had a quite indescribable effect, when, for a while, no other part of the mountains in that direction could be seen. Some grand mysterious massiveness seemed veiled, and yet unveiled there, filling the mind with an awful and strange joy. Presently, from far up the valley, a dark form winged its way out of the gloom, and a raven, silent as the mist, went by and disappeared behind a crag. It was the living spirit of those solitudes, and gave to the scene and the occasion the last touch of mystery and wildness.

Gradually, as the day advanced, the vapours grew more dense and more enshrouding. Peak after peak was hidden, and all the higher slopes were folded in, and the steady rain fell, and the streams became more strong in volume and in voice. Wandering there in that vast temple, whose walls were mountains, whose incense-clouds were the wreathing mists, whose music was the gently falling rain and the sound of rushing waters, a deep glad feeling of worship and of fellowship took possession of the soul. A calmness, great and profound, came over the mountain solitudes and brooded in the moist air of the valleys. The inner unity of Nature and of Life made itself real to thought, and the sacred solemn harmonies of the world could be more clearly heard. The peace which is within and above the discord and confusion of things seemed to pervade that lonely place, and made it strangely good to be there. The happiness of something more than hope came into the mind—a silent and unsought beatitude of love. Surely, then, the opposing strife and conflict of the elements, in man and Nature, are only apparent; the inner unity alone is real. Some great friendliness of being dwells amid the turmoil of affairs. Those soft yielding mists and those rugged moveless hills are as unlike as things could well be fashioned. The hard outlines of the one, the plastic, pliant folds of the other, seem strangely opposed. Yet how they blend and harmonise; how glorious the effects which their unity of contrast creates; how wonderful the play of those passing vapours around the forms of solid mountain and unyielding crag. The fellowship of things so different, so alien in appearance one to another, wrought thus in majesty and splendour of surpassing grace! Even so is it with all life, when, in moments of clear vision and calm thought, we see it aright.

A few days later, at high noontide, after a morning of storm and of drenching rain, a last sight of those same hills was granted me. It was from the top of Orrest Head, above Windermere. Behind, to the east, a great cloud hung, black and threatening, with low mutterings of thunder, its side nearest the sun edged with brilliant light. Below, to the south and west, the long winding lake lay calm and clear after the rain, its islands reflected in the still bright waters. Far beyond, in the west, the Great Fells stood out—the highest still crowned with mist, the lower slopes dark purple, lined with silver where the streams and torrents hurried down. Above and behind them all, vast white cumulus clouds were piled up in irregular masses, like higher hills built into the sky itself. So in their splendour I left them—the vision thereof a joy for other days, a help mid other scenes.

W. J. J.

THE TWO CROWNS.

BY THE REV. H. SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

"Now there went with him great multitudes, and he turned and said unto them: If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father and mother, and wife and children, and brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."—Luke xiv. 25, 26.

THIS is one of the sayings of Jesus which we are in the habit of treating as an exaggeration. Some think that Jesus can never have uttered such language. Certainly, it is practically disregarded by those who consider themselves his disciples. Nevertheless, there is a meaning in these words which we need not doubt was in the mind of Christ, and it is a meaning which we should understand before talking lightly about Christian discipleship. To help us realise what this meaning is, let me describe a picture in the Royal Academy. It is a picture which aims at the expression of a profound religious truth; it is painted by one of the best of our living artists—we have far too few such pictures by such men. Whether it has fully realised its high aim is a question on which there may be difference of opinion. I do not attempt to deal with it as an art critic, but merely to speak about what it said to me as a preacher.

The picture is called "The Two Crowns." The centre is occupied by the figure of a young king on horseback. The white horse is a noble animal, proudly conscious of honourable service. The king's armour is magnificently painted, and indicates the splendid warrior of the Middle Ages. His face is turned full towards you, and it is a good face, the face of a strong earnest man who means to do what he believes to be right. He is a king who will govern as well as reign, and do his best to govern well. We may take it that he will seek to fulfil the words of our Prayer-book, making his country "the stronghold of right, the refuge of the oppressed and the moderator of lawless ambition." Gathered around him, and forming part of a grand procession, are his people, joyous and trustful; the look of admiration and loyalty is on every face. He can command a willing service, he can count on enthusiastic support. On his head he wears a crown, one of the Two Crowns. It is made with gold, and richly set with flashing jewels. It is the symbol of wealth and power; yes, and of all that wealth and power may command when wisely, rightly used. There is no hint of evil on this side of the contrast, and that is what makes the other side so infinitely impressive. For the other Crown is the Crown of Thorns worn by Jesus on the Cross. By the road along which the procession is passing there stands a tall crucifix—familiar object in a Roman Catholic country—and the Christ whose kingdom is not of this world, dying on his Cross of agony, meets the eyes of the young man whose kingdom is of this world, and who rides past, every pulse throbbing with strength and joy.

The picture conveys a profound truth. Take the greatest and most successful monarch who has ever reigned upon earth—perhaps Charlemagne, or anyone else whom your knowledge of history leads you to suppose has done most good in the world. His achievements, however great they may be, shrink into insignificance compared with the influence exerted by Jesus dying on the Cross; an influence which has been steadily growing for nearly 1900 years, and which we cannot doubt will continue to grow for thousands of years to come, for it is an influence won over human hearts. Raise the glory of the earthly Crown as high as there is any warrant in all history, nay, as high as your historical imagination can conceive, and it will not approach the actual sober facts which tell of the divine glory won by Jesus on the Cross of absolute self-surrender.

Now we may see what Jesus meant by those words when a great multitude went with him, and he told them on what terms a man could be his disciple. Jesus meant that the work he was about to do could be done only in the way he was about to adopt, the way of utter self-sacrifice. Jesus meant that his own way of establishing the Kingdom of God upon earth was the way of self-renunciation and non-resistance; and that this multitude, who wanted to be his followers, but also to settle the way he was to go, could not be his disciples. To follow him, they must be willing to go his way; which was the way of non-resistance, leading to the Cross. On other occasions, Jesus required poverty as a condition of discipleship. This was a counsel of obvious prudence. If you are not to resist a man robbing you of your coat, but to let him have your shirt also, it is obviously best to hold no property which can possibly excite cupidity. Sell all that you have, give to the poor, and then it will be comparatively easy to follow Jesus. And it will be comparatively easy to hate one's own life. This is no uncommon state with those who have failed to attain every object of their desire. There are many who have sought for worthy objects, and have tried hard to attain them, and have failed in one after another; it makes little difference whether they have failed through their own fault or not. Assuredly it is not love of life which keeps them in this world, but a sense of duty. Their service is to stand and wait the summons of their Lord. All this is comparatively easy, at any rate, to those who believe in a future life of Heavenly happiness; and there have been thousands of Christian disciples equal to all this. The real difficulty begins with those relations of domestic life to which Jesus referred when he said, "If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brothers and sisters, he cannot be my disciple." We need not press the word "hate." We do not forget that the religion of Jesus is the religion of love. If we are to love our enemies, we are not forbidden to love our best friends. But Jesus meant something by those terrible words. At any rate, he meant that the honour due to father and to mother, the love claimed by wife and child, the affection which binds together brothers and sisters, must all come second to something else, that all their interests must be sacrified if this is demanded by the principle of non-resistance and the King's Highway of the Holy Cross.

An important consequence follows the recognition of this order of obligation. A man cannot choose whether he will have a father and mother, or brothers and sisters. He can choose whether he will marry a wife, and be responsible for the rearing of children; and a man is a dishonourable coward and an utter fool, if he thinks he can do this and at the same time be a follower of Jesus along the way that Jesus went. To sacrifice yourself is one thing, to sacrifice others for whom you have made yourself responsible is quite another thing. Jesus left his home at Nazareth, left his mother and his brethren—and how great a wrench that must have been we can guess from what we know of the depths of his loving nature—but Jesus never married, never gave any human being the right to claim his protection, and he warned off various disciples who wished to follow him without understanding what this involved. There was a certain work for God to be done by wearing the Crown of Thorns. That is what Jesus did, and he has had many followers who have done similar work in the same way. The influence of this principle of non-resistance and self-sacrifice is enormous when the self-surrender is complete; and where there is perfect love of God and absolute faith in heaven, there are many willing to follow where Jesus has led the way.

We may well wish that a modern attempt to bring Christianity to China had been made in this spirit. There have been centuries in the Christian era when it would have seemed the natural thing for missionaries to undertake such work in the same way as Jesus. They would have gone as priests and monks, and perhaps as nuns; certainly not as married men and women. Some of them would have been martyred, but the Crown of Thorns might have won the victory if it had had the field to itself, and the cause of Christianity had not been stained by association with opium and gunpowder. It is not so easy to introduce Christianity a little at a time, mixed up with things of a very different character.

But is this the only form of discipleship to Jesus? Is no true Christianity possible to that young king wearing his crown of gold and jewels, and girt with his sword wherewith to make his country "the stronghold of right, the refuge of the oppressed, and the moderator of lawless ambition?" Is it equally impossible for modern representative government, with its magistrates and policeman, to follow Jesus? It is impossible for any organised human society to follow Jesus in doing the work he did by the way he did it. Such discipleship makes it impossible for any man save a scoundrel or a fool to marry a wife, for any woman to wish to be a mother. But is that what God requires and Christianity demands? "No," you will answer, "it is not." The monasteries of early Christianity may have been needed for a time, but they did not establish the Kingdom of God upon earth; and long before the Reformation came, they were hindrances, not helps, to the spread of pure religion. Christianity cannot require that multitudes of disciples should hold themselves free to follow Christ along precisely that path which Jesus trod. We are not to be content with renouncing the kingdoms of the world, and letting them become the prey of whatever evil has sufficient force to seize them. We are to win the kingdoms of the world for God. Very well, that is the conclusion to which we have all practically come. But it leaves us face to face with a problem of immense difficulty, the very existence of which is, nevertheless, generally ignored by those who talk lightly about following Jesus and carrying out the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. We have, each one of us, to decide how far we ought to follow Jesus, up to what point we ought to take his example for our imitation. We have to do this after having taken into account our present position, with all the responsibilities which, as a matter of fact, we have assumed. We need not wonder that there should be great diversity of opinion among equally good men when they have to solve this problem of more or less imitation of Christ. Let us further realise that following Jesus in self-sacrifice must be entirely an affair of individual determination and execution. It cannot be done by a Committee, a Town Council, a Parliament. It cannot be done by any one person in his capacity as trustee. However willing we may be to sacrifice ourselves, this is not the same thing as sacrificing others whom we have the power to save, and for whose safety we are responsible. This is a very simple truth, but it is perpetually being ignored by people who talk of Christianity being the same for nations as for individuals, and of Governments acting in accordance with the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. We do great harm to our consciences by talking of Christ's precepts as if we ought all to follow them, in our corporate as well as in our private capacity, while we never make any attempt to do this practically, or even feel any real obligation to make the attempt. What we do feel are binding on us in every capacity in which we may have to act are the eternal principles of Righteousness. But these are not exclusively Christian. They are universal as Humanity. They were the aim of the Heathen Roman Empire, and, considering the times, were sometimes realised there with a fair measure of success.

One final thought. We often hear complaints that good government wins little love or gratitude from those whom it benefits. Such complaints are unreasonable. The ruler whose kingdom is of this world can never hope, be he mediæval monarch or modern representative government, to win and wear the Crown of Thorns. He must be content with doing justly, and loving mercy, and walking humbly with his God. He must cleave fast to the eternal principles of Righteousness. Such is the Crown of Glory for him whose kingdom is of this world. Let him not hope to win much gratitude or love. The victory over the human heart, the victory which takes captive human admiration and affection, rising into adoration, is reserved for him who wears the Crown of Thorns. It is the Cross of Christ which has changed human nature.

"RICORDO DI PERUGIA."

The outlook upon the Umbrian plain and Tiber valley from the Perugian hilltop is one whose beauty neither pen nor pencil can reproduce. Difficult, too, is it to convey, even in part, the charm of poetic, historic, and also transient, present association with which the broad landscape, the nearer nestling town, and the immediate city piazza teems. A multitude of impressions contribute to the general pleasure sensation that is experienced in the apprehension of all the stimulating, inspiring beauty that is here so lavishly revealed. To realise the sources of a few of these may perhaps serve but to increase the appreciation of it.

First of all, the blue sky of Italy, and the luminous white clouds that course the heavens and lend their aid, in purple shadows on the plain to the harmony of colour in the landscape. Then the rounded opalescent hills; noble, diverse, individual in shape, yet blending in a homogeneous, unbroken, waving outline, of which the faintest part between two heavily shaded curves—Subasio and a sister hill—is formed by sharper indented snow-covered peaks which recall the Sabines. They are further away, and they do not belong in character to this landscape; they are fitter to look upon Rome and its Campagna—upon scenes of greater activity, the strife of contending forces through all time in the progress of the world—than on this more peaceful land; where, to be sure, though one easily forgets it to-day, peace has not always reigned nor the suave rule of the benign St. Francis obtained—where, indeed, the gleaming white cities have fought for mastery, though now on their respective hilltops they sit like brooding doves. But in this valley it has been the small things that have been fought for, the trivialities that men magnify, as ants may do the obstacles in the way of their hurrying scramble to attain their paltry ends. Such have been the bones of contention in this land, and not the great soul-stirring, powerful principles, the clash of whose contending forces has resounded where the snow-clad peaks look down on the arena of some of the world's greatest moral conflicts—Rome.

Peace there is now on the Umbrian plain, and the cities that crown the hilltops or spread themselves cosily over the fertile slopes look, indeed, like gentle doves upon their nests as they gleam in the afternoon sun. Spoleto in the far distance, Spello, Monte Falco, Foligno in the plain, and nearer at hand Assisi, are so many white patches. But, once invested with individuality, they appear to smile joyfully at one another, giving each other greeting. Time was when each was busy with her own aggrandisement, which meant the despoiling if not the destruction of her neighbour; when each vied with each in wile and stratagem to outwit, to conquer, and to wrest the small advantages each was bent on acquiring. Each had her men-at-arms, her leaders, her great men; none the less great because their sphere and their fame were sometimes circumscribed by their own city walls, and certainly in few cases reached beyond its immediate neighbourhood. But the names and the feats of each city's captains, defenders, gonfaloniers and feudal lords are treasured and honoured by each. The city's history is the history of her lords and noted citizens; and her fame is in the successful enterprises in which these engaged against the neighbouring cities and their own counterparts therein. The glory of each city's lord was achieved in the struggle and victory of his armed host with and over that of a neighbouring baron of the country-side. And the individual memories that lend lustre to their respective annals should be treasured by these cities for the very reason that henceforward their history shall be written collectively under the name of Italy. Perhaps it is the consciousness of having reached a safe harbour after the long tossing through tempestuous ages on a sea of vicissitude, that causes them to-day to smile at one another so benignly. One point of rivalry they yet possess, however, that of the tablets and statues they vie with each other in rearing to the memory of the Liberators of the Fatherland, and to commemorate the passage of one of these great men through their precincts.

It is a far cry back to the thirteenth century, to the days of St. Francis of Assisi; and wider than the actual space in time would seem to be the distance that separates the thought of the nineteenth century from that in which the "Canticle of the Sun" was written. Yet perchance its author, in the phraseology of his Christian Pantheism, expresses more acceptably the essence of the humanitarianism of the present day than do the rational eclectics of our own time. Here at least might be found the meeting-ground of vastly diverse centuries, and the reason for the revived interest in and appreciation of St. Francis in this age.

Assisi gleams in the afternoon sunlight, and a moment ago a passing cloud cast its shadow upon the village so that the church of St. Francis alone stood out in high light, eclipsing the buildings behind it. And another spot of intense light low down in the plain was Santa Maria degli

Angeli, the Porziuncula, which is never hidden. It may be seen at all hours and times, rising up a white mass amid the dark verdure of the plain; and it never fails, as it meets my eye at least, to recall that "Fioretto" wherein is described the feast of St. Clara with St. Francis there; and how the wood about seemed to the inhabitants of the surrounding hills to burn; and it was the glow of spiritual grace, the ardour of divine love in those there assembled which caused the glory that was seen, and not the material fire which could consume and destroy. One can fancy St. Francis walking endlessly over the fair country, journeying from village to village, from one retreat to another, caring for the spiritual welfare of the brothers he established in them; working for the conversion of the villagers in all the country round about, performing acts of mercy and deeds of love which took on the grace of miracles with the halo of divine interposition around them, in the mind of the simple folk, and as such were garnered in their memory, from which later they blossomed anew in the "Fioretti," gathered and preserved for all time by reverent and devoted hands. The sweet savour of that life lends enchantment to this country-side, where the saint, the seer of visions, the transcendentalist was evolved from the youth of compassionate heart, loving impulse, and tender reverence. Who shall say in what measure the fair peaceful country, filled with so much evidence of God's special bounty in its rare beauty and fertility, contributed to mould the character after it had determined the disposition of this "meek servant of Christ" (poverello di Cristo), as he loved to style himself?

Certain it is that on those long journeyings up and down the Umbrian hills to the numberless little hamlets that they bear, much time and much inspiration he must have had for meditation and reflection in the earliest days, before his course was made plain, on troublous questions which assailed his mind and heart for solution; and later, when he had set all doubts at rest by electing to follow Christ simply and solely without deviation in the smallest particular from his conception of the evangelical life, on the compiling of the rule, whereby all men should be brought to the knowledge of that in which a righteous and holy life consists. Later still his thoughts must have been occupied with the practical details accompanying the founding of the retreats. And last of all we must sorrowfully think of him in renewed trial and distress of mind, when Papal disapproval, dissensions in the order, departures from his austere rule, darkened his declining days. Let us not pause on this scene. It represents, alas! the fate of all great movements impelled to their zenith by the inspired force of their leaders, and destined to sure decline by the less noble action of presumptuous followers. A time comes later when they reach the level wherein they best fulfil the requirements of humanity; a level beyond and below which the zeal of enthusiastic supporters and the ill-will of jealous critics have meanwhile respectively exalted and debased them. It is pleasanter to picture this sweet soul absorbed in the contemplation of things celestial, removed from the haunts of men in some place of seclusion, some forest retreat where, mingled with his prayers and devotions, the influence of Nature which he loved so well spoke to him in the murmur of the leaves, the songs of the birds, and the gleam of sun and stars overhead. Often in the "Fioretti" are these retreats spoken of; and one can fancy them as leafy bowers chosen and appointed by the saint as the temples of his meditations. Well may the little hill-town be proud of this gentle son. He is the epitome, the impersonation of this peaceful smiling country—as it is to-day—not as it was in the days of strife and contention. Great and penetrating, indeed, must have been the power and influence in its own time, which has glorified Assisi in the hearts of succeeding generations, which caused the rearing of San Francesco, inspired Giotto's wondrous frescoes, and keeps alive the spirit of the Brotherhood, so that it counts its adherents by thousands, so that it builds costly convents to shelter them, and plays a part in the lives of the rich and noble, by means of its "Third Order" to this day.

Assisi lives still on this memory, and not even the waves of nineteenth-century progress that beat down the barriers of prejudice and custom and dissolve the links of association so relentlessly, have ever been able to overcome or even to dilute the spirit of mediævalism which pervades its desert streets and somnolent "palazzi." How can one think Assisi was ever the scene of busy mercantile life, or that it offered opportunities for the riotous living in which the saint's years of young manhood were passed. It is more credible that these latter were dark touches added later to heighten the merits of his renunciation, to define more sharply the contrast between the human being and the saint when the son of Pietro Bernardone attained to the fulness of honour through beatification. The dome and expanse of wall, always aggressive and prominent in the plain, do not speak to one of the life lived at the Porziuncula. That retreat amid the "wood" so often mentioned in the "Fioretti," so beautifully imagined and described by Sabatier, with its characteristics of retirement, seclusion, and austerity, is in nowise recalled by the opulent basilica which rears its inartistic mass prominently on the plain. This, however, is only the case when viewed from a distance; nearer acquaintance reveals a greater charm in pious association.

The Tiber leads to Rome; hence in the glimpses of its reaches it but suggests the change and strife of Rome turned capital with the dignity of having been the jewel most coveted, dearest bought, and last to be acquired for the Crown of United Italy. Other than this the Tiber may speak to some of remote times, but always of invasion, of conquest, of battle; and always concerning Rome. Here and there, upon the sloping hillside, gently bearing down to the plain, are to be seen villas in their gardens. The vineyards and groves belonging to each secure the privacy of its inmates who, doubtless, are varied as to social station and general prosperity. Within the walls of each, doubtless, are being, and have been, enacted the life-drama of noble and simple. These villas lend "the touch of nature that makes the whole world kin," the homeliness of every-day existence in all lands alike, to the scene whose speech has hitherto been in classic periods. Might we but listen to what passes behind those close shut blinds in the cool, shaded rooms from which the hot summer sun is carefully excluded, we might hear—and, perhaps, with relief—a lighter strain of lyric verse sung sweetly, serenely, sincerely, in indifference to, and oblivion of the grander but less human harmonies without.

San Pietro thrusts its picturesqueness on the view, quite near at hand, a jutting bastion from the fortress that is the town. An anomaly is here to be noted, for if the church's calm shelters a few of Perugino's and his pupils' sweet saints, Madonnas and angels, hard by, alas! to-day is the ground allotted for gun-practice. The bare black target is too nigh, and the shocks of repeated shots shake the venerable building too irreverently at times. It is one of those relentless waves of which mention was made above. So are the barracks, swarming with soldiers; so are the cavalry barracks, where the horses stand picketed in the shady court all ready for exercise and drill; so are the quarters of the Royal Carabineers, very important personages, and right royally lodged. But we forgive the waves their ravages when we are wakened betimes these lovely summer mornings by the strains of martial music that announce the exit of all this military multitude to execute its daily drill and parade on the Piazza d'Armi, which we overlook. The shrill, blatant trumpets mingle with the more sonorous brass of the regular band and the measured beat of drums, to swell the enlivening sound to which the battalions march from barrack to campus. Like machinery in motion, these rows of drilling human beings appear from the height at which we view them; and the officers moving, too, on horseback are puppet-like and unindividual. It is all over—this hour of play at the first principles of warfare—quickly and quietly, and the drums, trumpets, and horns sound the return march. By eight o'clock the men are safely back in barracks, ere the sun has had time to dispel the mists of the valley, to temper the chill, bracing morning air, or to make his rays uncomfortably felt. The officers come slowly up the hill later, in twos and threes, walking their horses and sufficiently in advance of their orderlies to discuss undisturbed the progress of the fresh recruits, and the wider topics into which the conversation drifts. They are dusty and they are in fatigue dress, but they appear thereby but the better and more efficient officers and workers.

There is a great, blank, styleless building which presents one of its bare faces to our gaze. It is of a nondescript order of architecture, and its dismal aspect is intensified by the permanently closed shutters of its windows. They are like the closed eyes of a corpse, and the resemblance extends, for expressionlessness, to the entire edifice. It is the new town hall—the Municipio—which only wakes to life once a year at the meeting of the provincial legislature. It seems too large, too extensive, too ponderous for the function it is required to fill. It is unwieldy, and perhaps thereby it prefigures the complex and still unsystematised order of things which reigns in the governmental processes of Italy.

Last remains to be mentioned the "Giardino Publico," immediately below the window. One may easily count the trees and shrubs of which it is composed. But though it be small in area it represents the meeting-place, the "Corso" of all Perugia, and on a Sunday afternoon it and the adjoining "Piazza del Municipio" are crowded with loiterers come out to see and be seen, who satisfiedly promenade within these narrow limits, secure in the irreproachableness of their provincially fashionable attire and the equally proper and conventional mode of their present pastime. It is so pleasurable, this sense of perfect satisfaction; no troubling doubt, no disturbing uncertainty as to the aspect of one's bearing and conduct in others' eyes. It is this reposeful sentiment which contributes doubtless largely to stamp on the features of the Peruginese the mark of tranquility and imperturbability; no shadow of nervousness or restlessness is there, only, perhaps, as Perugino has so well depicted in the reproductions of his townspeople turned into saints and Madonnas, a gentle surprise, a vague, but perfectly calm, wonder, backed always by entire complacency.

The soldiers are quietly performing their duties in the courts of the barracks, the watchful "guardie" pace slowly, lazily through the "Giardino Publico," and lean occasionally against the parapet gazing vaguely down upon the winding road beneath and out beyond over the wide expanse of plain. Quietly an old man goes about his business of cleaning the already spotless streets. Peace and calm reign everywhere; hurry and bustle are unknown to this dignified population, and if thereby they fail to advance much in the world's march, they gain by the gentle pace at which they move pleasurable benefits by the way which we pass over or forget to note. They accept and possess the peace which we strive to attain.

OF GREATNESS.

"UNIVERSAL History, the history of what man has accomplished in this world," says Carlyle, "is at bottom the history of the Great Men who have worked here. They were the leaders of men, these great ones, the modellers, patterners and in a wide sense creators of whatsoever the general mass of men contrived to do or attain; all things that we see standing accomplished in the world are properly the outer material result, the practical realisation and embodiment of thoughts that dwelt in the great men sent into the world: the soul of the whole world's history, it may justly be considered, were the history of these."

This hero-worship of Carlyle's may be an exaggerated philosophy of history. A brilliant agnostic writer speaks of it as "foolish Carlylese"; while Dr. Creighton has declared the doctrine which Carlyle held of the social office of great men to be "immoral." This appears to be answering extravagance by extravagance. We may admit that the Sage of Chelsea was not unafflicted by the prophetic malady of partialness. The awful intensity of soul which makes men seers and prophets often robs them of that equipoise which yields the whole and steady vision of life. Carlyle's theory may be erroneous but, while we abuse, the phenomenon of "greatness" remains unsolved.

A fuller knowledge of the modus operandi of human evolution has disclosed to us that the formers and reformers of human societies were not the benevolent despots that Carlyle would have us believe they were. The idea of human uniqueness, if the phrase may be allowed, has gone to the limbo of many another cherished idea. No man has ever been separate from his fellows. "Every one," it has been said, "is a bundle of his ancestors." And as with the individual so with the collective life. Those inventors whom industry decks with her choicest laurels are the debtors of a thousand obscure toilers. Multitudinous hands from a forgotten past offer them the material through which, by the discernment of genius, they perceive a unifying principle flowing. The inventor but gathers into a group the scattered fragments around him to endow them with the utility of a larger purpose.

An analagous process occurs in the realms of religion and art, of intellectual attainment and political movements.

We often imagine that our age is the debtor to one or two minds for its master generalisations. Yet nothing could be more erroneous. Mr. Clodd not long ago gathered into a volume the premonitions which earlier ages had of the evolutionary idea. It was apprehended, though with great imperfections, centuries before our era. In its more modern aspect it was sown by Erasmus Darwin, "watered," as Grant Allen says, "by Buffon, Lamarck, and Robert Chambers. In the fulness of time Charles Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Alfred Russel Wallace, came to consummate it. But evolution existed before Darwin; he was but the man who gave expression to that which was dimly realised." It is the same with the other great generalisation of our own time: the Conservation of Energy "with clouded eyes Kepler and Newton and Laplace had discerned the path which led towards it. Rumford caught clearer glimpses of it, Grove gave it something like definite form, Joule, Helmholtz, Clerk Maxwell, and Balfour Stewart crowned the slowly growing edifice. But the glory of the structure belongs to no one man."

A truer conception of the growth of collective man has torn the veil which concealed from us the human features of the demigod and hero. The monarchs of human thought and action are unable to exact from us the same degree of homage which our not very distant ancestors yielded to them. We have, as it were, rationalised them out of the celestial into the mundane. We say now that "the gods of fable are the shining moments of great men."

Yet, notwithstanding this disillusion, which is born of ampler knowledge, we still persist in yielding homage to "great men"; we still call the lofty spirits that reach beyond the ordinary attainments of men "great" without knowing exactly what we mean. And this form of apotheosis provokes us to ask: "What is this quality in a man that allures and retains the affections and reverence of his fellows—that brings him a fame which the generations cannot tarnish?

The great man is primarily a seer. His piercing vision cuts through what Carlyle was fond of calling the simulacra, the merely apparent, and perceives the warp and woof in human affairs of purpose and Providence. He is no stickler for preciseness of terminology, but snatches the appellation for that which he sees behind the visible from the shelves of his temperament. Nor are the convictions which he holds with such tenacity, and promulgates with such insistency, reached after traversing the straight path of logic; they are rather apprehended as "in the twinkling of an eye." The "Greatest of them all," 2,000 years ago, told men to "be perfect"; and also how community of interests wrapt mankind in a sublime unity. To-day learned tomes are written to show that human society is held together by those very centripetal and centrifugal forces of Egoism and Altruism. He saw the greatest fact of human life, intuitively, a fact whose implications nineteen centuries leave unexhausted.

The great man appears to be endowed with sensibility to realms alien to his contemporaries. By a strange intuition he discerns the latencies of his environment. But his is not the illumination which severs him from mankind; it is rather a flash which reveals to him the path along which his fellow man is destined sooner or later to tread. The "possible" is the sphere in which he lives and moves and has his being and which compels him to gird incessantly at the "actual." He knows that man must mount one step higher. His own generation bespatters him with the muddy epithets "visionary," "unpractical," "impossible." But the ages that follow realise his vision and make the impracticable a common-place; an achievement of the impossible; and are soon awaiting another great man to lead them. Yet a step further on, "He is a great man," says Emerson, "who inhabits a high sphere of thought into which others rise with labour and difficulty; he has but to open his eyes to see things in a true light, and in large relations; whilst they must make painful corrections and keep a vigilant eye upon many sources of error."

Great men are indeed those master spirits who have climbed the hills that conceal the horizon from ordinary mortals and have gazed out upon the illimitable. And from their lofty altitudes they struggle to spell out something of the apocalypse that has been vouchsafed them. Yet the declaration whether it be expressed in an act of heroism or in the music of literature, whether it be with the inspired brush of the painter or in the spheric melodies of the musician, must own some affinity with the general, though, perhaps, vaguely realised apprehension of mankind, or it but pants into unreceptive space.

Thus we know that greatness is not the attribute of a being divested of his humanity; but is rather the consummation of his humanity. No chasm divides the great man from those who are not great, he is the brother with the clearer vision.

> O God, make no more giants;
> Elevate the race, says Browning. Our invocation would rather be that we might have more giants, for they elevate the race by disclosing to man his glorious destiny, the ever receding goal of perfection.

THE CHURCH AS A HOME.

A SERMON by Dr. Brooke Herford on "The Church as a Home," preached in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, appears in the Christian World Pulpit for Aug. 22. The text is Psalm xxiii. 6, "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever." The preacher having spoken of the value of the Church as an elevating influence in human life, and of the significance of even casual attendance at religious services, gave the following illustrations of the true home feeling in such associations :—

"The slightest association of this kind is a proof of the greater thing; a witness that the rooted human feeling and need is still there, and it also still gives a chance for it to be awakened anew into life and growth. I think one of the most pathetic things in the great drive and worry of human life is the way in which the deeper life keeps feeling for some touch of sympathy, even in those who have thought they have got beyond the churches and generally say they don't care for them. I wonder how many in all the places of worship in this great city to-day are something of that kind, people who have entered in a casual way or lonely people who have come here to this great hive afar from their homes, and all has seemed strange to them. Perhaps life has been hard to them, and they have formed no new ties and have not felt like going to any worship, but to-day—this bright morning—some thought of the past came over them and they went out, and seeing people thronging into a church, entered also. And to some who had just been listening in the aimlessness which is all Sunday brings to many, a strain of an old familiar hymn called out in the street, touched some unaccustomed chord of tender feeling and drew them in likewise. Others again have gone and sat in some corner of a great cathedral just for a little rest.

"I met again last summer on the Rhine a lady, an educated lady, who twenty-five years ago had cast off all the religion she had ever known in her convent school, and had done with the whole thing. She entered my church in Chicago, and found there something so different to that to which she had been accustomed that she came again and again, until at last she found a church home which, she subsequently told me, had been the blessing of her life. She is a lady of high culture and had then just taken her doctor's degree in science. Well at the other end of the scale I think of a woman, about the dirtiest and most forsaken I ever knew, who came to have the same home feeling in my chapel in a great English city. I had been taking my Sunday-school children out to sing hymns in the street, in a sort of provincial Seven Dials, and afterwards I invited any bystanders who chose to do so to come back with us to our chapel. And this poor woman straggled in and something touched her and she came again and again. At first no one would sit near her, but she came clean and tidy at last, and by the grace of God, and helped by some kind women, she became quite changed. Next to the decent home that by-and-by she got about her, she felt our chapel like another home.

"Of course, those are extreme cases, but how many have I known, even in our own little churches as I have gone about among them, whose first going in has been just as casual, and who are now earnest members of our household. Here and there, when they first entered they did so with trembling and half afraid, having had it dinned into them that a Unitarian Church was a dangerous place. Well, I bless God for every slightest tie, even curiosity or passing interest in some subject, or of mere weariness or neighbourly friendship, which draws so many people even casually for any single time to these old institutions of God's worship and Christ's Church. But while I bless God for everything, even of this casual sort, I bless Him most because even these least things are rootlets of the greater thing; that great human drawing towards some upward thought and association of religion, and it is of that greater thing that I want to speak to you, not as a casual thing, but as a regular factor of life—the good of having a church home.

"A home that all value. We know what that means. We don't sit there all our time, but from thence we go forth to toil and struggle in the world. Then we return for life's innermost peace and friendliness, reposefulness and renewal. Just so is it when we make the church into a home—a "dwelling-place," to use the Psalmist's words. Thither we go for the inspiration, fellowship, and renewal of that deeper life in us; thither we go as children gathering about the feet of the Great Father, to feel His presence and to feel it altogether, and thence we go forth to do our busiest and highest part in the world. That is the use of the church. Not to be always in it. That was the old monkish idea. They desired to make a permanent sacred enclosure where God's saints might live out of the common world and so keep pure amid never-ceasing worship or as nearly so as might be. But Christ teaches us a nobler idea, the idea of home and of active life in the world, and doing its work and busy in its interests; and religion, with a constant spirit setting up this other home of prayer and worship where we feel together peace, rest, refreshment, a common fellowship to the infinite life, and brotherhood to each other. So we renew life at the best part of it."

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.—I.

WHEN the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association selected me as one of their representatives on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Association, I fully appreciated the honour done to me; not without some little wonder, which still remains, why I should have been chosen in preference to half-a-dozen others whose qualifications are superior to mine. But I have made it a rule of life never to seek honour or office, and never to refuse them when offered unsought. So I accepted at once, gratified but not delighted. I never wanted to go to America: if I dream of foreign travel with time and money at my command, it is to Greece and Palestine, Egypt and India, that my affections incline; and for this year I had in mind a visit to an historic land, which I was already enjoying by anticipation. It was with some little disappointment, therefore, with no expectation of profit or pleasure, that I looked forward to my visit.

And disappointed I have been indeed! deceived of expectations which were only of uninteresting novelty, wealth without culture, and enterprise without gentleness. I look back upon my American visit as one of the most valuable experiences of my life, and am conscious of an obligation to our Association which would be burdensome, were it not that I have long become bankrupt of thanks, having all my life received on all hands so much more kindness and honour than I can possibly esteem myself entitled to. In the extremely improbable case of my ever growing rich the Council may reckon upon a repayment to their funds, with compound interest at 10 per cent., of the sum they granted me for travelling expenses. It is due to them, indeed; for my profit has been great, and theirs, I fear, very small.

Impressions! of a six weeks' residence in a country whose boundaries are two oceans, whose area is almost as great as that of Europe, and its population over seventy millions. What business have I with any impressions except just that of my own incapacity to form any opinion worth hearing or having? I have lived twenty-four years in Leeds, yet would not be at all confident that I could rightly judge of the city and its inhabitants, their character and habits. What can I know of the United States?

Still, I have my impressions, and I put them forth for what they are—not facts but seemings, how things did appear to me. As such only are they of any worth.

I must begin with a confession which will grieve some of my best and most honoured friends. I went to America to represent the Unitarian Association; there are those of us who would refuse to do any service or accept any honour in the name of that sectarian body, which is supposed to be the incarnation of dogmatism, exclusiveness, arrogance of unbelief, which distinguish it from our grand old liberal "Presbyterian forefathers." "Cannot our people"—I read in an eloquent appeal from the dear "Open Brotherhood"—"cannot our people" (but "our people"—is not this a little narrow, as if there was a distinct "we" who were distinct from other peoples?") "and their Association abandon once for all the carved and painted fetishes of name, and once for all leave 'Unitarianism' and its so-called church and its theological flags and fences to perish in the dust?" Alas! after long years of halting between two opinions, now confessing myself a Unitarian minister, and now declaring that I was simply a minister without other qualifying adjective than Christian (and that only if other Christians were good enough to allow me the use of it; if not, it didn't matter about names), I return from America avowing myself the Unitarian minister of a Unitarian congregation, and I have done for good with painful and wholly futile efforts to make people understand what I am not and what I am, what my congregation is not, or what it willingly avows itself to be. Have I not been advertised in the Providence Evening Telegram, under the heading "Unitarian," and as "Delegate from the Unitarian Churches of England"? I blushed to read it; of course it wasn't the fact, for the Association, not the Churches, sent me, but I feared the good folk of Providence, nurtured in traditions of tolerance older than any we own, would not understand my modest protest if I sent it to Monday's paper, and would conclude either that I had abandoned Unitarianism, or that I was one of the queer folk who needn't be attended to by an otherwise busy world.

Of course I know but little of our churches in America. Mr. Bowie, who rushed through the country with an energy which should commend him to any company who needed an agent—only they won't get him—must have seen three times as much I did, and may have come to a different conclusion. But to me it seemed that the controversy about names, which never ceases to worry and hinder us in England, has there come to an end. I came across none, minister or layman, church or individual, who did not frankly accept the name by which otherwise the outside world alone knew them. All I met were Unitarian ministers of Unitarian Churches, united in a Unitarian Association with varied branches for promoting Unitarian activities.

If I could have perceived any signs that this unanimity was accompanied by a development of the sectarian spirit—that more than among us there was a disposition to look upon "the body" as an end in itself rather than a mere means, one of many varied means, to furthering the kingdom of God on earth—that there was a tendency to assume that ours was the Church, and with us alone was to be found "the way, the truth, and the life"—had I been aware of any symptom of the kind, I should have returned to England determined to abjure the name and do my utmost to prevent its intrusion in my own place of worship or any society with which I was connected. But I saw nothing of the kind, and I was all day long among ministers, at the rooms of the Association, at public meetings, in churches, in private houses, discussing, listening, and learning what I could of their thoughts and methods. Well, it may be that I am slow-witted to perceive the symptoms of the growing disposition to dogmatism and self-conceit and unwarranted assumption which define a sect, but if there is any such danger threatening our American churches it was wholly hidden from me. I found exactly the same spirit as that which pervades our Polynomial Conference. I heard no word which could give offence to Christian brethren of other denominations, no claim made in public or private to the disparagement of other Churches. Indeed the consciousness of brotherhood, with all working to the same divine end, seemed to be much stronger there than it is here; it certainly was not suppressed in any degree by the frank avowal of the Unitarian name.

So I have come back, determined, for what remains to me of life, to resolutely shun the question of names, and to allow myself to be called, as I shall be whether I allow it or not, a Unitarian minister. Nay, if some well-meaning people should call me, as I have been called, a—— Unitarian (the epithet even with two middle letters omitted would be unsuitable for a religious paper), I sha'n't object. Names are not of our own choosing, and ill names don't hurt, unless we fret about them. This is my first obligation to our brethren of the States; what else I have learnt of them, I will, by your leave, Mr. Editor, go on to tell in your next number.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bolton: Unity Church.—The Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., entered on his ministry on Sunday week, when capital congregations assembled and gave him a hearty welcome. The social meeting to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Harris is announced for Saturday, Sept. 15. In a letter which he has addressed to the members of his congregation, Mr. Harris says:—"My first thought is of the sense of loss that must be felt in having an old and tried friend replaced by a new one. Coming among you at first as a comparative stranger, I cannot bring with me at the outset that intimate knowledge of your past life and thought, your joys and sorrows, such as only the friendship of many years can give, and there must inevitably be many ties of old association that you will miss. But we are to go together into the future, and as we now join hands and look out into the days to come, I pray that God may bless to us all the yet untrodden way."

Boston.—The services at Spain-lane Chapel for the last three Sunday evenings have been taken by the Rev. F. Summers, and have been warmly appreciated. The attendance was larger than usual, and anthems and solos were introduced into the services. On Friday week Mr. and Mrs. Summers, who have been spending their holiday at Boston, joined the choir and other friends in a delightful outing to Woodhall Spa. On Sunday afternoon Mr. Summers addressed the Men's P.S.A. at Shodfriars Hall.

Byker.—On Wednesday week, Mr. A. G. Peaston, who for the past fifteen months has been in charge of this Mission church, and is obliged to withdraw from the work, was the recipient of some pleasant gifts as tokens of the gratitude and goodwill of the congregation, and of the parents of some of the children, not themselves members of the church. The chair was occupied by Mr. Olsen, and some forty members and friends were present. The meeting concluded with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Hastings.—The largest congregation that has gathered together for years assembled last Sunday evening to hear an address by Mr. William Clarke, M.A., on "Christianity and Civilisation." Mr. Clarke's standpoint was that Jesus had no thought of interfering in any way with the duties and obligations of the State. His one aim was to establish a kingdom in the hearts of men. When Christianity had interferred with government, or government with Christianity, the results were disastrous to both. It was a brilliant argument, strengthened by many illustrations from Mr. Clarke's wide range of study, and was listened to with breathless attention by the congregation. Mr. Preston is away on a sea trip of some weeks' duration, and during his absence most of the services are being conducted by Mr. E. Howard.

London: Highgate.—The members of the Highgate-hill Unitarian Church have learned with deep regret that the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, whom, after a six months' ministry they had invited to become their permanent pastor, and who is now in America, will be unable to return to them. During the past seven months Mr. Sunderland had endeared himself to the congregation, into the many branches of whose work he had thrown himself with great zeal and success. The reason of his leaving is the continued and severe illness of his wife, which necessitated his recent return to America. In his letter, read to last Sunday's congregation, Mr. Sunderland says his wife's condition is such "that there would be great danger attending an attempt to make the long journey to London at present or probably earlier than another summer. There is therefore no alternative left me except to send you word severing permanently my relations with the Highgate Church, for of course I cannot return to you leaving her behind." He adds: "I could not have believed that in seven months of time it would be possible to become so much attached to a people as I find I have become attached to the Highgate Church. I shall always look back upon my brief association with you with peculiar interest. It has given me some very dear friends. It has given me a deep and abiding interest in your church, your Sunday-school, your homes, your young people, your children, the Channing House School, and the earnest work which you are all doing to make the world better. I shall follow your future movements with much solicitude and interest." The news was received with deep sorrow, and the sympathy of the Unitarians, not only of Highgate, but of London generally, will go forth to one whose short residence amongst them had already given promise of strong leadership and wide usefulness.

Newbury.—On Sunday, Aug. 26, the Old Presbyterian Chapel was reopened after extensive renovation and redecoration, the services being conducted by the minister, the Rev. E. Turland. In response to an appeal made last autumn, enforced by a public meeting, reported at the time in these columns, the congregation have been enabled to put the roof of their old meeting-house into thorough repair, and to insert improved lead lights into ten windows, while the walls and pillars have been recoloured, the seats and ancient pulpit stained, and the exterior painted. Further improvements are reserved until additional means are secured, as the congregation is determined not to run into debt. At both services Mr. Turland dwelt upon the value of the traditions and principles inherited from their Puritan forefathers, and on the need of faithfulness to their ideal. He gave some interesting particulars as to the history of the congregation, which will shortly be more fully available in a volume, which is in preparation. The subject of the evening sermon was, "Public Worship, its Duty and Delight."

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Sunday, Sept. 2, sermons were preached in the Church of the Divine Unity, by Mr. Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, who took for the subject of his evening address "The Brahmo Somaj." Speaking of this "Society of Worshippers of God," as a result of the meeting of the East and West, of Hinduism and Christianity, Mr. Mozoomdar thus described its characteristics:—"Daily prayerfulness was their habit, their promise, their long-settled practice. They were a brotherhood in which they forgot their orthodox distinctions, laid aside caste feelings, and met as equals. As soon as men and women went to a place of worship and adored and prayed to God, if they did that sincerely, they were bound to each other by a relationship which some day would develop into a brotherhood, into a community, into a church, into the Kingdom of God. Their doctrines were simple:—'God is; God is one, God is a spirit; God is Almighty, Allwise, All-good, All-holy. Man is God's offspring; the spirit of man comes from the Spirit of God; man is responsible for his life, his opinions and actions; the soul of man has an immortal life; after death there is another life, in which all the capacities of the soul find unmeasured scope for advancement and affection.' These doctrines were universal. They accepted from others whatever they had to teach. The Scriptures of all religions were theirs; the prophets of all religions were their prophets. The great men of all religions reproved them and set them right. They stood for the universal brotherhood of man. Purity was with them a great principle. They stood up for the purity of the body, for the purity of thought and conscience; for all personal purity they stood determined. They meant more than mere personal purity—they enjoined domestic purity, social purity, national purity, the purity of the whole human race. They had done much in the way of freeing and educating the women of India, and other social reforms. Spirituality was their motive, inspiration, and strength. They might be heterodox in their opinions, but they were orthodox in their devotion. They sought regular piety in the house, as well as outside. Last of all, their greatest principle was the vitality of their religion. The movement was not dead, but was advancing. 'Progress' was their watchword." On Wednesday evening a reception was held in the schoolroom on the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. John Tweedy, to meet Mr. Mozoomdar. A large number of friends responded, and a pleasant evening was spent.

Portsmouth: John Pound's Girls' Home and Institute.—About a fortnight ago the girls—old and new—had their summer outing at Portsdown Hill. They were over 150 strong, and Mrs. Rogers and Miss Treliving, the late matron, were, as usual, in charge. Miss Leigh, the new matron, was also present, and shared in the little festivities. Mr. R. F. Wilkins, Kings' Wear, Devon, although not present in person, kindly assisted in a practical way. Under the auspices of the "Pearson's Fresh Air Fund," the poor children of the John Pound's Mission have also enjoyed a trip to Portsdown, when Mr. H. Blessley, assisted by lady friends and Mr. R. Prior, had over a hundred youngsters in his party. Some "Drum and Fife" young friends from one of the Portsmouth Board Schools were "in evidence," and added to the general enjoyment.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations :—Amounts already acknowledged, £2,242 17s. 7d.; John Lonsdale and Friends, 4s.; Rev. J. R. Wilson, £1 1s.; J. E. B., £15; A. C., £10; Readers of New Kingdom, £1; Total £2,270 2s. 7d. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE minister and congregation of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, have extended a very cordial invitation to the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to hold the autumnal meetings of the Association at Sheffield this year. It is the occasion of the bi-centenary of the Upper Chapel. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be represented by the President, Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P.; the Treasurer, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold; the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; also by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., who will preach the sermon; the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., who will read a paper on "The Opportunity and Need of Missionary Work in the Yorkshire District." The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., will also form part of the deputation, and will speak at the public meeting. Wednesday, Oct. 17, and Thursday, Oct. 18, are the dates fixed for the meetings. The full programme of the proceedings, including the special bi-centenary meeting, will be issued shortly; meanwhile let the congregations in the Sheffield district—a very wide district, we hope it will prove—make a note of the dates, and prepare to rally in large numbers for this commemoration.

THE committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made arrangements for the delivery of a course of six lectures by Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century." The lectures will be given at Essex Hall on successive Tuesday evenings, beginning on Oct. 16, at half-past seven. The subjects of the lectures are :—1. "Changed Views of the Law. 2. "Changed Views of Prophecy." 3. "The Gospels and the Origin of Christianity." 4. "The Gospel Question : i. The Synoptics." 5. "The Gospel Question : ii. The Fourth Gospel." 6. "The Bible and the Church." These lectures should appeal to a large public, if the fact of their delivery can be made widely known. No charge is to be made for admission, and tickets, together with a printed syllabus of the lectures, may be had on application to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, at Essex Hall.

A RECENT number of The Interpreter and New Dispensation contained a "Letter to the Community," addressed by Mr. Protab Chunder Mozoomdar to his Brahmo friends at home. The letter, which was dated July 8, from the Strand Hotel, Thames Embankment, opened with the following beautiful passage :—

"This is Sunday morning. It is a brilliant warm sunshine, the coolest, sweetest breezes enliven it, the Embankment road is still, there is no traffic, the great church bells strike the chimes in deep solemn notes which prolonged, flow as it were into an unearthly voice calling, warning men that the hour of worship is at hand. "Come and worship the great God in His house!" My whole soul hungers for the worship of the holy God, with you my most dear ones, you who are humble and fervent and true in prayer and praise. A stranger in this great land, wondering at the magnificence of its churches and the celebrations there, I dare not enter them, cannot join their forms, do not understand their singing; though always alive to a profound awe reigning there, my heart longs to be in the congregation of the simple and the faithful who call upon the Spirit in spirit, and in reverence, and trust, and tenderness pour their whole souls to God. The congregation of the immortals worship in the high heavens, many congregations in many lands worship, and may your weekly, daily service swell that chorus of song and aspiration. The heart is its own cathedral, all the immortals are there, all the worshippers are there, all the worship of the past and present is there; the heart of God is in the heart of man. In this blessed morning I retire into that inmost church, and there I am at one with you, at one with God, and the blessed ones who have gone to Him."

IT is not often that we can record such an example of tolerance and cordial good feeling in a religious community as is reported from Dromore, co. Down, at the recent ordination of the Rev. A. Davidson, as minister of the First Presbyterian Church, in succession to the late Rev. D. Thompson. At the luncheon given on this occasion to welcome the young Unitarian minister, the guests included several ministers of other religious bodies, and most remarkable of all, the Very Rev. Monsignor M'Cartan, P.P.V.F., who made a genial speech. Referring to the late David Thompson, Monsignor M'Cartan spoke of him as a "distinguished and saintly pastor," a good and kind neighbour, "a minister who taught the great lesson of charity."

His pious gait showed he was a favourite minister of the Lord, and there was one thing that he loved and taught, that most beautiful of commandments—might I say the prince of commands—that Christ himself uttered : This is my commandment, that the world may know whose disciples ye are, that ye love one another. His death was like his saintly life, and he was surrounded by kind friends and feeling hearts.

Having referred to the many kindnesses he had received from the Unitarians of Dromore, and also from Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Methodists, since he came to the parish, Monsignor M'Cartan concluded with an earnest exhortation to brotherly love.

THE September number of the Atlantic Monthly contains an article on "James Martineau," by Professor C. C. Everett, of Harvard, which has some delightful personal touches, and towards the end also some interesting criticisms. We are glad to see from a note of cordial acknowledgment in Dr. Everett's article that THE INQUIRER'S Memorial number has been appreciated and has proved of service in America as well as in this country. Dwelling upon Dr. Martineau's marvellous endowments, physical as well as mental and spiritual, Dr. Everett speaks of the influence of his personality.

Here was a man obviously fitted to meet any exigency of the worldly life. Evidently there was no circle, even in England, so exalted that he might not feel at home in it, and be recognised as being in his rightful place. There was an air of mingled graciousness and dignity which at once attracted, while it would evidently repel familiarity on too easy terms. The repulsion would be exerted, not by any specific word or look, but simply by the calm presence of the man. When I saw him in his crimson doctor's robe, I confess that this, which seems in so many cases such an absurd drapery, appeared to me to be his proper garb. At the same time he evidently needed such robes of dignity less than most others.

Speaking of his mental gifts, Dr. Everett says :—

The mind of Dr. Martineau was as lithe and strong as his body. As his body delighted in feats of strength, especially as these were connected with the climbing of his favourite hills, so did his mind rejoice in the pleasure of the athlete. He loved to climb the heights of thought. He gloried in the measurement of strength with strength, in the encounter of mind with mind. Here, too, he was fitted by nature and training to mingle with the best. He took his place with the great thinkers of the world, as one at least who could comprehend them and converse with them on an equal plane, even if he had not their power of original constructive thought.

AFTER a sketch of Dr. Martineau's life, Dr. Everett proceeds to an estimate of his work, giving the first place to his influence as a religious teacher and inspirer.

His first important work, "Endeavours after the Christian Life," retains the supremacy that was at first accorded to it. It is the utterance of a pure and warm religious faith, unhampered by any narrowness or timidity of thought. The form is perfect; the expression is rich with the beauty of the imagination.

The next place Dr. Everett gives to Martineau's work as a defender of the fundamental truths of religion, regarding his critical as more successful than his constructive work as a philosopher and theologian. Of "The Seat of Authority" he says :—

This book is in some ways less perfect than the others. The writings of the last part was separated by a long interval from that of the first. It is by its nature more arbitrary, not to say capricious, in some of its judgments. Yet perhaps no one of his books bears more clearly the impress of the master or has more real value.

For interesting notes on Dr. Martineau's dualism and his doctrine of cause we must refer our readers to the article itself, and will here only further quote Dr. Everett's closing sentences :—

If Martineau did not succeed in constructing a permanent system of the universe, he simply failed where many had failed before him.

Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be.

His power consists in the fact that he dwelt among the realities which systems so imperfectly represent. To some who love and admire him most, the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" is still regarded as his best contribution to the world. Others find most inspiration in his splendid personality, all aglow as it was with religious faith. He had fairly faced doubt and denial. He had explored the gloomiest stretches of world-weary speculation, and he could still stand in all the joy of his first faith, and proclaim that God's in his heaven,

All's right with the world.

Whatever we may think of his system as a whole, his works will long remain a storehouse of important thoughts in regard to the matters with which philosophy and theology have to do. It is pleasant to remember that the first collection of his miscellaneous works was made and published in this country, and that Harvard was the first University to give him official recognition.

WRITING last week of the late Henry Sidgwick, the Spectator spoke of him as essentially Greek in spirit, possessed of that intellectual eagerness combined with the balanced mind, the fine mental poise, which chiefly characterised the Greeks. His method was the analytical method of Socrates and Aristotle. "Though he had spent much time on Plato, we should say that his mind was scarcely Platonic. He lacked the poetic mysticism of Plato which made of that superbly endowed man a link between the Greek and Christian worlds." It was Aristotle who had the most powerful influence in all his writings.

Sidgwick is carefully committed to an exact and impartial statement of every point of view. He cannot bear that even the side which appeals least to him should not be completely and even sympathetically stated. He has not the English love for taking a "side." He empties his mind of all prejudices, he has no interest to serve but the truth. We cannot estimate our debt to a rare mind of this order. It sweeps away the mists of passion and preconceived notions; it realises for us Bacon's "dry light," it enables us to have a glimpse of the exalted and educating nature of Greek culture, it liberates our intellect and gives us the freedom of the world of mind.

After speaking further of Sidgwick's work, of his great influence at Cambridge, his interest in Psychical Research, his political economy, the article concluded as follows :—

His is a figure we shall not easily forget. We see again that thoughtful face with the deep eyes, the expression austere and yet kindly, the long beard, the somewhat slight form, the light eager walk, the bent head, and we can see the figure at times rooted to the spot, standing in the street quite oblivious of passing traffic, the mind revolving some great problem which was more to him than the customary doings of daily life. His tastes were simple, his conscience was high, his aspirations noble, his life almost ideal. He might almost have been the reincarnation of an ancient Greek philosopher; and what greater praise can we pay to the memory of Henry Sidgwick?

To the September number of Scribner's Magazine, Mr. W. D. Howells contributes an extremely interesting article, "A Personal Retrospect of James Russell Lowell." For some years after the close of the Civil War, the elder and the younger author were both living at Cambridge, Mass., and on terms of intimate friendship, which remained unbroken until Lowell's death, and in Mr. Howells' "Retrospect" we find many of those charming touches which only such a close intimacy can give, in the portrait of a man. Describing his friend in the first years of their acquaintance, Mr. Howells says :—

He still wore his auburn hair somewhat long; it was darker than his beard, which was branching and full, and more straw-coloured than auburn, as were his thick eyebrows; neither hair nor beard was then touched with grey, as I now remember. When he uncovered, his straight, wide, white forehead showed itself one of the most beautiful that could be; his eyes were gay with humour and alert with all intelligence. He had an enchanting smile, a laugh that was full of friendly joyousness and a voice that was exquisite music.

Concerning Lowell's religion there are the following notes :—

He was speaking of the New Testament, and he said the truth was in it, but "they had covered it up with their hagiology." Though he had been bred a Unitarian, and had more and more liberated himself from all creeds, he humorously affected an abiding belief in hell, and similarly contended for the eternal punishment of the wicked. He was of a religious nature, and he was very reverent of other people's religious feelings; he expressed a special tolerance for my own inherited faith, no doubt because Mrs. Lowell was also a Swedenborgian; but I do not think he was interested in it, and I suspect that all religious formulations bored him. In his earlier poems are many intimations and affirmations of belief in an overruling providence, and especially in the God who declares vengeance His and will repay men for their evil deeds, and will right the weak against the strong. I think he never quite lost this, though when in the last years of his life I asked him if he believed there was a moral government of the universe, he answered gravely and with a sort of pain. "The scale was so vast, and we saw such a little part of it."

IN the amendments to the Education Acts, embodied in a new Act which came into operation a few weeks ago, School Boards, and local authorities charged with the duty of looking after education in England, are now empowered to make bye-laws raising the age of exemption from attending school from thirteen to fourteen; magistrates are also empowered, as in Scotland, to impose a fine up to 20s. for each case of neglect on the part of parents to send their children to school; formerly 5s. was the maximum fine in England. Further, the so-called "Dunce's Certificate" can in future be obtained only if the child has made 350 attendances during five preceding years, instead of 250 as formerly. These new powers, which we trust will be widely used by School Boards and magistrates, ought to lead to genuine progress in elementary education. Great credit is due to the School Accommodation and Attendance Committee of the London School Board for pressing these amendments, time after time, upon the attention of the Board of Education and upon the Government.

WE learn from the Christian Register that Professor Edward Cummings, of Harvard, has been appointed associate pastor, with Dr. E. E. Hale, of the South Church, Boston. He has had a distinguished career as a student of sociology. He is now convinced, we are told, that the ministry of a Unitarian church presents an inspiring opportunity for social service, and that the teachings of sociology "serve only to reinforce the fundamental teachings of ethics and religion." Several of our readers will remember meeting Mr. Cummings when he was in England a few years ago, when there was some talk of his becoming the Warden of Mrs. Humphry Ward's University Hall Settlement, then located in Gordon-square.

THERE is a kind of melancholy in which there is much that is corporeal. Little can be done against such a mood, even in minds of the greatest acquired strength. We can, indeed, so far prevail against it as to think and work as if it did not exist; but we remain sad; cheerfulness cannot be forced, and man has not much more power against the clouds which overhang the heaven of his mind than he has against the clouds of external nature. In the meantime we must not remain quite inactive, but must labour on at our everyday duties, and be watchful over ourselves.—Humboldt.

THE CONGRESS OF THE HISTORY OF RELIGIONS.

Paris, Sept. 9, 1900.

THE Congress of the History of Religions is over, and there falls to me the pleasant duty of chronicling its success, and gathering up for your readers some impressions of its significance. It owed its inspiration, doubtless, to the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, a filiation which was recognised in the report of that great assembly communicated by its originator, Mr. Carroll Bonney, and presented to the meeting here by Dr. Paul Carus of Chicago. The intervening Congress at Stockholm, due (I believe) to the initiative of the King of Sweden, seemed to have left such faint traces that nothing was said about it; but it may fairly claim to have prepared the way for what will now, it is hoped, become a permanent organisation. It was obviously impossible, however, for Paris to adopt the platform of Chicago, and assemble the representatives of the various religions of the world side by side in friendly equality. The Cardinal Archbishop on the Seine could not have played the part of Cardinal Gibbons by the great inland sea, and opened the proceedings with prayer. It was necessary, therefore, to find an independent basis; and this was supplied by history. In the past all religions could only be known by the same methods, and studied on similar lines.

The proceedings opened on Sunday, Sept. 2, with an informal reunion at the Hôtel des Savants. The Congress tickets were issued to members, glasses of beer and cups of tea were sent round, introductions took place right and left, and a genial atmosphere of good-fellowship was quickly created where all were ready to be pleased. The venerable M. Albert Réville, of the Collège de France, whose figure and whose gracious courtesy strongly reminded me of Professor Charles Eliot Norton of Cambridge, Massachusetts, was the chief host, and his son, M. Jean Réville, and the distinguished French folk-lorist M. Léon Marillier, who were the secretaries of the Congress, exerted themselves to the utmost with unfailing tact. The total number of members actually present in Paris, so M. Jean Réville informed me, was about 150: a wide range of countries was represented, for in the course of the week I made acquaintance with members from Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, Armenia, India, Canada, and the United States. The absence of the "patriarchs" of the science of the history of religions as Professor Max Müller and Professor Tylor were appropriately designated, was greatly deplored; the smallness of the English contingent—Professor Percy Gardner, and Miss Weld of Oxford, Mr. Pinches (the distinguished Assyriologist) and myself—was much regretted; while Germany was scarcely represented at all.

The Congress was definitely constituted on Monday morning in one of the large rooms in the building devoted to the meetings in the Exhibition grounds beside the Pont de l'Alma. The ground floor was occupied with the admirable sociological exhibits which presented so skilfully the progress of workmen's organisations, education, and other modern interests. Dr. Tiele, of Leyden, who was to have delivered the opening address, was unhappily detained at home by the consequences of a recent severe illness. Professor Albert Réville was elected president, and proceeded to inaugurate the Congress with an appropriate discourse. He dwelt on the origins of the history of religion, on their sources in human nature, on the method of investigation suggested by the conceptions of evolution, and on the place of the new study in the encyclopædia of contemporary science. M. Bonet-Maury followed with cordial words of welcome on behalf of the Minister of Public Instruction, and after a few words of American greeting from Dr. Paul Carus and some further business, the morning session was adjourned.

Business began in the afternoon at the Sorbonne when the sections, were grouped in appropriate subjects, and the order of the papers was provisionally arranged. The mornings were devoted to sectional meetings; while general meetings were held in the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. The papers were necessarily of unequal value, and there was a tendency to substitute more popular utterances for severer and technical studies; but the value of such a Congress does not lie in the specific contributions so much as in the opportunities which it provides for personal intercourse and for the quickening of interest and enthusiasm in common work. The publication of the proceedings of the Congress will give me an occasion hereafter for saying something about the special value of particular papers in different sections; it must suffice here to recall some of the impressions suggested by the general discourses addressed to the whole Congress at the afternoon meetings.

The place itself was full of historic interest. The buildings of the Sorbonne have been almost entirely reconstructed in the last few years: only the great church containing Richelieu's tomb remains unchanged. Immediately below, across the street, on the slope of the gentle hill descending to the Seine, are the "Thermes," the ruins of the once splendid baths attached to the Roman palace. Their scale may be imagined from the single fact that the "Frigidarium" is 65 feet in length and 59 feet in height. Here is preserved the little altar of the guild of Paris boatmen found in the course of excavations on the island in the Seine beneath the mighty choir of Notre Dame. Adjoining the ruins, reared perhaps in part out of their very stones, is the exquisite mediæval house, built for the town residence of the great abbots of Cluny, full of romantic history, and now a very palace of the art and life of the Middle Ages. The names of the neighbouring streets, Saint Benedict, Thomas Aquinas, the Holy Fathers—into which Napoleon, Solferino, and such like, break with rude intrusion—suggest an atmosphere of Catholic calm. The Sorbonne itself is still called after the Confessor of St. Louis who founded the famous school in 1253, with such success that it quickly became the theological arbiter for Europe. All around the hillside up to the Pantheon, which stands so proudly but so emptily on the site of the old shrine of Ste. Genevieve, were gathered the colleges and halls which made up the great University of Paris. Its numbers then may have possibly surpassed the twelve thousand students who now gather within its walls, but no women were then admitted (there are now between three and four thousand) to its teaching. So rapid is the education of opinion that it has needed only a generation to make it impossible for any future Renan to be sacrificed even for a while to clerical hatred. When I congratulated M. Réville upon the fact that he had been able to deliver much of his great treatise on the life of Jesus in the form of lectures from his professorial chair in the College de France, he told me that when it was established (I think in 1873) the late M. Jules Ferry, to whose initiative it was due, had taken the utmost pains to guard its liberty and place it on the broadest possible foundation.

It was impossible to forget this long roll of interesting associations as we gathered day by day in the halls of the Sorbonne. There, on Tuesday afternoon, after the distinguished Sanskritist and member of the Institut, M. Sénart, had read a very important paper at a general session on Buddhism and the Yoga philosophy, M. Sabatier, Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology, delivered an address which expressed in the clearest manner the attitude of the Congress towards Christianity. His subject was "Biblical Criticism and the Science of the History of Religions." He pointed out that the first period of Biblical criticism was essentially dogmatic, and that when rationalist criticism first arose it often lacked altogether the sense of history. With Baur of Tübingen began a new era, in the attempt to connect the early Christian records with a general conception of historical development, a method so brilliantly applied to the Old Testament by Reuss, Graf, and Kuenen. M. Sabatier traced the application of the modern principles in the cases of the Pentateuch and the Book of Daniel, and then proceeded to argue that the Gospels must be treated in the same way. Moreover, if there was a literary and historical criticism of the Gospels, science could not be kept away from the Church, which must submit its claims to the same impartial criteria at the bar of history and reason. Christianity was thus frankly placed in line with all other religions, and this may be regarded as the distinctive note of the Congress. It did for the past what Chicago did for the present, though necessarily in a different way. In such an atmosphere Catholicism could hardly breathe easily. Two or three priests courageously attended some of the sessions, and the Abbé Denis contributed a paper one morning on the influence of Kant and Hegel on modern conceptions of Christianity. The note struck by M. Sabatier was worthily maintained on Thursday afternoon by Count Goblet d'Alviella (Brussels) in his most interesting address on the historic relations between religion and morals, the fervent close of which made a deep impression on the meeting, and by Professor de Gubernatis (Rome) in the concluding discourse on Saturday on "The Future of the Science of Religions." The latter was pervaded by a southern glow of hope and conviction which again and again drew forth bursts of applause, and proved that the severest study was by no means necessarily destructive of eloquence or emotion.

The dryness of discussions was happily relieved by occasions of social charm. The Congress was entertained one afternoon with genial hospitality in the noble Musée Guimet, whose generous founder still lives to see the increasing usefulness of his great creation. M. Jean Réville received his friends in his delightful house at Auteuil, in spite of the much-regretted illness of his accomplished wife. Another gathering to which I had the honour of being invited was held at the house of Mme. Coignet, an eminent writer on morals, who had been an active friend of the anti-slavery cause more than a generation ago. There I had the pleasure of meeting, among other guests, M. Firmin Roz, who has translated Emerson's "Representative Men," and is now preparing a careful study of the life and thought of the Concord Sage. He gave me a most interesting account of the change which has recently affected so much of French thought, by leading it from the scientific materialism of Bernard and Pasteur to a more spirtual philosophy. And last, but assuredly not least, must be mentioned the final banquet in the first story of the Eiffel Tower on Saturday evening, when impromptu speeches were made with overflowing goodwill. A Swedish rabbi from Stockholm wittily compared our situation with its polyglot company to the Tower of Babel. Behind that lay a common tongue; and so behind the diversity of forms and rituals and creeds lay a common faith. It would be the work of the members of the Congress to help the world to discern this unity and to cherish it in love. In this sentiment we bade each other farewell, hoping to meet again four years hence.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.—II.

I THINK the most valuable lesson I have brought back from America is that of respect for myself and my fellows, irrespective of the conditions in which they or I are placed.

And first for myself as a Unitarian minister. I must needs begin with a confession which will not increase the respect of others for me; but there are some who stand in need of the lesson I have learnt, and I cannot communicate it without exposing my own need of it. I was brought up in a home where great value was set upon "the ministry of the gospel," none at all upon the collateral advantages of that ministry as dignified by State recognition or the good opinion of "the world." But among my schoolfellows a quite other estimate obtained, which, as is generally the case, prevailed over that of my parents and possessed me. We looked upon Dissent not as in any way wicked (for the queer Anglican doctrine of schism and the sin of joining in the worship of the All-Father with any of His children not of your way of thinking had not yet become popular), but as unquestionably vulgar. And when I went to Cambridge and found myself in a society where a Nonconformist was almost as much of a rarity as a coloured man—there was not one in my own College, I don't think more than two or three in the whole University—I all the more readily fell in with the general sentiment of disdain because in other respects I was peculiar and not popular. I remember well how on one occasion only I entered "a beastly Dissenting chapel" as it was known in common talk, "a schism-shop" as more zealous Churchmen called it. I was drawn by the name of some well-known preacher of those days, and after our own college service, which consecrated the day and in a way legitimised any subsequent proceedings otherwise not quite regular, I made my way in cap and gown (for it was Sunday, and if I went at all I must needs go as a 'Varsity man) to the chapel doors. It is forty years since I entered them, I remember nothing of the sermon nor even the name of the preacher, but I do well remember the feeling, half of shame, half of daring, with which I looked up and down the street to see if anyone, whose notice I should mind was within sight, and the consciousness as I was shown to a seat that the entry of an undergraduate was an extraordinary event. This feeling of contempt did not extend at all to Roman Catholics, and there were always half-a-dozen or more of us, unabashed, at the evening service at the little chapel of those times; so when I became a Roman Catholic, though I suffered sorely in other respects, I did not in the least feel that I had let myself down by so doing.

When I came back ten years later I did my best to find some means of reconciliation with the National Church, which owned all the tender associations of my youth, and the larger associations of my country's history and literature. But I failed utterly; between creeds and conscience—my own I mean, I am judge of no other man's—I found no possibility of compromise. Layman or minister, I could not be a Churchman; if I was to have any religion, I must needs be "a beastly Dissenter"! I cannot say that the sense of degradation, or coming down in the world, weighed much with me; there were other considerations of so much more serious importance that if I remember right this had no influence at all upon my decision.

Still—and here comes my confession—old habits of thought had possession of me, and I never got over the feeling that I was a Dissenting minister, and as such the social inferior of every clergyman I met. Nay—forgive me, O ye good Unitarians who, like my dear old friend Joseph Lupton, are proud of your Church, and cannot be in any company for half-an-hour without letting them all know what you are!—many a time have I concealed the humiliating fact, let it be supposed that I was a clergyman if so it was supposed without hint of mine to that effect, and carefully parried questions which might lead to discovery. Shame on me! but there is no denying it, I have been ashamed of what in my heart I believed to be a high and holy calling, because it is not one which finds favour with the world.

Well, I have returned from America cured of this paltry failing, and I hope the cure is permanent. For the first time in my life I found myself in a land where there is no religion established either by law or by current opinion—where Churches are judged more or less important by the good they do—where all ministers of religion are commonly known as "clergymen," and the difference in the social standing of ministers of all denominations depends upon their own qualities and not upon the body they minister to. It seems as if this were the mere common sense of theory and practise in respect of religion, but like common sense in other matters, it is uncommon enough in the world still. At any rate I had never fully realised the facts upon which such a practise is founded; I had certainly never acquired the habit of thinking and acting upon them.

My American friends have taught me by their example to form a juster and saner estimate of my real position as a Unitarian minister. I have always had in abhorrence the detestable effrontery, under which shame of being a dissenter sometimes conceals itself, of going about the world with the assurance in talk and bearing, "I am as good as you and better too." I am sincerely glad that there are far better men than myself in every ministry, and I am ready at all times to show them reverence as my superiors. But henceforth I shall not feel myself the inferior of any man because he happens to be minister of a more popular religious body, or even of the great national Church. We are just what we are each one of us, and the designation Anglican, Congregational, Unitarian does not affect our real worth at all. It is just a question of clothes. Superfine cloth, serge, or shoddy, it does not matter which covers the back, so far as real worth is concerned, and no sensible man pretends that it does: so "Church or Chapel" in no wise distinguishes laymen and ministers into the more or less worthy of regard: with what measure of sincerity they believe and worship does undoubtedly distinguish them in the sight of God.

Should I have learnt this if I had not passed the greater part of my time in America at Boston? I don't know. I am sure to a great extent it is true throughout the States that a minister is judged by his own merits, and not by the orthodoxy or respectability of the Church he belongs to. But to a Unitarian, Massachusetts is the State which corrects the poor esteem in which he is perforce content to be held in the Old World; and he cannot live there even for a short while without learning that he is really a very respectable person, Europe and its society and its orthodoxies notwithstanding.

The area of the State exceeds by only a quarter that of Yorkshire, its population is less by one-third. But while in Yorkshire we have twenty-five places of worship, some of them very small, and could not muster, I fear, as many as twenty-five hundred Unitarians all told; in Massachusetts they have nearly two hundred churches—in Boston alone, which has not the population of Leeds, they have twenty-eight. And the standing of Unitarians there is firm and high, as their numbers are large; there are other sects more attractive or more popular, there is none more respected. A Unitarian minister cannot reside even a brief while in Boston without acquiring a juster conception of the dignity of his calling. He may be a very poor creature in his own esteem—which of us who has known himself long has not so judged himself?—but as a minister he holds a position which only his own unworthiness can degrade.

To have learnt this was of itself worth going to America for, at least to one who like myself had not succeeded in learning it any other way.

"You English Unitarians seem as if you were always expecting to be kicked," was the remark made to Dr. Herford (he will correct me if I am wrong) by a minister lately returned from England. There is much truth in it. We hold our own proudly enough in the big towns of the North, but even there and much more in other places, we are constantly exposed to being snubbed and slighted. Let us take for our defence the consciousness that we are free men, and honest to confess our belief and our unbelief. The real shame is not ours, but theirs who in the pride of priesthood or prejudice look down upon our unpretending quest of truth, of which we are the unworthy ministers.

LITERATURE.

A REVISED PRAYERBOOK.*

Some years ago the Rev. E. I. Fripp published a revised edition of the Book of Common Prayer, and he has taken advantage of his recent removal to Mansfield to bring out a new edition, which is an enlargement of its predecessor as well as an improvement. Any congregation desirous of adopting a Liturgy, or of changing one already in use, would do well to examine what Mr. Fripp can offer them, provided that they agree with him that it is best to have, not several services, but one order of morning and evening prayer, with a good deal of latitude of choice in regard to Psalms and Canticles and some other portions of the service. This is what Mr. Fripp has given us. His revision of the Church of England morning and evening prayer has been accomplished with the best possible taste and right feeling; and, what is still more important, with the strictest regard for sincerity in devotional utterance. Then follow three sections: Prayers and Thanksgivings, Responses, and a Litany. Next come twenty-eight Canticles, including seventeen arranged for the seasons of the Christian year, four for spring, summer, autumn, and winter, compiled from Scripture by Mr. Fripp and very beautifully done, and three from Dr. Martineau's well-known services. After this follows the Psalter, with Psalms carefully selected for each day in the month, occupying about half the book, which concludes with a series of Collects, and one entirely new feature in our own service books, a Catechism for use in the Sunday-school or religious training at home. We should like to see this Catechism reprinted separately and sold by our Sunday School Association. Only experience can show whether it would meet the want so widely felt for something that will supply more definiteness and coherence to our religious training of the young. Giving them these answers to learn by rote will, of course, do little good of itself, but if wise teaching turns these answers into centres of true thinking and right feeling, the work accomplished may be most valuable and lasting.

Mr. Fripp had hoped to include a Lectionary in the present volume, but that project has had to be deferred. We trust that before long it may be carried out, perhaps in conjunction with other ministers who are working on similar lines. It will be worth much if we can get rid of the superstition that Lessons ought to be chosen to suit the sermon. Lessons from Scripture belong to the devotional part of the worship. Moreover, a great change has taken place since our Nonconformist forefathers introduced the practice of selecting "special" Lessons for each service. In those days everybody read the Bible, and was familiar with the context of any passage selected, knowing all about the history of the actors mentioned. Now, half the congregation, in many cases we might say nine-tenths, rarely open the Bible or hear a word of it read except at the Sunday services. No doubt there are many Lessons which have a certain completeness in themselves, but even they lose much by isolation; and there is enormous wealth of reading in the Bible which is profitable when read continuously, Sunday by Sunday, but practically meaningless and unimpressive when taken in detached snippets.

We welcome Mr. Fripp's book as an earnest attempt to do something to make our devotional worship more real and deep. We are constantly hearing talk of the importance of this devotion as compared with the more intellectual aspect of religion treated in the sermon, but we rarely meet with deeds backing up this talk. It is the subject of the sermon that is advertised, or announced in the "Church Calendar," ministers are asked to come and "preach," absent members apologise for not having come to "hear him," and when hymns and lessons are alike chosen to suit the sermon, it is only natural that all the first part of the service should be regarded as, and often called, "introductory."

At the Leicestershire Conference, Mr. Fripp, in a fatherly manner, gave us some rules which he had drawn up for the use of his young people in connection with public worship, and very good rules we all thought them. Our readers will, perhaps, like to see a copy of a somewhat similar exhortation which, written out that all may read, hangs up in the fine old Norman Church at Iffley, near Oxford.

On your way to the Lord's House be thoughtful; be silent, or say but little, and that little good. Speak not of other men's faults; think of your own, for you are going to ask forgiveness. When you reach the church, never stay outside. Go in at once. Time spent within is exceeding precious. In the church, kneel down at once, very humbly, and pray. Spend the time that remains in holy thought. In prayer, remember the awful presence into which you have come. Never look about you to see who are coming in, or for any cause whatever. It matters nothing to you what others may be doing: attend to yourself. Fasten your thoughts firmly on the whole service. Miss not one word; this needs a severe struggle, so you have no time for vain things. The blessed Spirit will strengthen you if you persevere. When service is over, remain kneeling, and pray. Be silent, and speak to no one until you are outside; the Church is God's House, even when prayer is over. On your way home, be careful of your talk: the world will too soon slip back into your mind. Love prayer and praise best. Preaching is but a help to that heavenly work.

Why is it that we are not at all surprised to find such admonition posted up inside one of the churches of the Establishment, but should be very much surprised to find it within one of our own chapels?

A MINISTER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.*

The Rev. Alexander Macdougall, who will be known to some of our readers as for many years minister at High Garrett and Halstead, and afterwards at Diss, has been living latterly in retirement on account of failing health on the Essex coast, and in the enforced leisure of his evening time has written a novel in the form of an autobiography, with evidently a good deal of Wahrheit mingled with the Dichtung. Simply as a novel among a crowd of others by unknown authors, we confess that we should not have been attracted by "The Autobiography of Allen Lorne," and should have turned from it, not eager to read abstracts of sermons in such a form (though the Spectator says that "readers who like Scotch theology will no doubt revel in the book"!), and, inclined to agree with the writer of the Athenæum, notice that "it is difficult to take pleasure in solid seriousness when it takes the form of a religious novel undiluted by humour." But having come upon traces of personal interest in connection with our own religious community, the book became more attractive, and the Wahrheit especially of the closing confession of faith made one forget the novel in sympathy with its author.

Allen Lorne came up to London as a young man, having been obliged on account of heresy to abandon his intention of entering the ministry in Scotland, and after some trying experiences of battle with the world finds employment with a Scotch editor in town. Then he is led to take up preaching, and though ill-prepared becomes a minister, and so finds after all his true work in life. Some time in the fifties this must have been, and under a thinly-veiled disguise of altered names we see him preaching first at Ditchling and then accepting the pulpit, while he attended classes at Manchester College (but Mr. Macdougall's name does not appear in the list of regular students of the College). There are descriptions, without names, of W. J. Fox and Spurgeon, John James Tayler and Dr. Martineau. Of these latter as his teachers in College he speaks enthusiastically, adding the apostrophe: "O soul of our souls! who breathes the Poem of the Universe, we thank Thee for such revealers who attune our minds to hear it! They—in a sceptical age—though always heretics to the popular view, are the very saviours of religion." The description of Dr. Martineau we will quote:—

His presence was stately and commanding. He was tall, well-proportioned, graceful in his movements. His face was a study in physiognomy, its prevailing expression that of meditative thought blended with wistful sadness. The form of it strongly reminded me of the portrait of John Locke, but its expression indicated stronger and finer feeling than the face of that philosopher. His manner was grave and dignified, with a certain shyness and reserve that hindered familiarity. I see him in my mind's eye, with the middle joint of the bent forefinger of his right hand touching his compressed lips, a characteristic attitude when intently thinking.

After the completion of his ministry at Ditchling, and the development of his love-story, there follows an unsuccessful attempt to obtain a pulpit in a great Midland town, where his doubt as to the miraculous element in the Gospels stands in the way of his advancement. He leaves the ministry for a short time, but then finds a new opening and a very happy settlement, crowned eventually by his marriage, at "High Elms," in Essex, where "Sir Samuel de Courcelle" has built a chapel for his workpeople. The three concluding chapters are "Thirty Years Afterwards," when the retired minister takes a retrospect of his work. The book contains more than one incident which may interest members of the Psychical Research Society. We can only repeat that the Wahrheit of Mr. Macdougall's story has the genuine interest of a personal confession.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

We have not found anything specially attractive in this month's Reviews, unless it be the article on "Old Age Pensions in Denmark" in the Contemporary, which should be read by all who are interested in the question of better provision for the aged poor. The Danish law of 1892, which established a new system of Old-Age Relief, appears to have worked very well for respectable and self-respecting old people, without too great a burden of expense to the country, while experience has shown where it needs amendment, so as not to discourage thrift. In the same Review Mr. C. de Thierry's article on "The Colonial Office Myth" expresses very frankly the Colonial view of that office as a factor in the government of the Empire, and Mr. Frederic Mackarness, writing on "The Causes of the Cape Rebellion and its Cure," brings forward some painful evidence of the misuse of martial law in South Africa, contrasting this with the far more restrained and wiser policy of the British Government in dealing with the Canadian Rebellion at the beginning of the Queen's reign. Mr. W. Larminie's article on "The Evidence of Design in History," argues from the great movements of Western life, from the early days of Egyptian and Babylonian civilisation to the present, when in his view England and Russia hold the promise of the future, that such development could not have been the result of blind natural causes; but the writer wisely refrains from attempting a too definite interpretation of the Divine purpose in particular events and epochs of history.

Recent events in the Far East will attract special attention to Professor Max Müller's article in the Nineteenth Century on Confucianism, the first of a series of articles on "The Religions of China." This is followed by a hopeful article on "The Situation in Italy," by Signor Giovanni della Vecchia, who regards his country not as decrepit and hastening towards death, but as convalescent with a vigorous future in store for it. "The Oldest Picture-Book of All," Mr. E. W. Maunder, who is assistant at the Greenwich Observatory, finds in the midnight sky, where, although some of the figures of the constellations are of much more recent date the Great Bear, Cepheus and Cassiopeia, Orion, and many others may be traced back for thousands of years, and thus furnish a unique kind of historical evidence of primitive civilisation, Mr. Maunder works out his theme in an interesting manner, and thus summarises his results:—

This oldest picture-book of all was designed nearly five thousand years ago by a people dwelling somewhere between the Aegean and the Caspian, which domesticated the bull, the sheep, the goat, the dog, and the horse; which hunted the bear, the lion and the hare, and used the bow and the spear. Yet a people not merely nomadic, but either maritime themselves or at least acquainted with the ocean and with navigation. They had made not a little progress in astronomy, for they had determined the length of the year and had carried the science of observation so far that they could recognise the position of the sun relative to the various ecliptic groups of stars. Their religion involved the erection of altars and the rite of sacrifice. They were acquainted with stories of the Fall and the Deluge, substantially the same as those preserved to us in the early chapters of Genesis, and they devised many of the constellations to give appropriate and permanent record of them; no doubt because they were included, as with ourselves, in their sacred history.

To the National Review Mr. Adrian Hofmeyr contributes "An Africander's Reflections on the Future of South Africa." Writing as a loyal and enthusiastic subject of the Queen, though entirely Dutch by race, Mr. Hofmeyr having referred in plain terms to former blunders of British administration in South Africa, speaks of the present as a supreme opportunity, and perhaps the last, for securing peace and unity in that country. It must be, he is strongly convinced, under British rule, and he concludes with a series of pleas which he regards as essential for a happy settlement, the first being that the Home Government should abandon red-tape, and the second, that large and generous allowance should be made for those suspected of disloyalty, and the third that the equality of the Dutch and English languages should be recognised.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Christ the Revealer," by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom.

If God made the Human soul in the likeness of Himself, and also made all visible Nature to symbol some portion of His own attributes, then whenever our souls come into earnest contact with Nature, the material symbol of His Power or Love may so act upon a mind made in His image, as to raise in us the irresistible consciousness of a mighty and mysterious Spirit in some communion with our own—of something in our own nature akin to the Spirit that made the universe—and the God who is within us, and the God who is without us, be palpably revealed. It is not that our intellects draw this inference from Nature by any logical process, but that God has so formed and fashioned us after Himself that Nature, being also full of Him, casts our souls into these frames of sentiment, impresses this feeling upon us. We spiritually receive it; we do not logically deduce it. Nature, like a signet of God, imprints the Image and Superscription of the Almighty upon souls that His hand hath also prepared for the impression. The immediate evidences of God are all in the original constitution and direct experiences of our own souls; and only kindred manifestations of Himself in His mirror of the universe, or breathed to us from the nobler souls of others, draw these internal signatures into fuller light, as heat develops heat. Reason itself is not so much an independent instrument by which we discover God, as it is a ray of God in us. It is God witnessing of Himself, because He has given us of His own Spirit. "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have the Spirit of God, that we may know the things which are freely given us of God." This is the instruction of St. Paul; and the old Hebrew mind knew it well. "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding." Strange that this, the elementary truth of all Religion, should still have to be taught, and by so many be regarded as a dark saying—strange that in these modern days, though Christ has come between, we have scarce yet attained to the spiritual insight of Solomon or Job! Our Father has quickened us with His own Spirit, and every vivid manifestation of that Spirit swells the derived nature that is in us with a fuller wave from the infinite Light. Thus only can we personally know Him.

And hence I believe that nothing, in the way of language, could be more fitted spiritually to misdirect us than the established expression, "the Evidences of Religion"—as if Religion was the acceptance of a proposition that was proved, instead of the consciousness of living relations to a living God personally recognised. Religion has no irresistible evidences except in spiritual experiences. The real evidences are not argumentative proofs of God's existence or character offered to the mind—they are living manifestations of Him presented directly to the soul. The evidences that are worth anything are not reasonings, but the facts of the Spirit which witness to us that our souls have a Master, an Inspirer, a Comforter, a Judge, who is not ourselves. What are the evidences of Religion when God speaks in the conscience? The state of the soul itself is the only proof of the immediate action of the Holy One: there is no third person or thing between us and Him.—What are the evidences of Religion when the midnight heavens raise in us the awe of an Almighty Presence? There are no evidences that can be offered in the form of an argument, for no premisses can involve an Infinite Being unless they first assume it; but there are manifestations of a living God in those serene outgoings of His Power which appeal to sensibilities that His own hand has strung, and create the direct conviction and mysterious sympathy which breaks out in the adoring worship of the Psalmist: "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained, what is Man that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of Man that Thou visitest him?"—What are the evidences of Religion when Jesus Christ shows us the Father? There are no evidences but a spiritual apprehension of the human Image of God's Goodness, and if we have no eyes to see that, Testimony, miracles witnessed or miracles reported, will no more convince or convert us, than they converted the Jews who knew not the Father nor him, who could not see the Divine lineaments in the form of a Servant: it is not logical inference, but spiritual manifestation, the shining in our hearts, as the Apostle says, of the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of His Son. And thus all that can with any truth be called Religious Evidences are our spiritual experiences themselves, which are either the direct action of God's Spirit upon ours, or the action of His Spirit upon us through the medium of the universe, which is His mirror, or through the mediation of one of His children who is in fuller communion with Him than we are, and therefore manifests Him more mightily than we do—until the manifestation reaches its height in that Son of God and Son of Man in whom was the fulness of the prophetic spirit and the filial life.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I WONDER whether you are beginning to feel tired of looking through other people's eyes at all the pictures that have been shown to you lately. Well, there is just one more that I should like to give you a peep at to-day, because someone lived there whom you have all learnt to know and love, I think; Louisa Alcott, who wrote "Little Women," and "Good Wives," and "Little Men," and all the other first favourites of at least every girl of the last thirty years.

We had reached Boston, the final and most delightful of our halting-places in our pleasant little trip to the States; and when our good friend asked, "Now, what places round about do you most want to see?" I promptly replied, "Longfellow's house, Harvard University, and the village of Concord." "I think I can fix that for you," was his kind answer; and "fix it" he did in the most satisfactory manner possible. A senior student was found to take us to the College buildings and grounds, and to show us the white "homey" house where the world-beloved poet, Longfellow, lived and worked; while for our ever-to-be-remembered visit to Concord he gave us, as companion, his bright young daughter whom, speaking as "Aunt Amy," I felt ready to adopt as a "niece" on the spot.

Concord, from its name, should be full only of memories of love and harmony, should it not? But that can scarcely be said of it; for though this May morning—as we enter the carriage which is to take us for a drive round—is fine and clear, setting forth in its purest beauty the peaceful landscape of grassy fields and meandering river, yet our guide points here and there to spots which tell of hatred and war in the past. These we are glad to pass by and forget as soon as we can; though at the same time we cannot help feeling how proud the nation must be of her defenders in those unhappy times—of Washington who led, and of the brave men who followed him. See, that statue is of a Minute Man; so called because such men as he were ready at a minute's notice to go to serve their country. There he is, standing by his plough, stalwart and strong, doing his work; but the gun is close by, and he is ever prepared for the expected call.

And now let us pass—as how often is done in real life—out of the path of war and hatred into that of abiding love, by the passage through the peaceful cemetery. Sleepy Hollow it is called; a quaint name well suited for the place. Here, lighted up by the pleasant sunshine, in the midst of trees and shrubs clad in their new spring garments, we find the spots where the earthly caskets of some of the sweetest spirits of this last century have been laid down. Marked by a huge block of pink quartz is the grave of Ralph Waldo Emerson, of whom I will tell you something presently; further on are those of the family of Nathaniel Hawthorne, whom you may know as the writer of old-world stories in "The Wonder Book" and "Tanglewood Tales." And here, do you see these little white stones? these are the graves of Louisa Alcott and her sisters—the four whom we remember best as Meg and Jo, Beth and Amy.

Now, passing out of Sleepy Hollow, let us go to see the very houses where these "Everybody's friends" lived. I must not stop at each one, but here is where Louisa Alcott lived; there is the garret where she read and munched the russet apples, and here the garden in which she and her sisters played. Do you remember the hymn she wrote? This is what she says about it in her journal:—

I used to imagine my mind was a room in confusion, and I was to put it in order; so I swept out useless thoughts and dusted foolish fancies away, and furnished it with good resolutions, and began again. But cobwebs get in. I'm not a good housekeeper, and never get my room in nice order. I once wrote a poem about it when I was fourteen, and called it "My Little Kingdom." It is still hard to rule it, and always will be, I think.

If you ever get a chance of reading Louisa Alcott's life I advise you to do so, for it is wonderful to see how bravely she fought in this great battle of life. Her father was a man of ideas, but these did not bring in money; the beauty of her mother's character may be seen from her impersonation as "Marmee" in "Little Women." It was a very hard life this high-minded family had to lead, and it was Louisa who, beginning to help at the age of sixteen, did most to keep it going. But you must not think of her as just a genius, taking up her pen and letting it run on, and so bringing in golden guineas. No, her story is the story of a constant struggle with difficulty; though living in the simplest fashion, it was very hard to get enough for the merest necessities. But honest work of any or every kind was thankfully taken and faithfully performed. Listen to this entry in her diary when she was only twenty-one:—

In January I started a little school. . . . about a dozen in our parlour. . . . In May, when my school closed for holidays, I went to L—— as second girl. I needed the change, could do the wash, and was glad to earn my two dollars (8s. 4d.) a week.

Now, that is what I call a brave life. Nothing is mean or low to the truly noble in spirit. And Louisa is not ashamed of her washing; why should she be? She can do it well, and she can sing the while.

Queen of my tub, I merrily sing,
While the white foam rises high,
And sturdily wash, and rinse and wring,
And fasten the clothes to dry;
Then out in the free fresh air they swing
Under the sunny sky.

I wish we could wash from our hearts and our souls
The stains of the week away,
And let water and air by their magic make Ourselves as pure as they;
Then on the earth there would be indeed
A glorious washing day.

"Hope, and keep busy," was one of her good mother's mottoes, and Louisa sturdily set herself to carry out its advice. Presently we find her getting a few dollars for stories, but this more congenial work does not prevent her earning money in other ways when she can get it. We read again in her journal:—

Finished "Twelve Bubbles" (story). Sewed a great deal, and got very tired; one job for Mr. G. of a dozen pillow-cases, one dozen sheets, six fine cambric neckties, and two dozen handkerchiefs, at which I had to work all one night to get them done, as they were a gift to him. I only got four dollars.

And so, working and hoping, hoping and keeping busy, Louisa Alcott went on until after "Little Women" had appeared which brought her first great success; and then—at the age of forty—she was able to feel that her long cherished dream had been realised, that by her exertions the family had enough money to enable them to live in comfort, and that her beloved "Marmee" could sit in a pleasant room, with "no poverty to worry, but with peace and comfort all about her, and children glad and able to stand between trouble and her."

And did she do all her work without help from anybody? No, no; indeed, no one in this great, wonderful world of ours can do good all alone—that is one of Nature's most beautiful laws, as it seems to me. Louisa had many helpers; first in her own home circle and then in her neighbours and friends, chief among whom was that Ralph Waldo Emerson of whom I spoke just now. To Louisa Alcott he was "Master"; and many a time did she write letters to him, which she never sent, or left wildflowers on his doorstep without a word to say from whom they came; and, indeed, it was not until many years later that she told him of her innocent worship. She writes:—"Emerson remained my 'Master' while he lived, doing more for me—as for many another—than he knew, by the simple beauty of his life, the truth and wisdom of his books, the example of a great good man, untempted and unspoiled by the world which he made better while in it, and left nobler and richer when he went."

And now we have the privilege of entering the house of this "Master," to be kindly received by his daughter and introduced into his very study, where his window looked down the path leading to the front gate; an emblem, surely, of the way in which he did not allow his graver studies to shut him off from sympathy with common everyday life. I was told in Boston one day that his writings have become so well known and loved that enough copies have been sold to enable half the households in the whole United States to possess one for itself; and as all Emerson's works were directed towards the uplifting of men and women into paths of sweetness and light, we should feel that the little village of Concord deserves a place in our grateful recollection if he alone had lived and worked there; and this feeling is deepened when we think of the many others who have sent out their messages of cheer and blessing broadcast over the world—whose homes may still be seen dotted here and there along the country roads.

HARVEST THANKSGIVING.

EVERY year the beautiful old story of the fruitful earth is told over again, to those who will attend and hear—the story of a great friendliness to the children of men, a wise friendliness, which gives most to patient, steadfast labour and careful forethought, which asks faithful service, but then as from the impulse of a generous heart pours out its beautiful gifts abundantly. True, that in the great harvest of the world light and shadow are constantly blended, there come misfortunes and at times dire calamities; but even these may not be set down as altogether evil in the continuous discipline of men, for they call forth courage and endurance, they quicken sympathy and mutual helpfulness, and teach lessons of a true humanity which otherwise might not be learnt. Such a famine as that which has this year desolated so large a part of India may seem too overwhelming and too terrible in the unutterable sufferings it has caused; and yet we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that a great part of this suffering ought to have been prevented, and that its recurrence can and must be prevented, if we are to do our duty by India; for we are assured that while drought must from time to time burn up great tracts of the land a wiser and more generous administration would deliver the people from the worst effects of such calamity. And altogether we may be bold to say that in the world as it is to-day, with the available resources of experience and civilisation, every year's harvest brings enough for all and to spare, and if anywhere there is failure and privation, it is the fault not of the bountiful earth, but of the dullness or the evil selfishness of men. We have yet many things to learn as to the best way of sharing the good gifts of the earth; but through hardship and noble self-sacrificing labours we are constantly learning, and shall have growing reason to rejoice and give thanks at harvest time.

For those whose lot is cast in the country, who are themselves tillers of the soil, or in any way labourers upon the land, this season brings memories of personal life mingled with the fortunes of the changing year—the early spring, the blooming of the fruit trees, the maturing of the fruit and grain; joys and sorrows of home are blended with these interests, the careful watching, the alternating hope and fear, the steadfast resolve to meet any trouble that may spring up, the great thankfulness when the harvest is safely gathered in. At the same time are stored up lessons of experience, with a deepening feeling of dependence on the earth, the need of constant obedience to her laws and strenuous use of every power in daily service, if the best treasures are to be gained.

But the greater part of our people are townsfolk, or are engaged in very different occupations, and they miss all that intimate experience and interest in the life of the fields, and can share only through sympathy the peculiar joy of a harvest-home. And yet, if such is our lot, our thoughts have a wider range, and our sympathy and gladness reach out further over the earth, for the stores that make our harvest are gathered in from many lands. From every quarter of the globe the swift ships bring the varied produce which shall help to feed the people of our crowded cities, while in return are sent out other fruits of patient labour and the riches of our land. Thus the carriers of the world by sea and land are helping in the great harvest, and no less those who labour in the mines or at the furnace or the forge, those whose work is in the factory, the warehouse or the office. When we are rejoicing in our harvest, and think what it teaches us and how we can do our part better in the years to come, we have to consider that our duty lies not only in the line of the direct cultivation of the land in the best possible way, but even more, in these days, in the right ordering of our social state, in all the varied labour and commerce of the world.

The great struggle against the corn laws in this country is not yet forgotten. Its happy ending gave to a people repeatedly on the verge of starvation daily bread, and secured to them that the bountifulness of the earth should no longer mock their poverty and helplessness. So every effort to set free the commerce of the world, to bring distant lands nearer together, to render easier the interchange of their different produce, has made for the same good end. In this country much more might surely still be done, by reformed land laws and by other means, to lead back many of our people to a country life, thus making the land more productive, and relieving to that extent the dreadful pressure of poverty in great cities.

Every year the lesson is brought home to us with fresh intensity, when we think of the condition of our own people and of other nations throughout the world, how closely our whole life is linked with the life and fruitfulness of the earth, and how much depends on growing wisdom and self-control in civilised nations, on a clearer apprehension of mutual interest, that shall make ignorant and insane hostility impossible—an interest which must lead through friendly co-operation at last to a genuine sense of brotherhood among men.

In the midst of our harvest thankfulness, we have to mourn this year not only the dreadful calamity which has befallen our brethren in India, but for yet sadder reasons the desolation of the war in South Africa, thousands of lives lost, many other thousands maimed and impoverished, while of the people's wealth millions have been worse than wasted in a conflict which ought to have been avoided—millions, the loss of which we do not yet realise in the heavy burden it must lay upon our people. And yet while we are learning the stern lessons of these calamities, we may take comfort in the thought of the wonderful recuperative power of Nature and of our own race, if only we will dare to be true to its inward law.

We do not live by bread alone, though without bread we cannot live. And we are coming to understand that as a people we can only have the bread which is needed for our life, if we have also that other nourishment, which is the Word of GOD to every living soul. That is to say, we cannot have for all our people and for all the peoples of the earth, enough of the outward daily bread and the simple, natural joys of life on earth, unless we have in our hearts righteousness, compassion and brotherly love. So GOD is leading us to see further and understand more clearly the meaning of our life, in which outward things, things of the earth and the material frame, are so wonderfully blended with the inner spirit. Only the true spirit can overcome our difficulties, rightly order our growing, complex life. Mere self-interest must fail, but righteousness and truth, compassion and brotherly love, in a word the wise and holy spirit that was in JESUS CHRIST, the purest spirit of our common humanity, that can rule and conquer, and destroy the evil which else must destroy us.

The kingdoms of this earth must be made kingdoms of the living GOD, if all the people are to have bread enough, if all the goodness of GOD in this rich and beautiful earth is to be fully enjoyed. That will be the true harvest of faith and love, for which we have to work and pray, when from every heart shall go up the song of joy and thankfulness: "The earth hath yielded her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us."

THE EDUCATION OF MAN.*

BY THE REV. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN, D.SC., &c.

"Let all things be done unto edifying."—1 Cor. xiv. 26.

LET all things be done unto edifying, or, as we might say, unto building up, for the expression used here by Paul represents an architectural notion applied in a spiritual sense. In another way, our word "education" is possessed of a similar meaning. It really signifies: to draw out the mental powers of the child, to stir them up into activity, and to discipline the activity thus provoked. We might therefore say also: let all things be done unto educating, taking education in its broadest and highest sense.

And, in thus paraphrasing this great saying of the Apostle Paul, we feel we are not doing serious violence to his full meaning. For he undoubtedly looked upon Religion as the supreme education of man. Every element of knowledge was, in his eyes, but a schoolmaster to lead us to Christ; and the Law itself, however sacred in virtue of its supposed divine origin, was no more, whatever the Scribes and Pharisees might say. This idea was promptly taken up by the Christian Church and applied by her with increasing rigidity as time went on. Not only was all available knowledge made to minister to the needs of Theology, but the actual truth and practical value of all knowledge were made to depend upon their harmony, real or apparent, with certain canons of truth already determined.

Those canons were the test of all that deserved the name of knowledge, and what they did not know, it was not always safe to call knowledge. Thus the foundations were laid of that great historical conflict which arose, as was inevitable, when the human mind, recovering itself, insisted on comparing the results of its investigations with the teachings of dogmatic Christianity.

Wisely taught by the experience of the past, the British Association, which we so cordially welcome in Bradford this year, has carefully abstained from anything that might tend to intensify that painful conflict in our times. The present popularity of the Association with all classes is indeed in marked contrast to the feeling which prevailed openly in certain quarters in former days. Such a popularity is the best proof of the wise moderation and truly liberal attitude of that influential body. Its members state the results of their investigations with a simplicity entirely free from all aggressiveness, calmly assured that there is something divine in the nature of truth, which must ultimately appeal to the mind and heart of all sincere worshippers. However, the study of the momentous conflict between Religion and Science in the past certainly reveals two most important facts:—

First, in all that has to do with certain metaphysical ideas and theories, Science has been unable to affect Theology in any marked degree. The contingent realm of second causes is the proper sphere of Science; the investigation of laws, the testing of the facts of experience, the just application of induction and deduction within the strict limits of observed phenomena, these constitute her domain. Whenever Science has attempted to go outside of her province, she has ceased to be Science, and therefore has failed to make good her position or to justify her attacks. Her telescopes and microscopes are powerless in respect to that which is beyond the reach of scientific scrutiny. The story is often told, to illustrate the anti-religious tendencies of science, how one day Napoleon I. met the great astronomer Laplace soon after the publication of his work on the Dynamics of the Solar System. "I noticed," said the Emperor to Laplace, "that in your book the name of God does not occur anywhere," "Sire," answered Laplace, "I had no need of that hypothesis." Now, we should realise that such an answer is not necessarily a materialistic and an irreligious one, but that it may be, and probably was, the blunt answer of a mathematician who did not feel justified in introducing theological terms in a strictly scientific work, merely for the sake of appearances. He understood the proper sphere of Science and rigidly kept to it. For this he only deserves praise. But, on the other hand, it must be recognised that within her own province Science has undoubtedly compelled Theology to modify her former views in several important particulars.

For instance, the defeats of Theology in the field of Astronomy are well known; her defeats in the field of Geology are more recent, but no less striking. Many of us can still remember the discussions respecting the antiquity of man. Since then, that antiquity has been steadily increasing, as is clearly shown by the latest discoveries made at Abydos by a distinguished member of the British Association, Professor Flinders Petrie. The usual answer to those facts is that they prove the mistakes of theologians as interpreters of Revelation, but that they prove nothing against the Revelation itself. This view of the case has not passed unchallenged, but, in any case, the answer practically amounts to a confession that Churches which have allowed theologians to mislead them possess no infallible guidance in their interpretation of Revelation; a view which, in spite of official affirmations, is steadily forcing itself upon the intellect of Christian laymen, at least. Hence, the remarkable caution now exhibited by ecclesiastical authorities in connection with scientific subjects.

While admitting the wisdom of this new attitude, unknown to the age of Copernicus and Galileo, it must, however, be said that the new attitude would more fully command our confidence, if exaggerated claims had not been so rashly made in the past. The question may be asked: Should not a knowledge resting upon infallible grounds have also some infallible sense of its own limits? If not, is not that knowledge constantly exposed to the dangers of which we have been made aware during the last three hundred years by the steady advances of human science? However, this great and, on the whole, painful conflict between Religion and Science has not been useless. It has enabled us to realise more clearly their respective limits, and it has, at the same time, done away with elements of confusion which were equally prejudicial both to Science and to Religion in the minds of men.

The doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge which pervades our modern thought has come to teach us the vanity of all efforts on the part of Science to deal with the Absolute. The principle of relativity which the philosopher finds to be true of mind, Science also finds to be true of the Cosmos, and this indicates to her her province. Science has not and cannot have any complete knowledge even of the essential nature of matter; how then could she legitimately propound theories about spirits and their destiny? As it is, the field of labour opened to Science is vast enough and glorious enough to satisfy her most boundless ambition. Her duty is to minister to the intellectual side of the education of humanity, and to her therefore we may say, in the words of Paul: "Let all things be done unto edifying." May she go on building up our knowledge, relative though it be, of our surroundings, of our conditions of existence; and may her best efforts tend to that end, for thus only can the social destinies of man become fully understood.

But here a grave objection presents itself, about which it would be unworthy of us to remain silent because of the difficulties involved in it. The objection is this: if the natural powers with which we are endowed thus limit human science to the realm of the relative and the contingent, how are we to reach to anything beyond? If Science is logically forced to avoid both affirmation and denial in all that has to do with the ultimate cause of phenomena, and with their ultimate destination, what organ, it may be asked, remains to man by the help of which he may hope to pierce through the rigid circle that limits his vision? In other words, if such be, strictly speaking, the conditions of human science, what becomes of Religion?

This difficulty has been fully realised by modern philosophers, by no one perhaps more clearly than by Immanuel Kant. For him, the human intellect is the illuminating and regulating agent of our nature, but it is the human will which really rules over all our faculties. It proffers affirmations of its own which are as much natural facts as any other facts, and which therefore we cannot leave out of account in our calculations. Now, what does it affirm? In presence of a physical order bound in law, it affirms a moral order founded on freedom. It does not explain that freedom, but it gives us an invincible sense of it. Also, it affirms the supreme fact of duty; it lays thus the foundation of morality, and upon the real raises the ideal.

Reasoning alone, according to Kant, may fail to reach the mystery of Being and Substance, God and the Soul. But man is not merely reason; he is will, feeling, conscience also, and the report of this side of his nature, the practical reason, as Kant call it, carries with it what may not be reasonably ignored or resisted. When Vauvenargues said, "Les grandes pensées viennent du cœur," he was not uttering a mere paradox; he was really giving expression to the same view, only in a more picturesque form.

This attitude of the Philosopher of

* A sermon preached in Chapel Lane Chapel, Bradford, in connection with the meeting of the British Association, Sept. 9, 1900.

Kœnigsberg towards the great problem has been adopted more or less openly by many other thinkers with various modifications. But substantially the idea remains the same, for it is not a mere philosophical figment; it has its roots deep in our nature. Religions have not given it to us; it has given us Religion. Even the latest and most advanced views of Evolution fail to weaken the claims of our moral nature. For there is no evolution out of nothing; evolution implies the progressive development of something. If there are moral phenomena increasingly manifested in this universe, it must be because the conditions of a moral element are somehow represented, however faintly, in the Reality out of which those phenomena originate.

Thus all sides of man's nature are contributing to the education of man; all things are being done "unto edifying," unto the building up of the perfect man through science and through love. In this conception, the painful conflict between Religion and Science has its termination; the proper limitations of science are acknowledged, and the sphere of the ideal, and of the religion which that ideal inspires, is found to rest upon a faculty that feels, in its own way, the evidence which it cannot see.

Shall we refuse to listen to one of the voices within us, because it seems to lose in distinctness what it gains in sublimity of utterance? We cannot prove goodness and beauty as we can prove a theorem of Euclid; yet we feel assured that the good and the beautiful are as much of a reality as the true. Here we are not afraid to trust to feeling; we know ourselves ennobled by that trust. Is the case different where Religion is concerned? Linnæus, a man of true scientific disposition, watching once the unfolding of a blossom, exclaimed: "I saw God in His glory passing near me, and bowed my head in worship." This is the spirit in which we may best hold communion with Nature; thus we shall be saved from the misfortune of losing sight of her profound unity, while we are bent upon the study of manifold separate aspects.

Dante, in his vision, thought he saw the story of Nature no longer scattered in disconnected leaves, but bound with love divine into one mystic volume.* It is the glory of our humanity that she has come to feel herself called to realise within herself, in a theme at least, the meaning of that sublime vision. Science is steadily gathering into her bosom treasures of knowledge; earth, air, and sky are being searched, and the mind of man is gradually binding into one sacred volume the leaves which Science finds scattered through the Universe, and gathers together in the course of the ages with such noble and untiring industry.

Thus, slowly but surely, we rise to a truer conception of the supreme unity of Nature, and the conviction is borne in upon us that our highest knowledge and our highest spiritual anticipations are both the normal result of a universal Cosmic process. In this conviction lies the final harmony between Religion and Science; it helps us to realise how, by letting "all things be done unto edifying," our hearts and minds may be made to minister with combined usefulness to the education of humanity, led by the love "that beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

And we are thus emboldened to conclude with the Poet's prayer which seems to express so perfectly the feeling of our time in respect to the searchings of our minds and the longings of our hearts:

"... Knowledge is of things we see;
And yet we trust it comes from Thee,
A beam in darkness: let it grow."

MEADROW CHAPEL, GODALMING.

III.

DURING almost a century, more records are preserved of the societies connected with the chapel than of the chapel itself. Mr. Joseph Brent is said to have been the founder of the Sunday-school, but it could only have been working about a year when he was called away to Portsmouth, and from 1813 until the present time it has, I believe, always been considered one of the most important branches of our work at Meadrow.

A combination of three schemes was proposed under the title of a "Benevolent Society." It was designed to give instruction to the ignorant, in reading, writing, &c., on the Sabbath day; to establish a lending library; and to give relief to the poor. The third object had to be abandoned for want of sufficient funds. The second was enthusiastically pursued. An income of about £10 a year was at the disposal of the workers; in three years they had ninety volumes on their shelves, and in six they report:—

Your committee announce with much satisfaction the augmentation of books to your library. Priestley's works are continued taking in; and those of Milton's and other admired authors are swelling our library lists. No one surely can mistake the invitation furnished him to make a proper disposition of his talents and his time. He is snatched from the base of perilous enjoyment and recreation to mix in the society of truth and inspiration. It is reading that makes society more congenial, and solitude more enjoyable. The married man is made more social, the single more conversant, the child more interesting, the parent more caressing."

To this society and to a kindred one of later formation are owing, doubtless, the large collection of books, theological for the most part, that cover one wall of the old chapel; there are Christian Reformers from 1816 to 1862; Monthly Repositories of the years near 1830; probably a complete set of General Baptist Advocates; General Baptist Assembly reports from 1815 to 1832, and British and Foreign Unitarian reports from 1826 to 1838, with many other books of useful historical reference. The ebbs and flows of library membership, the new accommodation for books, the attempt to open it one evening a week as a reading-room—all these are carefully recorded. A curious calculation is extant, dated 1828, signed by Richard Wood, secretary, as follows:—

This library now contains 261 volumes, which averages an increase of 20 vols. per year since its commencement, during which period the different books have been taken out about 1,000 times; which amounts to eight times for each book being read, and three books, on an average, taken out every Sunday; and six hours being allotted to the reading each book will give three hours each day (Sunday excepted) to the reading of the library books. Now, if we took three hours to be equal to three hours labour at 2d. per hour, the amount for each work will be 3s., which for thirteen years will exceed £100, so that knowledge to the amount of £100, as interest, has been derived from the society, while the principal, or books, remain still in our possession and use.

Running on parallel lines with the library for eight years, and finally merged into it apparently as a juvenile branch, was the Meadrow Christian Tract Society, started about the same date (1832) as similar societies at Billingshurst and Horsham. The moderate subscription of a halfpenny per week was charged, and Mr. John Cooke was the first treasurer; he had the unusual experience of "getting weary of the continual balance in hand"; and it was decided to relieve the library funds of the charge of the Sunday-school and transfer its management to the Tract Society. It began with forty-six members, but in three years numbered only 27; and the secretary reports:—

"The periodicals taken regularly are the 'Christian Teacher,' 'Christian Reformer,' 'Christian Pioneer,' 'Christian Child's Faithful Friend,' which your secretary feels it his duty to state are not much inquired for." Pleasure is, however, expressed "In the disposition which is becoming so general among our countrymen to form themselves into organised masses for all purposes tending to mental, moral, and religious improvement as a most excellent feature in the varied manifestations of the progressing spirit of the age."

It is especially explained that the Society is not started in antagonism to any of their Christian brethren, and that no controversial tracts will be circulated beyond the congregation unless applied for. In the school also "no peculiar religious sentiments are inculcated." The children are to come "clean and well combed," and no flogging is to be allowed; two stools are bought for the use of the teachers; 3s. 0d. is spent on "knives, quills, &c."; a letter from Horsham cost 8d., while they can send one to London for 7d. There is the chronic complaint of the want of a few more teachers; "we still find it quite impossible to persuade some of our young friends, that they might perform all the duties of life, and yet teach in our school once in three weeks; on the other hand we have the invaluable assistance of some teachers who neglect no business, and consider it the performance of a duty, to listen with an attentive ear to their poorer brethren who entreat that they may be taught to read and write; to such teachers distance is no impediment, and a desire to do good overcomes all difficulty."

Enthusiastic and energetic teachers they were! In some cases it is reported they had to come six or nine miles, and to be there by 9 A.M. Few schools can boast twenty-four teachers and three superintendents to forty-four scholars; yet as the staff attended only one Sunday in three it is about our present average proportion in the South. At one time in its history seven out of nine teachers belonged to the Ellis family. The Rev. Hy. Williamson, of Dundee, was among the scholars at Meadrow; probably also the Rev. Philemon Moore, as well as his father and grandfather.

Just now that in connection with our "Oxford movement" some of our leaders are advocating one service only a day, and an evening meeting conducted by the young people for themselves, it is interesting to look back to a similar experiment started at Meadrow in 1842 under the name of 'The Mutual Instruction Society. It had about forty members, and met alternately on Sunday and Wednesday evenings. Within the last few years elderly men have spoken of its meetings as giving them their first impulse to self-culture. Among the names of those who opened its discussions are Thomas Potter, John Cooke; John, Sidney, William and Alfred Ellis; James Kensett, Thomas Agate; and the Revs. E. Chapman and M. Davidson, who acted as leaders. Among the subjects discussed were:—

"Is a taste for literature favourable to morality?"
"The propriety of introducing a liturgy into Unitarian services."
"The necessity of individual exertion in Christian churches."
"What should be the primary object of Sunday-school teachers?"
"Advantages of prayer."
"Advantages of early piety."
"Saving faith."
"Baptism, its nature and obligations."
"The creation of all things."
"On the broad and comprehensive sympathy with humanity manifested by the poets," illustrated by extracts from Pope.
"Life, character and poetic genius of Percy Bysshe Shelley."
"Is the diffusion of knowledge among the people calculated to make them discontented with their situation?"
"Influence and necessity of amusements."
"How far is the want of proper amusements for the operative classes connected with the immorality and irreligion which exist?"
"On the effects likely to ensue from closing the shops in Guildford and Godalming at an earlier hour, in what way the leisure-time would probably be spent, and what provision exists for spending it well."
"What effects has temperance upon the morals and religion of man?"
"Present system of reforming criminals."

The society lasted about three years, and seems to have been broken up by a difference of opinion as to the rules by which its deliberations should be guided.

The ministry of the Rev. Edwin Chapman lasted from 1841 to 1846. He seems to have previously held the pulpits of Billingshurst, Deptford, Stamford-street, and Newington-green, though there is a little conflict of dates in "Vestiges of Protestant Dissent" as to his movements. In 1844 he delivered a course of six Sunday evening lectures, on doctrinal subjects, at Guildford. In 1846 his farewell sermon is thus recorded by one of its hearers:—

"Last Sunday our excellent minister, Mr. Chapman, preached his farewell sermon in the afternoon. It was an earnest and pathetic expression of concern for the welfare of his flock; he did not speak much of himself, but advised them to go on, in love, forbearance and kindness. Many shed tears; he was himself much moved."

When he died, thirty years later, those who remembered him spoke with deep feeling of their high appreciation of his character; their respect and admiration; and of the indebtedness of the Meadrow congregation to him.

He was succeeded by the Rev. Maxwell Davidson, who came from Billingshurst in 1846 and emigrated to Australia in 1851; he returned to England in 1858 and held the pulpit at Wareham for a few years. He, too, left behind a name still held in grateful remembrance.

John Robertson is next on the roll; he commenced his ministry at Meadrow in 1852; in 1854 he preached the "Oldbury Double Lecture"; in 1855 he accepted the pulpit at Lewes, but shortly left there for Halstead.

The Rev. Joseph Smith seems to have been in charge for the following seven years. The story here is difficult to trace, but probably during the many changes of the time the intervals were filled by lay and other help.

The Rev. Percy Bakewell, who had previously held charges at Northampton and Warwick, came in 1862 for three years; at the end of that time he went to Halifax. He died in 1868, and the Meadrow minute books record the letter of condolence sent to his father on that occasion.

In 1868 authentic records are again at our service. Mr. Edwin Ellis was elected secretary, and a tribute to his predecessor runs: "Mr. Jno. Cooke during many years of change, and some almost of disintegration and collapse, never relaxed his faith; his efforts to unite and bind together one and all never ceased." If more of us who hold that responsible office entered on it in the spirit of this gentleman and his successor, it might be the better for those beloved churches we serve.

At that date the Rev. W. D. Smyth was pastor, but the following year he resigned on account of ill-health, and the Rev. W. A. Clarke, of Pudsey, was invited. Among his staunchest helpers he counted the secretary, and Edwin Kensett, who was acting as treasurer. He was a man of considerable physical strength and great activity; we still remember here, how he used to walk to Horsham (twenty miles) on a Saturday afternoon, in order to exchange pulpits on the following day with Mr. Dunbar or Mr. Scott.

New Sunday-school accommodation was necessary, and after much consideration it was decided to use the old chapel as a schoolroom and build a new chapel close to the road. A legacy of £110 was used for the purpose, and about £200 collected from members of the congregation and friends. The last services in the old chapel were held on July 17, 1870; all the reports read hopefully about this time; a sewing class was started, a benevolent society arranged; collections for the French Fund, through M. Coquerel, and the Chicago Fund, through Robert Collyer, were made. In 1874 and 1875 courses of lectures were given in Guildford, and a Theological Reading Society was started, to which the Meadrow Library lent forty books. This energy reacted, for the time, favourably on Meadrow; the principal matter under discussion from 1870 to 1874 was one of church government; after long deliberation the church formally decided on severance from the General Baptist Assembly, with which it had been connected since its foundation. Toward the close of his ministry here, Mr. and Mrs. Clarke suffered a severe loss in the death of their young daughter. I was told, but lately, that he preached her funeral sermon from the same text he chose the evening of his own sudden death which occurred a few years ago. The success at Guildford resulted in the formation of a congregation, and building a church there which was opened in 1877, and by degrees the activities of the congregation naturally flowed toward the more populous locality. Mr. Clarke resigned the joint ministry of Meadrow and Guildford in 1882.

The Rev. Samuel Pinkerton was at Meadrow from 1886 to 1890, and either before or after those dates the Revs. Frank Freeston and Edgar Fripp each had a student's supply year there. The Rev. Hubert Clarke commenced his work there in 1894, and among the results of it is the formation of a good string band which leads the musical part of the service, and which has solved in another way the problem Mr. and Mrs. Watts set themselves to unravel, in the near neighbourhood.

This series of articles must not close without an acknowledgment of Mr. Ellis' kindness in allowing me the use of several of the manuscript books. An extract of one entry in his handwriting may fitly conclude them.

MINUTE BOOK, 1869.

We ask a man to come and minister to us, to accept such small stipend as we can collect, we say to him in effect "we are sadly overdone with every-day cares, and some of our highest thoughts and best feelings are like to be choked. We cannot verify all our views, nor read up on disputed points; our ideas of education and of life get obscured and narrowed by our circumscribed vision—come and help us, minister to our highest needs, let us have the advantage of views from a higher standpoint than our own, rule us by your stronger efforts in the path of duty, show us how to work with you to the end we have in view." There is no more wonderful relationship than this between pastor and flock, nothing more sad and painful if it is incomplete and unreal, nothing more cheering and more beautiful if harmonious and complete. VEGETARIANISM.

SIR,—In reference to Mr. Mott's letter in last week's INQUIRER, the definition of cruelty as "inflicting unnecessary pain" is one which will serve well enough for the question under discussion. While entirely dissenting from his axiom that "moral right and wrong have no connection with purely physical actions," I agree that the justifiable element in all slaughter depends upon its necessity or otherwise. At present it does not appear possible for us vegetarians to be consistent non-slaughterers, but as regards products, such as food, feathers, and furs, it is abundantly proved by example that they are not among the necessaries of life. Therefore to avail ourselves of them is to be guilty of a "cruel" action, as per definition. Mr. Mott's gentle raillery as to those creatures, such as vermin, which we are forced to kill for the sake of health and comfort, of course does not apply. In defence of our lives, too, we must kill. Vegetarians need by no means "confine themselves to this argument," but even if they should do so their case will be a sufficiently hard nut for the kreophagist to crack.

It is curious that the statement should have been made that "from the earliest times man has been a flesh-eater." What is meant by "man"? Certainly the whole human race has not always been, any more than it is now, carnivorous, and some tribes, following their original instincts, have been cannibals, but this does not prove that they were divinely intended to be so, or so to remain. Moreover, science tells us that the teeth, jaws, and digestive organs of humanity were never meant for masticating and assimilating flesh-foods, being almost precisely like those of the monkeys which are entirely frugiverous.

It is scarcely a correct statement that those races which have subsisted on a vegetable and fruit diet have "been of little account in the world's history." What about the highly cultured Indian races and the ancient civilisation of China? The Chinese are even now proving, and proving very vigorously, that we must recognise them as of some importance. It is certain also that fighting qualities do not solely reside in consumers of animal food. Another point to be remembered on this head is that until the last generation or two the mass of the inhabitants of these islands were too poor to be flesh-eaters to any great extent, and yet it was with these men that we won our victories. Napoleon, too, led to unequalled military glory an army composed of oppressed and miserably poor peasants whose means could not possibly have procured much beyond pulse and bread.

A very serious consideration attaching to this subject is that if we are to base our conduct entirely upon the assumption that man, as the superior animal, has absolute rights over the lives of the inferior, we may come in time to believe that the higher humans ought to be preserved by the sacrifice of the lower, a doctrine which is already being put into practice by certain ardent Viennese vivisectors.

In conclusion, allow me to say that Mr. Mott is evidently mistaking my identity. My life is neither "useful" nor "beautiful," and certainly my fame can never have reached Leicester. RUTH MILLS.

Birmingham.

SIR,—If mankind took to a diet of vegetables, fruit, milk, and eggs, would killing cease? Suppose we leave the fish to eat one another, abolish altogether the pig, the turkey, the goose, the duck, and the pigeon, give up our pet the dog and the useful cat (to avoid the daily slaughter of thousands of puppies and kittens), let us even clothe ourselves with cotton and linen, deny ourselves the music of stringed instruments, and many other luxuries that are not necessary, and abolish the sheep. Let us get the State to pension the old horses, or let us work them till they die in harness, or let us abolish the horse, too, and have only automobiles, steam-ploughs, &c. When we have done all this, what about the superfluous cocks that are hatched from the eggs, the superfluous bulls born from the cows? What about the aged hens that have ceased to lay, the aged cows that have ceased to give milk? Surely some prophet will then arise and condemn the crime of an egg and milk diet, and we shall abolish the farmyard entirely, and digging and climbing man will be the only domestic animal left!

Now, putting aside the argument that man is what he is because he is omnivorous, let us look at the thing from the animals' side of the question. Would not the pleasure we should do away with be infinitely greater than the amount of pain we should abolish? I presume that the beasts know their hour of death no more than man knows his, and even a cruel death, as a rule, only lasts a few seconds—nothing compared with the months and years of happy well-fed existence.

THE MUSICAL VICAR.

THE fame of the musical vicar had reached me years ago, but it was not till the other day that I found myself in the town where he works and "plays." Looking over the announcements for the Sunday I was to spend there, I caught sight of his name appended to a notice that on that Sunday afternoon he would conduct a people's service, to include a performance of music on the orchestral organ, and an address on "What language does music speak?"—both by the vicar himself. When the appointed time came I found myself one of the "people"—mostly women and young persons—who were drawn to hear the accomplished clergyman. The service opened with two collects and the Lord's Prayer, the last being recited in the peculiar hurried manner but too common in churches of the Establishment. A hymn was then sung, one of several in the course of the service, the singing being chiefly done by a small choir of boys very imperfectly heard by me. The musical selections which followed included a piece by Gounod and two from Rossini's Stabat Mater, in which the properties of the orchestral organ were skilfully exhibited by the clerical organist, who also was the composer of the hymn tunes used on the occasion.

It would be unbecoming, in more than one way, were I to attempt a critical estimate of the performance, which was at the same time a service. If the soft passages seemed at times too soft, and the loud passages too loud, there may have been others who enjoyed it all just as it was, and to whom the whole was restful and inspiring. It was inevitable, I suppose, that, while I took with gratitude the comfort it brought me, I fell to musing whether there were no possibilities of similar Sunday afternoon services in some of our own better equipped churches. Here were some 400 people, probably, who at least found something worth listening to on that Sunday afternoon; and, if I was not too sanguine, it appeared that a very little judicious alteration in style would have rendered the occasion most beautifully gracious and memorable. I thought some of our musical ministers might easily emulate the vicar, by making some such provision for the "people's" Sunday afternoons; even if it is highly improbable that many of them can approach his technical skill, and certain that none of them has an organ with the roll of drums and clash of cymbals amongst its resources. But someone might be found to play. True, it would be unfair to impose on professional organists for gratuitous work; but there are not a few young musicians amongst us who might do themselves and the world a service by aiming at the ability requisite for such occasions. If the idea took root, why should there not grow up an Order of St. Cecilia amongst them, the aim of which would be the musical nurture of devout feelings amongst the people?

The vicar had his offertory at the close, and I should suppose that any expenses of printing and attendance would be much more than covered. The one bass soloist and the choir of boys probably volunteered—in any case the expense on this score in similar services need not be large. The one thing needful is to give the best music as far as possible in the best way.

We came ultimately to the address, and I should like not to be critical about that either, for one's heart went out to this unconventional, manly-looking man, who had so clearly chosen his own line and followed it out with earnest devotion. He read his address, however, and it was to be printed, we heard; so that it must be taken as having been somewhat carefully thought out and prepared. All the more it surprised one painfully. It missed its mark entirely, as it seems to me. The good man clearly started out to tell us that music speaks a universal language, but it is hardly credible that what he really did was to tell us that musical script is the same all the world over—which, unhappily, it is not. Surely, one thought, he will remind us that there is a power in sweet sounds to appeal to all hearers, no matter what their native land or speech may be; he will lead us through a contemplation of the universal sway of music to a realisation of the common heart of humanity, despite all divisions of sect, party, nation or race. Alas! not a word of it. And yet I feel he must have had some such idea in mind when he set out, but lost it somehow among his fugues. Another incredibility—at least if one had not heard it; this good, cultivated man, who is the responsible religious teacher of a large parish, and who in the course of a season addresses thousands of well-to-do visitors, actually told us that the English speak English, their neighbours across the Channel French, another race German, and another Arabic, "because of sin." Of course he only said so on the authority of the story of the Tower of Babel, which he duly quoted and evidently accepted implicitly. He was a sensible man, too, in many things; witness his straight advice to parents to secure to their children some facility in a second language, and so qualify them to receive and give the benefits of foreign intercourse. Witness also his hearty denunciation of the sham antique in church music, as for example when "Gregorian tones" are sung by congregations, and used by organists as a basis for the most florid accompaniments, than which nothing could be more glaringly out of place. The vicar evidently does not like the "Gregorian" style. He praised its inventors as good servants of their day, but claimed that the music of these later generations is vastly superior and is more appropriate to an intelligent worship of God. I thoroughly liked his outspokenness, also, in regard to the neglect often shown towards men who, like Keble and Neale, have rendered priceless service to the devotional life of the Church; and I heartily welcomed his plea for courage in adopting new methods of appealing to the masses and drawing them to the higher and nobler ideals of life. All the more, it seemed a pity that the "Gregorian tones" of Hebrew tradition still imposed themselves on him. And all the more, it seemed a duty that those who had something better to say in the light of later revelations should say it, whether anything like the musical vicar's allurements be employed or not.

GOD IN THE PRESENT.

ESSENTIAL Religion is the Art of Living—the sum of all other arts whatsoever. And the foundation of this art is practical. All progress made in the development of life has been through the invasion of reverent common sense into the realms of false imagination. Analysis of the Reformation will show that the eruptions which gave it power came from a deeper stratum than theological technicalities or surface dogma. Those who are claimed as martyrs of a particular section of evangelicalism, were in fact exponents of God's greatness in the human heart by its refusal to fly in the face of the verity of nature. Take, for instance, the tailor of Evesham, who was burnt because he maintained that Jesus sitting at supper could not give his disciples his living body to eat; such opinion was the certainty of a plain man, who would not believe what was repugnant to that reason which was the salvation and guide in the mystery of daily life. Such men were not the soldiers of a religious finality, but communicating links between the old and the new. It is not the letter of their faith that should be regarded, but its spirit.

It is the realisation of their spirit that turns our attention to contemporary thinkers. The Creator did not cast all his pearls, or even an undue proportion of them, into one age—not even into the Elizabethan.* In acknowledging present hearts as inspired we do not honour the past less, but our own age more. To such translators of the Divine, as to their forerunners, Earth is college, and the Creation itself the living Scripture. Older comments upon it they weigh and revise in the light of fuller knowledge, retaining all that is true, striking out all that is dead. They are the authoritative editors of the Great Manual; they bring it up to date; they gather together what has been discovered since it was last given to the world; they present to the apprentices of life not only the glories of original experience, but, in addition, the succour of the most recent. And they present it not only to apprentices, but also to those of the workmen who are sufficiently wise to believe that the axioms known at the time of the completion of their own indentures did not constitute the terminus of human knowledge.

The term "inspired" may in this sense be held to cover all those who by the sincerity and direction of original thought make life holy. In them all the operation of the sacred law of noble purpose and devotion to mankind will be clear. As the moon, by the fact of its revolving round our planet as its centre, also revolves round the greater attraction of the sun, those thinkers whose bond is human service, by that very bond are brought into the light of the Divine Radiance, and reflect the glory of the Supreme.

Thought is the regenerator of the individual, and therefore of the world. Thought is the root of action. Alter a man's heart belief, and you alter his life. It is modern thought that must in the first place feed the mind of modern man, as fresh wheat must feed his body. Modern thought alone is trained and prepared for the conquering of the new positions and strongholds to which error has shifted its mobile forces. Old books of tactics are useful neither in material nor spiritual warfare. They may answer in maintaining an unattacked position in one's own camp, but they will never overtake and overcome the enemy in his stronghold. The wisdom of the modern answers to the wants of the modern.

Take for the moment the message of one whom we may justly regard as among God's minor prophets, John Ruskin. He gives irresistible prominence to the necessity of contact with, and the understanding of the beauty of Nature as an indispensable religious factor. But had he lived ten centuries ago he would undoubtedly have given the same preponderance of emphasis to the wonder and freedom of towns. Towns in the earlier days were the up-builders of life: to-day they come perilously near to becoming its death-vault. The living teacher looks on the conditions of living men with actual eyes, and is able to adjust, according to his power, his ministration to the most critical wants of his age.

Amid all the turmoil, the littlenesses, the confusions of our own times, there have sounded through the lips of men who have lived, and are living in the same century as ourselves, inspired calls, as deep heart-music, as searching invocations to a truer and manfuller life, as subtle and all-embracing potencies of thought as ever have been breathed out beneath the sun. These are the angels of the God of the Living: they arouse men to the divinity of life here and now.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bootle.—The Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, was reopened on Sunday, 2nd inst., after extensive alterations and decoration, and presented a charming interior. The Rev. J. Morley Mills, late of Nantwich, who succeeds the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, entered upon his work, and preached, morning and evening, on "The Church of God" and "Our Gospel." Both sermons were deeply impressive and able, and the services were on a high level. Unusually large congregations assembled, and everything pointed to a bright future for the church. On Thursday, 6th inst., a large and cheering conversazione was held to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Mills. On the platform, besides the Chairman of the Church and others, were the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones (of Bradford), H. D. Roberts, R. S. Redfern, T. Lloyd Jones, J. F. Jones, J. L. Haigh, J. Anderton, and H. W. Hawkes; the Rev. J. Crossley was also present. Letters of regret for absence and of good wishes were received from the Revs. Dr. Klein, R. A. Armstrong, W. J. Jupp, J. C. Hirst, C. H. Wellbeloved, J. M. Whiteman, and D. Davis; and from Messrs. C. W. Jones, Cedric Boult, Sydney Jones, and others. Cordial welcomes were offered to Mr. and Mrs. Mills on behalf of the church, the Sunday-school, the Ladies' Work Society, the Liverpool District Missionary Association, the local ministers, and the laity (represented by Mr. R. Robinson). After an address from the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who first led Mr. Mills to enter our ministry, Mr. Mills responded in an eloquent and intensely earnest speech, which was a convincing augury of the spirit in which he has undertaken the pastorate. The addresses were interspersed with music by members of the choir, and concluded with a brilliant organ solo by Mr. Mount, the church organist. Refreshments and social intercourse followed. Friends from Southport, Liscard, Hope-street, the Ancient Chapel, Birkenhead, &c., were present.

Boston.—Mr. Briggs, of Nottingham, conducted the service at the Unitarian Chapel, Spain-lane, last Sunday evening. His sermon on the subject, "What is Man," was well rendered and much appreciated by the large number present.

Bradford.—In connection with the meeting of the British Association in Bradford, the preacher last Sunday, at Chapel-lane Chapel, was the Rev. Dr. Klein, of Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, who preached in the morning the sermon on "The Education of Man," which we are glad to be able to print in full in our present issue. In the evening Dr. Klein's sermon was on "The Romance of Human Learning." He took as his text Proverbs ii. 10-11, and dealt eloquently with the story of the progress of knowledge, and the obstacles which had to be overcome. It was not enough, he said, to enjoy the triumphs of science, they must gratefully remember the struggles of inventors and discoverers, men, aye and women too, who had become martyrs in the search of truth. The story of human learning was not merely romantic, it was highly instructive, and full of precious religious lessons. The romance of human learning presented the spectacle of men who, in spite of poverty and sickness, in spite of social drawbacks, in spite of lack of time, had successfully struggled to satisfy the highest cravings of their souls. They were examples as pathetic as anything we could read of in fiction, the struggles of the poor, the struggles of the rich, the struggles of the weak, the struggles of the deaf and the blind, the effort of the soul in spite of impediments to reach that harmony which it was made possible to reach. We must remember that these men had been gathering knowledge for us, they had been the martyrs and heroes of humanity, and the wealth of knowledge which we possessed, that which had laid the foundation and made it possible for the British Association to meet in Bradford, had been prepared by the sweat of the brow and the tears of anxiety and desire of these noble souls.

Dromore (co. Down).—On Thursday, Aug 30, the Rev. Alfred Davison was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian congregation, in succession to the late Rev. D. Thompson. The opening service was conducted by the Rev. W. E. Mellone, Moderator of the Armagh Presbytery, the sermon being preached by the Rev. S. C. Pinkerton, after which, the usual questions having been put and answered, the ordination prayer was offered by the Rev. J. F. Kennard, while the hands of members of the Presbytery were laid upon the kneeling candidate's head. The charge to minister and people was then delivered by the Rev. A. B. Hamilton. The members of the congregation subsequently entertained their visitors and other friends at luncheon, and in the evening a successful soirée was held, Mr. John Moore, J.P., presiding. At the luncheon the chair was taken by Mr. J. R. Miniss, among the speakers being the Very Rev. Mgr. M'Cartan, P.P.V.F., and Dr. Strain, while other orthodox ministers were among the guests.

Mossley.—The congregation of the Christian Church, Stamford-road, have had recently to mourn the death of Mr. William Mason, of Lorne-street, formerly manager of the Co-operative Society's Central Boot and Shoe Establishment; also of Mrs. Abraham Morrell, wife of the secretary of the Mossley Industrial Co-operative Society, and daughter of the late Mr. James Robinson, who is spoken of in a local paper as "the real founder of the Christian Church and Sunday-school in Stamford-road."

Pontypridd (Resignation).—The Rev. Dr. Griffiths has resigned his position as minister of the congregation meeting in the Old Town Hall.

Sheffield.—At the half-yearly meeting of the teachers' of the Sheffield and District Sunday School Union, held at Upperthorpe on Monday, Sept. 10—being the occasion of a paper by Mr. E. G. Chitty on his visit to the recent Summer Session of Sunday School Teachers at Oxford—a resolution was unanimously passed, strongly approving of Mr. Copeland Bowie's suggestion, made at the above Session, in favour of the issue of a yearly teachers' code, or book of rules and suggestions for the guidance of Sunday-school teachers, in a similar manner to that used in the case of Board Schools; and it was further resolved that notice of this resolution be sent to our two Unitarian papers, and to Mr. Ion Pritchard, hon. secretary of the Sunday School Association.

Warrington.—A meeting was held in the Cairo-street Schools on Thursday week, to bid farewell to the Rev. W. H. Drummand and Mrs. Drummond on their removal to Belfast. Mr. Drummond, who is succeeding the Rev. E. I. Fripp at All Souls' Church, has been minister at Cairo-street for the past seven years. Speaking of his connection with public institutions in the town, a Warrington paper says:—"He took a prominent part in the formation of the Warrington District Nursing Association, and about two years ago he was elected a member of the Warrington Board of Guardians for St. John's Ward. Educational matters claimed his attention, and he was a strong supporter of the University Extension Lectures, and also took an active part in connection with the Warrington Literary and Philosophical Society. He was a useful member of the Infirmary Board and also of the committee of the Warrington Savings Bank." The farewell meeting was largely attended, but Mr. and Mrs. William Long, Mr. Frederick Monks, and Mr. Woodcock, treasurer of the congregation, were unfortunately unable to be present. The chair was taken by Mr. J. R. Young, who spoke in terms of warm appreciation of Mr. Drummond's services, not only in the pulpit, but in every branch of their work. Never during the past twenty years had their chapel stood higher in general esteem than at present. They felt the parting from Mr. and Mrs. Drummond very keenly. They asked Mr. Drummond's acceptance of an oak writing desk which was being made to his own design. Mr. Muir then presented to Mr. Drummond a framed photograph of the members of the choir, and other photographs are to follow. Mr. T. Birchall next presented to Mrs. Drummond a beautifully executed bronze statuette of Mercury, with expressions of gratitude and deep personal regard. Mrs. Drummond having acknowledged the gift, Mr. Drummond followed, and thanked his friends not only for all that had been said that night, and for their farewell gifts, but for many things that had been said to him during the past weeks. The desk would be a constant source of delight to him, and as he wrote his sermons on it, it would be linked with memories of Cairo-street Chapel. If in the future he was able to do any good thing and to preach the Gospel with any power, it would be due not to himself alone, but to the influence of things they had experienced together at Cairo-street. He then spoke of the reasons which had decided him to accept the call to All Souls' Church, the great opportunity of service which offered there, the strong ties of ancestry and Irish sympathies which drew him to Belfast, and seemed to mark him as specially fitted for the post. During the past weeks he had felt as never before the depth and sincerity of the attachment which bound him to friends at Warrington, but while the parting was painful, he could not feel that in going he would lose his friends. Having referred to his work in the town, and the pleasure of association with members of other churches, Mr. Drummond spoke of the growth of their congregation and the prosperous future that awaited them, and concluded with renewed expressions of thanks. On Sunday Mr. Drummond preached his farewell sermons at Cairo-street.

Whitby.—The last of the open-air services conducted by the Rev. F. Haydn Williams was held on Sunday last. The average attendance has been not less than 200. Mr. Williams has illustrated his teaching by local affairs. He is threatened with prosecution by the Harbour Trustees for speaking on a piece of ground they claim, but which Mr. Williams holds to be public property.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

The object of this Society is a Law for the Total Abolition of Vivisection or putting animals to death by torture under any "Scientific" pretext whatever. To call on the Legislature for less would be to admit the principle (and thereby perpetuate the enormity) that man is justified in selfishly inflicting agony on the innocent.

Opponents of the Slave Trade agitated not for restriction but abolition. The wrongs perpetrated by man on animals are even more dire than those inflicted by him on his own species. The Abolition of Slavery was an act of high Christian philanthropy. It is no less noble or less Christian to stop the sufferings of other helpless creatures of our God.

The above Society appeals to the Public for aid.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Indian Famine Brahmo Somaj Fund.—Mr. A. M. Bose writes from Calcutta under date of Aug. 30:—"I have thankfully to acknowledge the receipt of Rs. 3,757 5 as. 5 pies., the equivalent of £250, which reached me last week. This bring up the total received up to date to £2,150 (Rs. 32,160 6 as. and 9 pies), besides a sum of Rs. 200. Our two main centres of work are now at Ahmedabad and Ajmere, where most useful help is being rendered by the devoted band of Brahmo workers. Not the least appreciated portion of that help will be the amount of Rs. 5,000 (about £335) which has been sent last week at the special request of the chief Government official or Deputy Commissioner, for the purchase of clothes to be distributed amongst the miserable and suffering people about Ajmere. Men, women, and children in large numbers are literally in rags, and there is the severe winter approaching which these starvelings and wrecks of humanity have to face with what little—alas how little of stamina that is left in them. You will be glad to learn that some money has been, and is being, raised by the Brahmo Somaj, to supplement the generous help of our English friends. How much more could be done if we had more money!" Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations:—Amount already acknowledged, £2,270 2s. 7d.; F. N., £20; N. A., 10s.; H. Woolcott Thompson (additional), £100; the Rev. J. Brinkworth, 10s. 6d.; A Friend, Liverpool, £3; Total, £2,394 3s. 1d. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar is at present in Scotland. He preached last Sunday at Edinburgh, and is to preach to-morrow at Dundee. We understand that on the following Sunday Mr. Mozoomdar may be at Aberdeen, and on the first Sunday of October at Glasgow. It will be seen from the announcement of the reopening services at Little Portland-street Chapel that he is to preach there on the morning of October 14. On the previous Sunday morning the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed is once more to occupy his old pulpit.

Application for tickets for the course of six lectures on "The Bible and the Nineteenth Century," to be given by Professor Carpenter at Essex Hall, beginning on Tuesday evening, October 16, may be made personally at Essex Hall; otherwise, a stamped and addressed envelope should be sent, when tickets and the syllabus of the course will be forwarded. We are glad to hear that the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association hope to arrange for the further delivery of the lectures in the New Year, at Leeds, Liverpool, and Bolton.

The Unitarian "Year Book," recently published by the American Association, contains a much fuller record of the churches than former issues. There are 459 churches in all: 265 in New England, 107 in the Central and Western States, 43 in the Middle States, 25 in the Pacific Coast States, 13 in the Southern States, and 6 in Canada. It appears that 42 churches were established during the seventeenth century, 73 during the eighteenth (before their Unitarian days), 80 during the first half, and 264 during the last half of the nineteenth century. Three hundred and fifty of the churches report the number of families supporting them, giving a total of 32,000 families; to this number the editor adds 3,000 as representing the scattered unreported churches, making a probable grand total of 35,000 Unitarian families. There are 31 churches, it appears, which have 200 or upwards subscribing families; 94 which have between 100 and 200; and 225 report less than 100. If each family may be reckoned as husband, wife, and three children, then there are 175,000 avowed Unitarians in America connected with the churches.

There are, we believe, at the present time twenty-seven vacant pulpits in our group of churches; some of them are very small places, but others are important centres of usefulness. It would also appear that there are sixteen Unitarian ministers seeking appointments; and if all these men were called to take charge of congregations there would still be eleven churches unprovided with ministers. A very different condition of affairs seems to exist in America; for, according to the "Year Book," there are 550 ministers, while there are only 459 churches. Of course several ministers in America, as in England, are employed in other ways, or have retired owing to old age.

The first number of the new Monthly Review, published this week by Mr. Murray, with Mr. Henry Newbolt as editor, is of substantial proportions in a distinguished cover, and will be most welcome to lovers of large type. The number is of very varied interest. It opens with three editorial articles, unsigned, the first on "The Paradox of Imperialism," which declares that Liberalism "has set its seal on the Empire, and the mark is indelible; it has established, and must uphold a democratic autonomous commonwealth." There are military and naval articles, and the editor contributes an ode on "The Nile," written for the inauguration of the Gordon College at Khartoum. The concluding lines refer to Gordon:—

Nile! in thy dream remember him
Whose like no more shall rise
Above our twilight's rim
Until the immortal dawn shall make all glories dim.

For this man was not great
By gold or kingly state,
Or the bright sword, or knowledge of earth's wonder;
But more than all his race
He saw life face to face
And heard the still small voice above the thunder.
O river, while thy waters roll
By yonder white deserted tomb,
There, where so clear a soul
So shone through gathering doom,
Thou and the land shall keep the tale of lost Khartoum.

Professor H. H. Turner writes on "Recent Eclipses," and Mrs. Hugh Bell on "The Influence of the Stage." Perhaps the most valuable article is on "Art before Giotto," the first of a series of essays on Early Florentine Painting, by Mr. Roger E. Fry. It is illustrated by a number of interesting illustrations of old mosaics, pictures, and sculptures.

The Monthly Review contains also an article on "Details of My Daily Life," by the Amir of Afghanistan, which is a chapter from the Amir's Autobiography, to be shortly published by Mr. Murray. The Amir, whose naïve account of his daily life was taken down from his dictation and translated into English, appears as a very unpretentious, earnest man, devoted to the welfare of his country. Hard work has become with him a second nature, and he takes very little rest. "It is no trouble to me to work hard; on the contrary, I love it, and I never feel tired, because I am so fond of work and labour. There is no doubt that every person has some sort of ambition, and this is my ambition; all the hard work I do is to complete the administrative work of my kingdom."

HERDMILLED

This love for work is inspired by God; it is the true ideal and desire of my life to look after the flock of human beings whom God has entrusted to me, His humble slave. Allah says through His Prophet: "When the Almighty desires to do a thing He makes all necessary preparations for it." (Koran.) As God wished to relieve Afghanistan from foreign aggression and internal disturbances, He honoured this, His humble servant, by placing him in this responsible position, and He caused him to become absorbed in thoughts of the welfare of the nation, and inspired him to be devoted to the progress of this people, and to be ready to sacrifice life itself for their welfare and for the true faith of the Holy Prophet Mahomed —may God bless him!

THE Amir has been roused to these untiring exertions by witnessing the progress of other nations and desiring it for his own. "I dream," he says, "of nothing but the backward condition of my country, and how to defend it, seeing that this poor goat, Afghanistan, is a victim at which a lion from one side and a terrible bear from the other side are staring, and ready to swallow at the first opportunity afforded them." But we think better of the lion than that.

My doctors and hakims tell me that this never-ceasing activity is the cause of all my illnesses, that I work too hard, and do not take my meals regularly at fixed times. My answer is: "Love and logic have never agreed together." As I am a lover of the welfare of my nation, I do not feel my own pains, but the pains and the sufferings and weakness of my people, which I cannot bear for them, and those who have never been in love do not know how sore are the sufferings of lovers. . . . In my pursuit after the welfare of Afghanistan, the more that I see signs of change and progress, the faster I follow them, as a lover follows the tracks of the footmarks of his ideal, which make him more eager to keep in the road. I pray God to help me in carrying out this duty for which He has selected me from among other men.

Often tired and discouraged by the perverseness of his people the Amir longs to give up the struggle and seek a peaceful life elsewhere. "But this would be a cowardly action and a refusal to fulfil the duties ordained by the real Almighty Master and Sovereign, for which He has created me."

SPURGEON'S famous Tabernacle, which was destroyed by fire in April, 1898, has been rebuilt, at a cost of £45,000, with sitting accommodation for 2,703, and was re-opened, free from debt, on Wednesday. Services were held throughout the day. Spurgeon's son Thomas, who is the present pastor, his brother Charles, Mr. Ira D. Sankey, the Rev. John Thomas (of Liverpool), and Dr. Monro Gibson were among those who took part in the day's proceedings. Mr. Sankey, at the morning service, said that the last time he was there was to "sing a song over the dead body of the greatest preacher of the nineteenth century. He felt sad as he thought of the two mighty men who had passed away—C. H. Spurgeon and D. L. Moody." He then proceeded to sing "The Better Land." The fact was emphasised by more than one speaker that the new building was raised on the old foundation, and their testimony would be the same. The portico of the building was also the same, said Thomas Spurgeon, and there would be no change of front.

AT a recent meeting of the Committee of the Liberation Society it was resolved, in view of the retirement of Mr. Carvell Williams, M.P., from Parliament, as follows:—

The Committee has heard with regret that its Chairman, Mr. J. Carvell Williams, M.P., will not offer himself as a candidate at the approaching General Election; and under these circumstances desires to place on record an expression of its gratitude for, and appreciation of, his services to the cause of religious equality in Parliament. Mr. Williams has fought four contested elections, in three instances successfully, having been elected a member of the House of Commons in 1885, 1892, and 1895. During such membership he succeeded in passing the Marriage (Hours) Act 1886, and was a leading member of the Select Committee on the Burial Laws which sat in 1897-98, on whose recommendations the Burial Grounds Act, 1900, was based. Further, he has strenuously opposed the reactionary measures of the present Government, framed in the interests of sectarian education, and of the Established Church clergy; and at every available opportunity has made valuable contributions to the debates on these and other matters affecting the relations of religion to the State. The record thus briefly suggested is one upon which Mr. Williams, his constituents, and the society are to be heartily congratulated, and is illustrative of his zeal, devotion, and earnestness in the great cause he has at heart. The Committee rejoices in the large measure of health and strength vouchsafed to their friend and colleague and in the prospect of a continuance of his efforts on behalf of the society.

So far as questions of religious equality are concerned, there was not much done in the way of new legislation during the last session of Parliament; but it is satisfactory to note that a few changes in the direction of greater freedom have been legalised. The Burial Grounds Act, which comes into operation on Jan. 1, 1901, renders the forty-eighth hours' notice required by the Act of 1880 no longer necessary in the case of the consecrated parts of parochial cemeteries. The new Act makes it permissive for Burial Boards to apply to have a part of a cemetery consecrated. There will be no longer any necessity for the erection of two chapels, one for Anglicans, the other for Dissenters; a chapel may be erected, but it "shall not be consecrated, or reserved for the exclusive use of any denomination." It is further enacted that the payment of fees to incumbents will no longer be required except for services actually rendered. If a dissenting minister performs the ceremony he will receive the fee. The provisions apply to cemeteries opened after the passing of the Act. In the case of existing cemeteries, the old fees will be exacted for fifteen years, or on the vacating of the incumbency, whichever is the longer period. It should be observed that the Act does not deal with churchyards, only with parochial cemeteries.

THE good we never miss we rarely prize.—W. Cowper.

EVERY day is sacred; that we may learn to bear it in mind, we set apart the first, and begin each week with the reminder.—Charles Hargrove.

BERNARD COTTAGE, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

SIR,—May I beg the courtesy of a little space in your columns to give a few particulars respecting the above, which I believe will be of interest to many of your readers, and especially to those by whose thoughtful liberality we are enabled to carry on this useful work.

The Home was opened on Aug. 5, 1899, too late for its advantages, or even its existence to be made very widely known, before the holiday season of that year came to a close. Nevertheless, we received up to the end of 1899 a total of thirty-three visitors, the majority staying for a week each. To be exact the combined visits would be equivalent to 38½ week-guests. During 1900 to the date of writing we have welcomed a further seventy guests coming from all parts of London and its surroundings. Some of these have made visits extending over two or three weeks, and even longer, the total of week-guests in this period amounting to ninety-eight. From the beginning of July to the present it has taxed not only the resources of the Cottage, but also the accommodating spirit of the matron to find room for the numerous applicants, and I regret, in a few instances, having been compelled to refuse admission to some who had not given me sufficient notice of their intention to visit the Home.

Not only those seeking a holiday, but many needing rest and change after periods of sickness, have come to Bernard Cottage, and I am privileged to add, that without exception, all have been benefited by their stay. The matron, Mrs. Gilbert, by her kindness and attention, has deservedly earned the thanks of all who have come under her charge.

In conclusion, I should like to point out that the Home is open all the winter through, and that Southend has many climate virtues that make a visit to it health-giving and enjoyable even in the winter months. It is the sincere wish of the Committee that the fullest advantage should be taken of the Home, and I shall be pleased to give any information to any who contemplate a visit.

THE Special Services Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have arranged for the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., to preach on the following dates at the places named:—Oct. 14, Rochdale (M.), Oldham (E.); Oct. 28, Southampton; Nov. 4, Oxford (Manchester College Chapel); Nov. 18, Platt Chapel, Manchester; Dec. 2, Burnley (M.), Padiham (E.); Dec. 16, Bradford. On the evening of Oct. 21, Mr. Stopford Brooke speaks at Mansfield House, Canning Town, for the Warden, Mr. Percy Alden.

THE attention of teachers and others, who are interested in Sunday-school libraries, is called to the advertisement in another column, in which the gift of a large number of books is offered to immediate applicants by the Misses M. E. and G. Martineau. Some are children's books, but it will be seen that a good number of them are for the use of teachers only.

LITERATURE.

SOME BOOKS OF VERSE.*

THE six books which we have gathered together for the present notice have all been published in the course of the last two years, and each one of them will have a special interest for some of our readers. We have had pleasure from time to time in publishing in these columns verses and other contributions from several of the writers.

Mr. Robert Wilson's volume is dedicated to Dr. Martineau, in memory of a friendship "which has been the consecration of my life and of its poetic aspirations." A good part of the volume consists of sonnets, in which it seems to us that Mr. Wilson is more successful than in the Lyrics which follow. But that is a matter of taste. The first four sonnets are addressed to Dr. Martineau (the book was published shortly before his death), and these, together with three "In Memoriam W. M. A." and two "In Memoriam M. T." are charged with deep personal feeling. We could wish that the aspiration addressed to the author of "Wordsworth's Grave" might yet find some further adequate fulfilment:—

Let thrilling raptures from the strings be wrung,
And, Horace of our grand old Saxon tongue,
Be thoughts starred out from many a nebulous phrase!

The following is a good example of Mr. Wilson's skill in the use of the sonnet:—

There is a joy of sacred sorrow born
That flees the haunts where hollow laughter rings;
But on the lark's—nay, on the eagle's wings,
She mounts aloft, albeit with pinions torn,
And though her garland be a crown of thorn.
A low sweet song unto herself she sings:
Too meek for rapture, she hath secret springs
Of solemn solace that the world would scorn.
Her home, the calm abodes of speechless Thought,
Her paradise the bosom of her God:
What loves she best on earth?—the peaceful cot,
The field where honest Toil upturns the sod:
And, when by choicest spirits she is sought,
She leads the way that One before her trod.

Miss Pattinson's "Far-Ben" is, as the title goes on to say, "Poems in Many Moods," and the collection is dedicated to Professor A. C. Bradley, of Glasgow, and formerly of University College, Liverpool. Southerners will, perhaps, wonder what "Far-Ben" means; but Miss Pattinson tells us in the opening poem.

Far-Ben, 'tis a secret chamber
Hid from the vulgar eye,
Where treasures of priceless value
In thick profusion lie;
And angels sit at the threshold,
And mem'ry keeps the key,
And the door is always opened
With thought of sanctity.

There are memories of childhood and school-days, and the wakening of the deeper life, and of the joys and sorrows of later years.

And there are the books too sacred
For common light of day,
And the golden thoughts long gathered
Which forced the soul to pray;
And there the hopes of the future
Beyond our farthest ken,
When God shall take in His keeping
The things which lie Far-Ben.

Of the writer's many moods there is one which delights in the old Arthurian legends, and has produced the two longest poems in the book, "Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight" and "The Lady of the Fountain," and another has produced seven songs "from Macpherson's Ossian," but we confess to have found more pleasure in some of Miss Pattinson's simpler verses. Most beautiful of all, both in its form and its depth of feeling, are the verses on "A Birthday."

Your birthday, and I sit and ponder here
Beneath the summer sky;
I gaze above at the broad arch of blue,
And try with aching eyes to pierce it through,
That I might see you for a moment, Dear,
Within your home on high.

Long years ago, they came to me one night
And told me you were dead.
They took you from the waters cold and deep,
The waters that had lulled you into sleep,
They laid you with your young face pale and white
Upon your quiet bed.

I saw you lie, the lips that I had kissed,
So blue, and cold, and chill;
Your eyes were closed, and there across your breast
The busy loving hands were crossed, at rest;
But more than all your loving smile I missed,
And life was dark and still.

. . . . .

I cannot come to you, perhaps, for years;
But, Love, from time to time,
I feel you near me in my lonely sleep,
I feel the shadows of your love so deep,
I seem to draw you by my very tears
From your far distant clime.

Your birthday, Dear! do you remember it,
As I do here below?
And do you look from out the sunny skies,
And smile with deeper love in your pure eyes,
To see how here alone on earth I sit
And wait, yet long to go?

. . . . .

Your birthday, Dear! you keep it up above;
I keep it here to-day;
And yet united in the solemn hush
Of silence, do our souls together rush,
And mingle in a never-dying love,
Which knoweth no decay.

Mr. Mott's "Benscliff Ballads" is "a book for summer holidays," but it is perhaps even pleasanter to read for reminiscence afterwards. The Preface tells of its origin.

We were ten
Middle-aged men,
Slaves of the ledger, the desk, and the pen.

Of the most divers creeds and parties, they were baptised into "the Faith of Friendship," and met at intervals for high talk, and at rarer intervals for "a Midsummer Day's Dream together among the hills and woods of Charnwood Forest." Benscliff was their favourite rendezvous, and Mr. Mott clearly was their poet. The ballads are delightful in their unrestrained holiday humour, and will give special pleasure to those who are familiar with the neighbourhood of Leicester and Loughborough. They are full also of genuine love of Nature and perception of the beautiful. The more serious tone is not lacking.

Mirth for the sunshine, laughter for the morning,
But the pure stars bring silence, lovelier still;
Folly stands awestruck, and a voiceless warning
Commands the vagrant will.

So let us part, old friends, this night and ever,
Not sad but earnest, looking towards the day
When every noble deed and brave endeavour
Shall have its wreath of bay.

After the ballads come a number of miscellaneous poems, which are followed by some touching memorial and anniversary verses, as e.g. the following lines in memory of Mrs. Joseph Whetstone, widow aet. 76:—

A tender woman's heart, faithful and fond,
Left, like a desolate and lonely wreck,
Upon life's outmost shore!
The Rescue Ship,
Death's life-boat, manned with messengers of hope,
Flies to the signal of distress; the wreck
Is lifted, floated, all her broken cords
And torn white sails made beautiful once more!
And soft winds lead her forth caressingly
From that dark strand into a summer sea.

The Memorials close with some fine verses on the death of Gladstone. From the Anniversaries we must make one final quotation:—

Life like a gathering river runs
Between the banks of Time,
A tiny moss-bed at its source,
In front, God's heaven sublime.

The morning dew upon the moss
Delights our infant eyes,
Till the great thoughts with gathering years
Rush forward to the skies.

For us, dear love, the mossy fount
Fades in the distant blue,
But all God's palaces of light
Are bursting into view.

"The Living Past" seems to have little inspiration for Mr. T. S. Jevons. There are one or two lighter verses in his little book, in which one can find some pleasure, but for the most part his meditative poems, if not without distinction, are palsied by disappointment and a heart that cannot hope. We may have altogether mistaken their tenour, but the impression we have received is such that no healthy singing ought to give.

Mrs. Martha Perry Lowe, widow of the late Mr. Charles Lowe, and a native of Keene, N.H., has gathered into her volume "The Immortals," significantly robed in white, a collection of twenty-nine memorial poems, the subjects of which will all be well known in New England, while others, such as Channing, Lowell, and Whittier are as familiar to us in the old country. Two or three of the poems are of a somewhat different character, as the first on "The Walk toward Emmaus" and that on "Scheffer's Dante and Beatrice." Mrs. Lowe sings also of Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Browning, Shelley, and Schubert. The following are from the verses in memory of Lucy Larcom:—

"Garden Songs and other Lyrics for Music." By Edward Teschemacher. Goldsmith Press, Limited. 3s.

Farewell, benignant spirit, wise and good,
Beloved singer for all womanhood!
A softened brightness from the day
With thee has passed away.

Many have loved thee, since thy earnest eye
At early morn of girlhood looked on high,
Seeking to consecrate thy youth
To beauty and to truth.

Mr. Teschemacher's "Garden Songs" overtake our tardy notice with a second edition, which is dedicated to Madame Melba. These lyrics are all intended to be set to music, and, as a matter of fact, the greater number of them have already been so used. Early in the summer Madame Melba was announced to sing one of them, "An April Birthday," in a song of Mr. Landon Ronald's. The words of songs are not always such good poetry as to be worth collecting in a dainty volume, but Mr. Teschemacher's verses are full of music in themselves, and are very pleasant reading. There may, perhaps, be a danger of too great facility, and yet many of the the songs are very charming, and some of them are not without touches of deeper feeling. Of the lighter songs the following is a good example :—

Violets, sweet violets,
Linger in the glade,
When the primrose blooms no more,
And the cowslips fade;
When the sun on May-time sets,
Linger still, sweet violets!

Violets, sweet violets,
Tender smiles of Spring,
When you raise your tiny heads
Birds begin to sing;
All our tears and vain regrets
Fly before you, violets!

Violets, sweet violets,
In the Summer fair,
When the stately lilies bloom,
Roses everywhere,
Though the world so soon forgets,
I shall love you, violets.

To Mr. Teschemacher's reverent earnestness and fine perception of natural beauty our columns have not infrequently borne witness, and here we must be content with one more example of his more serious verse.

Since I have loved thee, God has strewn the flowers
In deep profusion round my wandering feet,
Filling with music all the troubled hours,
And making Life a garden, holy sweet.

Since I have loved thee, God has touched my heart,
Upraised mine eyes beyond each shadow dim,
Revealed a way that doth in darkness start,
And surely leads through perfect love to Him.

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.—III.

It is eighty years since Washington Irving wrote "with deep regret of the literary animosity daily growing up between England and America." In the meanwhile much has been written and spoken of which the effect can only be to nurse ill-will between the two great English-speaking communities, and teach us on our side to regard Americans with feelings akin to contempt. Just now, we having supported America in her attack on Spain, and having received of her in return no opposition in our war against the South African Republics, there is more active good will between the two nations than has, perhaps, ever been before: to maintain this unwritten alliance and bring us ever nearer together as men who speak the same tongue, own the same traditions, have a like regard for the Christian religion under its many varying forms—this is, it seems to me, the greatest service anyone can render to humanity. And the speaker or writer who in levity of heart, or of worse motive, utters aught tending to nurse ill-feeling between us is guilty, in my poor judgment, of a crime against the race.

Irving goes on to speak of "the peculiar lot of our country to be visited by the worst kind of English travellers," but when he so wrote there was no American Unitarian Association, and consequently no deputation of respectable Unitarians had visited the country; so neither Mr. Bowie nor Mr. and Miss Pritchard and myself need fear inclusion in that kind of travellers. But when reading on I came to the third class, who "through mistaken or ill-directed hospitality, or from the prompt disposition to cheer and countenance the stranger, prevalent among my countrymen, have been treated with unwonted respect in America," I began to have misgivings that something would ollow which an uneasy conscience would insist on "improving" to my personal humiliation. For had not I, an entire stranger—nay we, for we were man and wife, and all hospitality shown to us was necessarily double—been received everywhere rather as friends than guests, as English cousins, not mere visitors? and had there not been shown on all sides prompt disposition to cheer and countenance us, and make us feel at home? and were we not treated with respect we are not accustomed to in the old country, where conscious of being dissenters and heretics we lie low, and are content to take a back seat? Indeed, I can scarce restrain a blush when I see the prominent position I occupy in the photographic group of delegates taken outside the Association room at Boston: it wasn't my fault, I had taken a place in the crowd such as I judged myself entitled to, but American courtesy forced me to stand in front of many better men. Yes, this was evidently the class of travellers to which I belonged; and what of them? First, "they become arrogant on the common boon of civility"; next "they attribute to the lowliness of others their own elevation"—to such failings no man ever pleaded guilty; indeed to confess that you think too highly of yourself is to assert that you don't, for how can a man think that he thinks falsely? If I am prone to them since my return from America, I can only say, May God and my friends pity my folly! But to the third charge against these pampered visitors to the States that "they underrate a society where there are no artificial distinctions, and where individuals as themselves can rise to consequence," let my fellow-delegates look to themselves, I answer with entire assurance, Not guilty. No, I may overrate such a society, very likely do, for our impressions, favourable or otherwise, are apt to be the more confident the less they are due to long and varied experience: I have no temptation to disparage it.

It was my good fortune to be for nearly a fortnight the guest of President Elliot of Harvard. I might have lived long in America and in years not seen so much of "society where there are no artificial distinctions" as I did in those few days so happily and profitably spent under his roof. The Master of a College used to be a very great personage at the Universities of my youth, distinguished among dons as dukes among the ordinary nobility: undergraduates were privileged to behold him in his place of dignity in chapel on Sundays, and he took the chief part at the Communion Service once a term: there were awful possibilities of being compelled to stand before him in case of very grave misdemeanour, and if he were Vice-Chancellor we knelt to receive our degree at his hands; otherwise he was altogether beyond the range of our vision, which stopped short at tutors, proctors, and coaches. Now Harvard is a University in no way inferior to Oxford and Cambridge, except that it is young and, of course, wants the sentimental and real advantages which a venerable antiquity can alone confer. In numbers, scholarship, equipments, variety of subjects taught, it can hold its own with any University of the world. It has at present 1,850 undergraduates, and there are 420 at the Radcliffe College for women, which is affiliated with it. The examinations are, I believe, stricter than those which suffice for an ordinary degree with us. The honorary degrees are prizes which men like Dr. Martineau are proud to be thought worthy of. While as to income, well, that is American! imagine last year "gifts extraordinary in amount and variety" reaching a total value of over fifteen hundred thousand dollars; twelve million dollars of Funds; and yearly receipts of more than £300,000! Nor do I hesitate to say that the money is more economically spent than with us. Americans are liberal in giving, but they are strict in exacting a return, and there are no easy posts to be had at Harvard whether by examination or by interest. But what impressed me most in this wealthy, thriving, intelligent society was the entire absence of "artificial distinctions." I learnt, casually, that the President was esteemed one of the big men of America, one of the biggest in Boston, but I should never have found it out from what I saw in his own house or college. It was not simply that he himself was as unassuming in his deportment as a really distinguished man can afford to be, but there was absolutely no ceremonial associated with his person or office. Neither gowns nor hoods are worn at Harvard, the chapel is seated like any dissenting chapel in England, and the pulpit is the only reserved place outside the choir pew; the President, chiefest man of all the neighbourhood, and head of the whole University, takes his seat anywhere as there may be vacant place for him among the others, professors and undergraduates. And as it is in the House of God, where all distinctions of office and learning and birth are for the time completely obliterated, so that no observer could pick out worse or better among them all, or guess, except by marks of age, which were the last fresh comers and which the grave and reverend seniors—so is it throughout the precincts of this seat of learning. There are all sorts and conditions of men to be found there as elsewhere, very rich and very poor, dull and clever, successful and struggling, the distinctions between them are as in every human society, real and profound; but there are none "artificial," as Irving calls them, none of mere vanity and wantonness. I was told of students who served others at table in order to eke out their scanty resources, but if I was correctly informed, it made no difference to their position in the college: of course they were not the associates of the rich men: there would ordinarily be equal difficulty on either side in such association, but they were in no way looked down on or esteemed an inferior caste, as sizars used to be with us. There was no pretence to universal equality; one man is better than another, however much you may shout to the contrary; but the spirit of the place was that superiority was to be shown in character and achievement, and by no means displayed in dress or ceremony or deportment.

I believe Harvard is the most democratic, as it is the first and most famous and most prosperous of all the American Universities. But within the narrow limits of my observation I seemed to perceive the same spirit everywhere prevalent. I heard and read much of "The Almighty Dollar," and how a man was esteemed in the world just in proportion to the amount of his income: I suppose this is more or less true universally: after all the man who has £10,000 a year is worth more than the man who has only £1 a week. The error consists in making wealth the only or the chief test of worth.

Perhaps had my hosts been among the millionaires of Newport and not Boston Unitarians, I might have formed a different opinion as to the value set upon money in America. As far I had opportunity of observing, it seemed to me to count for neither more nor less than among us. I don't know that in England we set much esteem by a man merely because he is rich: that he is discreet and liberal in the use of wealth, it is for this we admire him. So there, it is something portentous, to be gazed at by the wise and envied by the foolish, a single person who has managed to appropriate to himself a share of the world's goods equal to the revenue of a state. But that he is really superior to the honourable man of business of small means, to his own honest servant, to scholar or statesman, or minister of religion, I don't think anyone dreams of such a thing. In America a man is taken for just what he really is; each one is worth so much his whole stock taken into account, mind, body, character, record, substance, culture, family; and at that worth is he esteemed, neither more nor less. Consequently the way is open there as it is not here: if a man have ability to rise there is no obstruction in his path: it does not tell against him that he was penniless to begin with, or that his father was a shopkeeper or a labourer, or that he is a Dissenter or a Romanist. Let him try, and he will win the place to which his equipment, mental, moral, and physical, entitle him. If such equipment is poor, if his abilities are small, or his health weakly, or his qualities indifferent, let him not complain. Why should he want to be more than he is fit for?

This seemed to me the supreme merit of American society. The well-known lines of Burns continually recurred to me

> For a' that and a' that,
> Their dignities and a' that,
> The pith of sense and pride o' worth,
> Are higher rank than a' that.

Soldier, sailor, tinker, tailor, doctor, lawyer, cook, duke, these are the accidents, the clothes in which the man is seen by the world. The true self of him, what he is capable of, by that is to be awarded place high or low among his fellows. The lesson is not novel or profound, but they practise it better in the New World than in the Old—at least so it seemed to my very superficial view.

Charles Hargrove.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LITERATURE.

Miss Marian Pritchard read a paper on this subject before the Chicago Union of Liberal Sunday-schools, last May, of which an abstract appears in Unity for August 30. Having spoken of the need of self-devotion in the work, and the part played by personal influence and example, she proceeded to say that tools were required, and that of these books were the chief:—

What books shall we use? With what literature shall we supply our scholars? On this subject I can only speak in general terms, for of course our different communities would look to different books. But here again we have a key note. Never let us use any book whose teachings do not answer to our sense of truth. We may be mistaken, the book that we put on one side may be in the abstract truer than the one to which we turn, but that is not the point; unless it is true to us we ought not to use it. And yet, if your experience on this side of the Atlantic is anything like our own across the ocean it will force you to acknowledge that many teachers think that it does not matter much what books our children have, a pretty picture or a shilling story, or even less; the fact that a book lies ready at our hand will frequently be a sufficient reason for choosing to read out of it to the scholars; the fact that its teaching abounds in doctrines and theories which we hold to be untrue counting for little. "Children don't notice that sort of thing," they say.

Now, years ago there was some excuse for this happy-go-lucky method, but to-day every community can count on several men and women ready and able to help us in the matter of literature. They bring our papers, full of pleasant, wholesome stories; they prepare with great care series of lesson notes which when rightly used will make the teachers' task comparatively easy. But teachers do not make use of their opportunities as they should. I believe this omission is mainly due to the fact that teachers misunderstand the use of books in their class work. If they cannot take the manual and use it right away without any preparation, they are apt to grumble and say that if the book cannot be used in that way, well, then it is not better than any other and is not worth getting.

Books are tools, neither more not less. What should we say to a carpenter who never tried his hand on plane, or saw, or chisel, until he had to make the woodwork of a house? We should ridicule the idea as almost too foolish for conception, and yet we often use our books in this fashion. Perhaps the worst-used volume in this respect is the Bible. That grand old collection of Hebrew and Greek classic literature is constantly handled in this haphazard fashion, and the result is very deplorable; for instead of having its many beautiful passages kindle an enthusiasm for righteousness and truth, it comes to be regarded as something very dull, very wearisome, which must be got through somehow so that teacher may get on to the story. It is not easy to teach from old-time scriptures, I admit; but a little inquiry will enable us to find help from many books written just for the work we have in hand.

The same is true of other themes; to some the voice of uplifting and inspiration comes better through the song of the birds, the scent of the flowers, the instincts of the animals, the laws that govern so wonderfully the physical world, or the life and work of some noble soul. In all these directions help is ready for us in the shape of excellent books—but their contents must be mastered, not merely glanced through before you go to your class. Again, in some subjects, notably those which we think should be taken up with our young people (such as those treating of the grounds of faith and of the higher life) we often feel that books are not enough. Just as the young carpenter has to go to a master hand to learn how to properly use his finest tools, so we want guidance in the more difficult paths of knowledge. But here again we may have help for the asking; indeed, we may not even have to ask, but may have the offer of help already before us, since our ministers are always willing to help the teachers.

Books are our tools, then—tools that we must understand and know how to handle before we can properly use them. Further, we must remember that as the workman chooses his tools not only with regard to the work he wants to do, but also keeping steadily in view the material on which the work is to be done, so the real teacher in choosing a good book for his class must consider his material, the child's mind, and pick accordingly. How often we find some of our most beautiful poems misused, by being given for children to learn who have no power of understanding them. We are apt to forget that a drop of dew will fill the lily's cup.

To recapitulate:

1. We are to choose the best bits of literature that we can, and only those whose teachings are true to us.

2. In selection of our lesson, or our book, we must not only have regard to the aim we have in view—the building up of character and presentment of a high ideal—but we must also remember the limited powers of the young people whose hearts and minds are to be trained.

3. We are to master the contents of the book or chapter, either by ourselves or with outside help, before coming to the class; and even if we get help from books or from the minister, the final lesson preparation must be our own.

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

SIR,—I have read with the greatest pleasure Mr. Hargrove's excellent account of his visit to the United States, and especially his frank avowal of the effect on his own views of the universal adoption by our churches there of the Unitarian name. I had the honour to go on a similar mission twenty years ago, preaching at the Saratoga Conference, and seeing much of our Unitarian friends from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. The effect on my own mind was exactly that which Mr. Hargrove describes. Yet I had been an advocate of the name Free Christian, of which, I believe, I was one of the inventors. When the late Mr. Forster seceded from the Independents in 1853 or 1854, I was one of his congregation, and took part in the first service he held in the carpenter's shop in Kentish Town. We had found that we were Unitarians, but we shrank from the name and called ourselves Free Christians, and the new church when it was built was called the Free Christian Church. At Nottingham, years later, the late Edwin Smith and I got together the important Conference which resulted in taking away from the Unitarian Association its representation of congregations and in the formation of Dr. Martineau's Free Christian Union. We utterly failed to make the public understand what "Free Christian" meant, and as minister in later years of the Free Church which I had had a hand in founding I constantly met with the same difficulty. People who thought it an orthodox church in which the sittings were free, charged us, sometimes, with drawing them to an unorthodox service on false pretences. So my friends and I came to the conclusion that the honest thing to do was to put the word Unitarian on the notice board that everybody might know that the services were based on the Unitarian view of Christianity. My experience had led me to this conclusion, and my visit to the United States in 1880 confirmed and strengthened me in it. Further experience in work which has brought me much into contact with journalists, politicians, and men of letters has deepened my conviction that we have a noble heritage in the Unitarian name, and that to change it for Free Christian or any other appellation is to step down from a great historic position into deserved obscurity.

VEGETARIANISM.

SIR,—May I apologise to Ruth Mills for having misread her signature? I imagined that I was answering Ruth Wills, a name well known in Leicester, and much respected. I have no doubt, from the manner of her writing, that Ruth Mills is equally respected in her own circle.

As to the argument, nothing can be made of man's dentition, because it is perfectly adapted for a mixed diet such as the leading races of mankind find most suitable. It is quite clear that the Cave men lived largely on flesh, because among their relics are constantly found the bones of animals which have been split open for the extraction of the marrow. I suppose it is true that one of the Buddha's laws is like that of Moses: "Thou shalt not kill," and it does not seem to be any more strictly obeyed. Fish and pork are argely used both in India and China.

According to Froude the working-classes of Britain, in the sixteenth century, were great flesh eaters. Meat was cheap, and shins of beef were the favourite food of the artisans. I must still maintain that we have no record of any dominant race living entirely on vegetable food.

As to the moral right or wrong of a purely physical action, I think there is no doubt that what I have stated is correct. To strike a man may be a proper thing to do in one case and an improper thing in another. The moral element does not reside in the act, but in the mental purpose.

HAPPINESS.

HUMAN nature is so constituted that it could not be normal without the contrasts as joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain. The eagle breasts the hurricane and soars upwards beyond the vision of man; and likewise men ascend into heights of holiness by breasting opposition. This fact is expressed in many a common adage in poetry and prose:—"Men make stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things"; "'Tis sorrow builds the shining ladder up, Whose golden rounds are our calamities"; "When he hath tried me I shall come forth as gold"; "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," and so on. It is only thoughtless men who think a good life can be full of unmixed experiences. We cannot be heroes unless we strive and conquer. Heroism implies obstacles, opposition. Still we know that, generally speaking, our human life may be happy or unhappy; although we recognise that there is no life so full of sunshine, but that clouds cast their shadows now and again; and no life so full of wretchedness, but that brightness bursts in upon it occasionally. Some thinkers have told us that happiness is to be found by working for others, by being unselfish, by regarding the world as our home and all men and women as our brothers and sisters; while one tells us—

> If solid happiness we prize,
> Within ourselves the jewel lies,
> And they are fools who roam;
> The world has nothing to bestow;
> From our own selves our joys must flow,
> And that dear hut our home.

Samuel Johnson wrote a story called "Rasselas," which helps wonderfully towards the solution of this problem. He wrote it under the stress of bereavement, for his fond old mother had died, and he wanted to earn the money needful for burying her decently and paying her few debts. It is a wise and healthy book, and distinctly religious in its drift. It teaches that the man who expects too much will never find happiness. It is no use thinking you would obtain it were you someone else. Johnson sends his Prince into all sorts of conditions of life, and he concludes that he would not like to exchange places with anyone else in the world.

He who is born on earth and yet desires to attain to heaven, surely knows that the climb will mean difficulty and fatigue and sometimes disappointment. It is not wise to sit down and waste life in complaining that things are made as they are. We may depend upon it that behind Nature there is an intelligence and wisdom superior to our own; we should, therefore, not argue how we could have made a better world ourselves; but rather find out the laws of things to greater perfection, and bring ourselves more and more into line with the methods of God's own procedure. "He does nothing who endeavours to do more than is allowed to humanity. Of the blessings set before you make your choice, and be content. No man can taste the fruits of autumn while he is delighting his scent with the flowers of spring; no man can at the same time fill his cup from the source and from the mouth of the Nile." Realise what are inherent impossibilities, and then you will not cry because you cannot grasp the moon.

As one who believes in the existence of God, I see nothing in this problem which should overwhelmingly oppress a man. I know enough of life to know that you cannot infallibly judge by appearances. I do not believe there is any man who is not intimately acquainted with disappointment and unhappiness. With Rasselas, I should not like life to be too calm and unruffled, because it would mean stagnation. If a man told me he had absolute, unalloyed happiness, a cup without dregs, I should probably not believe him; but if I did, I should not envy him, because I am sure that such a state of mind means indifference to the world's needs, mere selfish contentment, lack of true, manly, brotherly sympathy. Just as I am exhilarated by the joy of my friends, so am I depressed by their sorrow. It is in the order of things that we do not live for ever. I do not complain that God ordained death; indeed, I can see that if men did live for ever, the earth would have been more than crowded long years ago, and I should never have been born; but I am glad I am living, and thank God for the fact; although I find thorns amongst the roses, and tangled difficulties in the path. Then every time a death occurs there are those who are stricken with great sorrow; and, in addition, probably overwhelmed with anxiety and difficulty. These things are inevitable; but there is blessedness in the human sympathy called forth; there is a true human strength in the heroic effort to overcome obstacle, and to rise superior, morally and spiritually, to these dark problems of human destiny. To be happy through all these experiences would mean being devoid of feeling, or being feeble of intellect, or both. I do not desire the happiness of imbecility; I prefer the chequered thoughts and experiences of a healthy mental life, of a mind that is not and never will be content with things as they are; because it believes that God has in store for us infinitely higher developments of thought and feeling. We are bound to take these things into consideration when we attempt to solve this question of happiness.

And, finally, I must emphasise the clear distinction between pleasure and happiness. Pleasure appertains to the senses; happiness is a state of mind. A man can indulge in pleasure, and yet be unhappy; but a man can be happy with very little pleasure. Bear in mind that happiness denotes a certain condition of mind. A man can go through pestilence, famine, torture, and martyrdom, and yet be happy. He has an object he wishes to attain, an ambition to serve, a duty to discharge, a dream to realise; and though discomforts and dire pains and penalties threaten him, he bounds forward joyfully to meet them. Now, we are pilgrims on this earth. We start down very low in the scale of intelligence, with very animal predilections and instincts; our aim is to reach our goal at last; to recede from the brute and approach the angel; to attain to true and honourable manhood; to become possessed of those spiritual graces which are divine and godlike; and the man who pursues this road of life, though it be at the expense of physical comfort and sense indulgence, is infinitely happier than the man who ignores the spiritual side of life, and thinks only about increasing his purely bodily pleasures, and caring little about the condition of the rest of the world, so long as his own cravings are satisfied. Said Rasselas: "It is our business to consider what beings like us may perform, each labouring for his own happiness, by promoting within his own circle, however narrow, the happiness of others."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I read lately a story of the time of the Roman Emperor Nero, very shortly after the time when Jesus had been put to death in Palestine, and whilst Peter the Apostle was still living, as quite an old man, and Paul also. It is not a story for children, but some things in it I can tell you which will interest you.

Nero was a horribly wicked and cruel man. He encouraged all sorts of evil and vice, in the name of "pleasure," which to him was the one great aim of life. He was very vain, and liked above all things to be praised and flattered. He wrote poetry, and sang his own songs, and then people praised him and called him "divine," and said that even Apollo could not sing as he did. Of course he could not really believe such flatteries, and he despised the men who gave them; still they pleased his ears, and he could not help seeking them and half believing them. But he was hated and despised and dreaded; for he was even more cruel than he was vain, and on the slightest offence he would have a man killed, or else most cruelly tortured, without thinking again about him. No one was secure of his own life, or that of his friends; for any moment they might find that they had done something to displease Nero, and then it was all over with them. We, in these days, living safely in a peaceful land with a good Queen and good laws and good governors, can hardly picture to ourselves what life in those times must have been like.

When Nero wanted to do something which he knew the people would not like, he got up shows and games to amuse them and so gain their favour. These "games" were held in a great amphitheatre in the open air; prisoners who had been captured in war, or others who had been tried and condemned to death, were made to go and fight in the arena, with men or with wild beasts, for the amusement of the Emperor and people, who sat round in thousands to watch; and when one man was killed his body was just carried off out of sight, the sand smoothed over, and another sent to fight.

Now there were a great many Christians in Rome, and the Apostles Peter and Paul are supposed to have been there, teaching and encouraging the Christians. But Nero hated the Christians; he had not really the least idea of what they believed, and there were strange rumours about them and the strange God that they worshipped instead of the many gods of Rome. Nero persecuted the Christians, and punished them, sending men to hunt them up and bring them in, to be flung into prison, tortured, or put to death. So they were obliged to hide themselves away wherever they could, to escape being captured; sometimes in caves or quarries. When they were taken prisoners, false charges were got up against them for things that they had not done; and people were never wanting to witness against them and so please Nero.

At last a terrible fire broke out in Rome, and it began in several different parts of the city at once, showing that it had been set alight on purpose. It is more than probable that it was done by Nero's orders, for some purpose of his own; and then he gave out that it was done by the Christians—peaceable people who only wanted to be let alone, and allowed to have their own worship in peace. But Nero gave orders to have all the Christians hunted out and put in prison; and then he gave orders to have preparations made for the greatest show of games that there had ever been in Rome. Wild beasts were caught, and brought in, and shut up till the games came on. The amphitheatre had been burned, but an immense wooden building was prepared and gaily decorated, and then the people streamed in to see the show. Then the order was given to bring in some of the Christians into the arena, and let loose the raging wild beasts upon them; and this was to be a grand amusement for the people! All this was done; and in the sight of thousands of spectators, sitting coolly by, hundreds of faithful Christians met their terrible death, sometimes praying or singing hymns, always with sublime courage and cheerfulness. It is almost too terrible to think of; but we ought to know a little of what people have endured for their faith.

Children, we flinch and yield at a little persecution from our schoolfellows and companions. What are those persecutions to these? And are we Christians? These martyrs were, and were able to "endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ"; but we must surely be Christians of a different sort!

And still Christianity spread, in spite of all that Nero did to stop it. But he was determined to stamp it out; so he devised one more persecution. He lighted up his gardens at night with bonfires, and in these fires he burned the Christians; and he looked upon the scene with pleasure.

There is a legend about St. Peter which tells that his friends and disciples who still lived begged and prayed him after his to fly from Rome, as he was sure to be killed if he stayed, and so would Paul, and then there would be no one left to guide and teach them. Again and again he refused and said he would stay; but at last he yielded, and set off to flee from Rome and the persecutions. The story says that as he went he saw Jesus coming along the road towards Rome, and so meeting him; he was astonished, and when Jesus came near Peter asked "Quo vadis, Domine?" ("Whither goest thou, Lord?") And Jesus answered, "I go to Rome to be crucified over again." And Peter turned back, and would no more yield to persuasions, but met his death in Rome with his fellow-Christians.

It seems almost a pity to say anything more about the beautiful legend. But I wonder what you, children, will think about it? Did it mean (do you think?) that some one was needed to stand fast and help the Christians to bear their fate nobly, in a way worthy of their Master who had been crucified, and that if Peter was not willing to stay with them Jesus would go, even to be crucified over again? Or did it mean that Peter had missed the meaning of Jesus having suffered a sad, terrible death, and that it must come over again, to make him know what complete self-sacrifice and self-surrender meant? Might it not also mean that if one sacrifice is not sufficient, we must be ready to make another? But anyhow, we should all of us have felt, surely, as Peter did in the story, that he must go back to Rome, at all costs, and be ready there to lay down his life, as his Master was, even to be "crucified over again."

Those are words to bear in mind all through our lives; for trials will come which we would willingly flee from; and they may come not once, but over again; and we must live in such a spirit of willing self-sacrifice that we are ready, if need be, and if thereby we can help anyone else, to go forth to "be crucified over again."

SUMMER'S OVER-SOUL.

O earth! thou hast not any wind which blows
That is not music. Every weed of thine,
Pressed rightly, flows in aromatic wine;
And every humble hedgerow flower that grows,
And every little brown bird that doth sing,
Hath something greater than itself, and bears
A loving word to every living thing,
Albeit it holds the message unawares.
All shapes and sounds have something which is not
Of them. A spirit broods amid the grass;
Vague outlines of the everlasting thought
Lie in the melting shadows as they pass;
The touch of an Eternal Presence thrills
The breezes of the sunset and the hills.
Sometimes—we know not how nor why nor whence—
The twitter of the swallows 'neath the eaves
Will strike up through the thick roofs of our sense,
And show us things which seers and sages saw.
In the gray earth's green dawn something doth stir,
Like organ hymns within us, and doth awe.

AN APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE.

FOR the next three or four weeks the one subject which above all others must engross public attention in this country will be the General Election and its results, as they are likely to affect the progress of national development during the first years of the new century, and the policy of Great Britain in the settlement of South Africa, in the government of India, and in other momentous international affairs. It is much to be regretted that in making an appeal to the country the Government should have chosen a time when the elections have to be held on an old register, whereby many thousands of citizens, who ought to have a voice in the decision, are for the time being disfranchised; that is an injustice which must be keenly felt, but a discussion of it and its significance in the present position of affairs would seem to be too much a matter of party strife to concern us here. What we wish to emphasise is the seriousness of the issue which must occupy the thoughts of every true citizen of whatever party and whether, for the purpose of this election, enfranchised or not.

Great questions of social reform have long been waiting for effectual treatment, and it is a strange form of patriotism indeed that can allow these to be forgotten or neglected amid the more exciting interests of military operations. The greatness of an empire must depend upon the soundness, vigour and happiness of the life of the people at home as well as in distant lands, and while the war and its results will doubtless be the chief topic of discussion on political platforms during the coming weeks, it is greatly to be hoped that these other matters of vital popular concern may be pressed well home, and that men will be sent to the new Parliament determined to work strenuously for the accomplishment of much-needed reforms.

A proper control of the drink traffic ought not to be a question of party politics, and as a matter of fact there are large numbers of men on both sides pledged to thorough-going temperance reform. May their ranks be so far recruited as to command the attention and respect which the Archbishop of CANTERBURY in the House of Lords last session failed to secure at the hands of the PRIME MINISTER! No less urgent surely is the question of the housing of the poor in our great cities, the failure to deal effectually with which is one of the dark blots on our vaunted civilisation. And to these should be added questions of higher education, of industrial peace and progress, of some better provision for the aged poor, and others that must make for the greater health and vigour and moral elevation of the people. A General Election may be an occasion merely for the embittering of party feeling, unscrupulous perversions of truth and the lowering of the tone of public life; on the other hand, it affords a great opportunity for lifting vital questions into prominence, and demanding for them a rightful consideration. When we are told that politics are to be kept apart from religion, our reply is that we will not so degrade the ideal of citizenship, as to listen to such a plea, but will rather use every effort to bring a worthier tone into the discussion of all public questions. And certainly these questions of social reform must not be suffered to become matters merely of election promises. They are the most vital questions of our religion to-day; and when they are felt to be such throughout the country, and dealt with as such in the constituencies, Parliament will speedily find a way to do its part.

Of questions affecting other countries, with which this nation must be closely concerned, there are two which rank first in the vastness of their scope and the weight of responsibility they lay upon our people. The question of India unhappily receives far too little of the serious attention due to the claims of that great country with its teeming millions. We are too ready to take it for granted that everything is well with our paternal government, and that periodical famines are inevitable; but from time to time earnest voices are heard, which should at least urge us to seek for more knowledge, and remind us that in electing representatives to our own Parliament we are choosing men who will be bound by every consideration of honour, no less than of interest, to take an active part in caring for the welfare of that distant country.

On the question of South Africa we shall only add a few words. We have not concealed the bitter sorrow and repugnance with which from the first we have been obliged to look upon the war, and we have remained painfully convinced that the larger share of guilt for it rests with this country and not with the Transvaal. But the final judgment on that point cannot yet be given, nor will the coming election decide it; history alone can make it clear, if indeed it must not be left to a yet higher tribunal. But with whatever difference of feeling we look back upon the causes and the progress of the war, and however ardently we may wish that wiser counsels had prevailed, and the country's destiny might have been worked out in peace, after what has taken place we must accept, as it appears to us, the humiliation of the forcible annexation of the Free State and the Transvaal, and the burden of responsibility for the future good government of the united states of South Africa. There will, doubtless, be much patriotic shouting during the next few weeks, but it is a subject rather for the gravest anxiety, and every loyal citizen of the Empire is called to watchfulness and strenuous exertion so far as his influence may reach, to see to it that what we have undertaken to do for South Africa shall be done. We are assured that this has not been a capitalists' war, but rather a war for the establishment of true liberty and for the redemption and protection of the native races. Let us beware, then, that no new system of slavery is introduced, in the interest of cheap labour, benevolently enforced; and let the natives be guarded by strict prohibition from the fatal traffic in strong drink. Let it also be remembered that we are pledged not to the dominance of one race, but to equal rights of citizenship for all, the quenching of the fires of animosity and the sway of an enlightened Christian civilisation. It is these considerations which ought to be kept steadily in view, and for the enforcement of which it must be the endeavour of all who believe in the greatness of the Empire and the nobility of the British race to secure trustworthy representatives.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS AND NORGATE announce among their forthcoming publications Professor Harnack's recent lectures on "The Principles and Applications of Christianity," translated by his friend, Mr. T. Bailey Saunders, with a special preface for this translation written by the author, and Professor E. Nestle's "Introduction to the Greek New Testament," translated by the Rev. William Edie, and edited by Professor Allan Menzies, of St. Andrew's University. These works will be incorporated in the new series of the Theological Translation Library as volumes I. and II. of the fifth year's subscriptions, and will be sold separately at half-a-guinea per volume. We are glad to hear also of a new work by the Rev. C. E. Beeby, vicar of Yardley Wood, entitled "Doctrine and Principles: Popular Lectures on Primary Questions." Our reader will remember Mr. Beeby's recent interesting contribution to these columns, as well as his notable book on "Creed and Life."

THE DIVINE CHRIST.

Surely more than one Unitarian visiting Oberammergau has found himself perplexed by the apparent paradox that the Christus is quite as human as his own conception of Christ, but conspicuously less divine. And further consideration only serves to show that this is no accident, but due to something inherent in Catholicism. The cause is partly suggested by the very title of the great drama, for it is the play of the Passion—that is to say, the presentation not of what Christ did, but of what he endured. And endurance may be touchingly human, but can hardly reveal specific kinship with the creative power characteristically revealed in action.

But the title is merely the indication of a limitation imposed by the orthodox scheme of the universe, and it is the object of this article to open the question of how far even we Unitarians have failed to escape the traditional limitations.

The orthodox theologian must of necessity dwell upon the passion of Christ's life and have a suffering saviour. If for no other reason, then simply for this: that every critical event in the Messiah's life is conceived as predestined — already fixed in God's eternal order long before the spirit of Jesus entered the flesh. Nay, more—for what is not already present in the mind of God?—the Messiah's life was revealed even to man and anciently foretold from birth to death to the prophets of Israel.

Now in what sense can we conceive of such a life as being actually lived? In no sense at all. It may be played well or ill as a part is played—the different events may be beautifully, heroically, majestically rendered, but the ring of the creative spirit ever rising in new response of grandeur and beauty to the extorting pressure of unannounced events, must, in the nature of the case, be absent.

To the Catholic this fact is comparatively unimportant, for he is not dependent on the earthly Christ for his conception of the Redeemer's character. To him Christ is an eternal and heavenly power, whose divine character is, and always was knowable by the chosen few, apart from his earthly incarnation. To him all that is absolutely essential in the earthly life of Christ is, first, that it shall fulfil prophecy, and then that it shall reveal an unmistakable humanity.

But woe unto us if we, having abandoned belief in his deity as part of the Godhead, then accept the merely suffering Christ of earth whose mission was to reveal the humanity of God, but not the divinity of Man.

This difference cannot be too much insisted on. If Christ is to be anything to us, it must be as revealing (like other supreme souls) man's divinity, whereas to the orthodox Christian the entire significance of his life is as revealing God's humanity. Hence the orthodox Christian can afford to have a merely suffering Christ; can afford to dwell exclusively on his passion, which we cannot. To us his life must be pre-eminently the life of action, or he has ceased to be our Master in any true sense, and has become merely a tradition, and a shadowy one, which we take on from orthodoxy without truly appreciating or understanding it.

Unfortunately it requires a far greater effort of the historic imagination to make into our own a life of action than such a passive life as we have represented at Oberammergau. It does with any historic character. We almost inevitably regard dead persons not as like ourselves, ignorant of what to-morrow will bring forth, and of how our actions of to-day will work out into the inevitable but unknown future. And this, perhaps, is specially so with Bible characters. We find it necessary to remind ourselves that Jeremiah, for instance, was not in his own day half-way through the Bible, but at the end of knowable time—as much as we are to-day.

But it is of supreme importance that we Unitarians should realise this of Jesus. Truism as it is, it needs insisting on that he had not read the Gospels. And when he was led down the hill from Gethsemane and saw the faint glow over the eastern hills he did not certainly know that it was the last dawn he should see in this world, nor could he know, as we do, that it was to be a cross that day which should raise him to the kingdom. We cannot help reading his life in the light of its tragic climax which is so deeply stamped upon our imaginations; but this is to lose half its human significance. To know the divineness of any life we must go and live it through stage by stage with the liver, always more filled with the emotions of each moment than with our knowledge of the end.

Yet it is no easy task for anyone to do this, and certainly not to be expected of the humble average Christian of mediæval or modern Europe. It may be then, that the Catholic Church has done well in presenting Christ always as human, tenderly, pathetically, almost aggressively human. For we are all touched nearly and, moreover, deeply by the very simple human passages of life—birth, childhood, motherhood, suffering, betrayal, patience, forgiving submission. We have all seen, we have all understood—in part at least,—we have all loved these things. Yea, and it is in times and ways like these that we should expect a divine being, predestined to undergo certain ordeals in a human life, to display his superhuman goodness. We should, in fact, expect to see in him, as he walked his earthly way, how perfect the simplest humanity may be. And this the Catholic Church has given her children. She has never feared to paint Christ's humanity. Protestantism appears, however, too timid. In its presentation of Christ it has rather shunned all aggressively human features, and has dwelt far less on the motherhood, the infancy, and even the humiliations of the passion and crucifixion. There things harmonise so hardly with the conception of a person of the Godhead. But in turning from them Protestantism has largely lost what is so essential to the orthodox scheme of the universe—the true and veritable humanity of God as shown in Christ, which the Roman and Greek Church for so long have brought home by effigy, and picture and doctrine to the humblest peasant of Christendom.

And this, indeed, is no small thing. It is enough to have changed human life on earth, for men to believe that God, the Almighty power, not ourselves, evident in all Nature, is not stern and even hostile as men felt of old, but has been revealed as human, nay, once passed through and endured all our human difficulties and troubles by humbling himself to become a holy woman's child. He, the Almighty—as they hold with awe—was a man, a holy man, full of power and truth, and yet gentle, forgiving, suffering. We need have no fear now of His pity and love. But more. They deem that this humanising of God was no afterthought in Creation's plan. From the beginning it was pre-arranged that at a certain stage God should accept and spare His divinest creature man, and man should at last come to know the tender love and pity of his human God. Who shall dare scoff at this thought? Who is wise enough to pass it by with a smile? Is it not resplendent with tender beauty, and, moreover, the symbol of an immeasurable truth?

Surely it is no small thing to have brought home to men, even in any form, the truth of God's incarnation in man, and of the human sympathy of the Infinite.

But has not this symbol, with all its beauty and significance, been bought for us at too heavy a price? For, after all, no symbol is as precious, nor yet as illuminating, as one human soul. Christians have purchased a beautiful and poetic figure, but they have sacrificed for it the greatest perhaps of all historic personalities. For to almost all of us, orthodox and heterodox alike, the life of Jesus appears more as supremely passive than supremely active. We see that he did and he endured what he had to do, but we fail to see what new flashes of divine glory one after another were revealed, nay, created, in those few fleeting hours by the carpenter prophet of God. Vainly has Christian teaching striven to raise the person of its founder. Vainly has he been serially called God's Son, His first-born, His only begotten, until at last he was called God Himself. No titles could give back the true divinity which men lost sight of, when they saw his life as a scene in God's pre-conceived, unalterable scheme of salvation, instead of a new and unique effulgence of creative power which never was until it flamed forth in that soul Then, There, and Thus, and never would have been at all if the Galilean artizan had not put down his tools to preach.

In his creative genius is the divinity of man—in his power to be and to do, and to bring about that which none can foresee, for as yet it is not fashioned in the armoury of God. We create new deeds which have not been and cause them to become irrevocable facts in Creation. This, God has given to us: to create and leave the world for ever changed.

Each deed we do, or shall do, is eternally and irrevocably our own; for our living responsibility before the living God is the awful price we pay for His image. And this is each man's uniqueness; this is his divinity. Even bound in his temporal finitude, he yet retains some glow of the creative will of the Eternal; and if we separate a man from his fellows and strive to put him in another sphere of God's economy, then we are in danger of robbing him of this his supreme glory, which makes him truly a son of God.

And is not this exactly what has happened to the Christ of Orthodoxy? Is it his divinity which moves the multitudes of to-day as it stirred the multitudes of Galilee and Jerusalem? Do we to-day stand astonished at his teaching, or do we follow it as that of a living God?

No, indeed. For the conventional Christ as we see him in picture and sculpture and hymn of to-day has not the virility of a child. The awful events of his life are lightly repeated with unutterable cant, thinly veiled by sentimentality, in the pulpit, and his very name uneasily avoided out of it, as though the illusion were too frail to bear the light of thought. We have tried to make him a God, and in the Protestant world, at least, we have scarcely retained him even as a man.

And Unitarians to whom the full light of the historic standpoint is open are too often satisfied to take over this same colourless Christ of Protestantism, but stripped even of his titles. They deny his deity, and yet with unmanly apology hasten to explain that he is still something almost other than man, thus losing the very pearl of great price which they have sold all to buy.

And is it for these in their bankruptcy to tell us (as, indeed, they now, with the irony of things mortal, begin to do) that we must somehow take this nearly lifeless abstraction, this symbol robbed of its symbolic significance and incarnate it into our conception of God, to give this warmth and humanity? To such as these the divine power of the living human genius is utterly unknown. Without sufficient historic sympathy or imagination to know and live with the man himself they cling pathetically to the effeminate image of Christ which Sunday-school hymnology has bequeathed to them, but in reality understand about as much as Judas of the genius who, single-handed, wrenched the course of history into a new and immeasurably fruitful channel; who at one stroke swept the heart of Judaism clean of its heathen temple, and shattered the barriers which shut her priceless inheritance away from humanity. Jesus crushed the Temple made with hands to raise one (yea, even in Judaism itself, as to-day witnesses) made without hands; he gave to mankind the Old Testament and—as it was not known even there—the inestimable "knowledge of the Lord." And all this achieved and summed up in a single act and a single quotation from his prophetic predecessor Jeremiah, as, standing amidst overturned tables in the Temple court, he said, "It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations." And this is the man whom Christians have been content to describe in the words of Isaiah as the "lamb" or as the man of "sorrows."

Scarce anywhere to-day is it for his true divinity and inspired genius that Jesus now holds sway over men's hearts as he did of yore over their lives. So far as he is yet our Master it is, to nearly all, for what still imperishably remains of his simple, beautiful humanity. It is hanging as a helpless child at his mother's breast, or as a yet more helpless victim on the cross, that the Catholic loves to picture him. It is in such scenes as blessing the little children or uplifting the heart-broken Magdalen that Protestants cherish his memory. These things, too, are indeed divine; but in themselves not more so than many a hundred—aye, many a million—of his humbler brethren's doings and sufferings. For the tenderness, the poetry, the grandeur of the Divine power never ceases to speak to us and comfort us in the lives of men. But the divine words and actions which Jesus alone of all God's created universe ever did, or ever could have spoken or done, are so little understood or appreciated, that most professing Christians would be at a loss to prove wherein the teaching and actions of Christ were greater or more important—not to say more divine—than those of his predecessors among Israel's Rabbis and prophets.

No. The Christ of Christendom is often human—tenderly, pathetically, beautifully human—but so long as he stands to us as the actor in the drama of man's redemption, or remains unique as other men are not unique, he cannot be truly divine.

Yet it may be there is deeper cause than our creeds why so many of us to-day cannot have a divine Christ. For no creed can, by the grace of God, securely debar us from spiritual truth; and there never has been a time through the centuries nor ever a place where some disciples, few or many, have not risen till they caught the light. The summits of those glowing souls reach in continuous chain between ourselves and far Calvary, linking us with the Nazarene Master himself and passing on the beacon gleam even where the sun has been lost. Too many of us have sadly to confess that it has always been less our creeds—blinding as they may be—than ourselves that shut us from the light. In very truth we do not want a divine Christ; and as in olden days men trembled at a thunder-cloud lest it should reveal the God to see whom was death, so we still shrink from the sight of God in Christ, as in all other great souls, as we shrink from death itself.

For we dare not face the life of God-inspired action which led Jesus to the cross. In our sight it has become an artistic dream, removed by two millenniums to a safe distance from reality. It is a melody in a minor key; in fact it is not the life of supreme doings, but merely the Passion.

If we would see God in creature or man, and therefore if we would have a divine Christ, we need not so much to be clear in head, but we must strive to be pure in heart. Our own life actions must be cleansed and re-cleansed of frivolity and sordid endeavour. For the inexorable truth is ever awaiting us—that, however, irreproachable our Christology, however diligently we may call ourselves disciples of Jesus Christ, seeking to creep to heaven upon the vicarious way of his life, to us he never will nor ever can appear divine until there glows in our own lives some new dawning of the Deity.

FAULTS in the life breed errors in the brain,
And these, reciprocally, those again.

SEE how naturally and beautifully the one divine force of Good Will works to cure, to save, to educate, to uplift. Set down among men in the most abandoned or savage community, a living revelation of goodness, of truth, and probity, and straightway it is as if you brought sunshine and air into the fever ward of a hospital. He who loves and does good stirs others also, by an irresistible contagion of goodness, to love and to do good. He whose life is in line with the eternal current brings other lives, by induction, as it were, into the same movement.—Charles F. Dole.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

THE 247th annual meeting of the General Baptist Assembly was held at the Bethnal Green-road Chapel, Shoreditch, on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 17 and 18.

On Monday afternoon the meeting of the Messengers and committee was held, and in the evening a religious service was held, at which the Rev. J. A. BRINKWORTH, of Saffron Walden, was the preacher, having fulfilled the same function also in the years 1880 and 1890. Taking as his text Matthew xvi. 18, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, &c.," Mr. Brinkworth spoke at length of the character of the Christian Church as a vital body resting upon a prepared foundation, and as destined to endure and overcome all the evil forces of the world. In answer to the question whether they themselves were members of the Church of Jesus Christ he said: "The soul which, won by the beauty and loveliness of Christ's character, stirred by its purity and inflamed by the holy fire of his self-sacrifice, flows into cordial agreement with all other trustful souls about it, so likewise attracted and kindled; the soul that is willing with them to celebrate and carry out its reverence and love for the common Lord in every Christian way, according to its fair understanding of his design, is a member of Christ's real Church." That was the test they must apply to themselves, not regarding their religion simply as a scheme of doctrine or a system of morality. The central principle of Christianity was a spiritual principle of love. From this must spring the whole of their true life, not in self-sufficiency, but in discipleship and in the strength which comes from union. In conclusion the preacher said: "The individual is not absorbed in the Church, and does not remain as he was, but he is ennobled, warmed with the sacred fire of common enthusiasm, and impelled by new and more urgent motives to the service of God and the salvation of man. The body he belongs to beyond all mere words is a sacramental host, a celestial estate, and a 'company of labourers together with God.' What other relationship could be equal in the honour it confers, the confidence it nourishes, or the duration through which it shall last—for ever?"

On Tuesday morning, after a devotional service, the President's Address was delivered by the Rev. S. BURROWS, of Dover. At the outset he explained that Dr. Daland, who otherwise would have occupied that position, had accepted a call to America, and was no longer with them; it therefore fell to his lot for a second time to fill the office of president, and he acknowledged the honour so conferred upon him.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The subject of his address was "The Genesis of the Spiritual Life. It was, he said, during a holiday in Italy that the thought of the approach to the spiritual temple took hold of my mind. I was standing late one Sunday afternoon in the great square of the Duomo at Milan, gazing at the wonderful cathedral, and watching the worshippers ascending the steps and passing into that magnificent building out of the busy street; away from the noise, they passed into the calm of the great church, lit by the light of beautiful windows, rich with the legend of saint and martyr and sacred story. As I mused on the scene, it seemed to me that it is step by step that we rise from our ordinary life up to the temple of the Spirit, the sanctuary of God. Though materialism has ceased to be a power in the realm of philosophy, it still has much power over the popular mind. Men are so apt to think that what is unseen is unreal; we have, therefore, to try and lead them to realise the naturalness of the spiritual life by showing them how we may rise from the busy square of every-day existence, step by step into the holy of holies of the spirit.

In the great square men buy and sell; they are anxious, full of love or hatred, but amid all conflicting feelings conscious of an inner self. We need to press home upon them that in this consciousness of the unity of their being is the first step towards the higher, diviner life. For what is this self? Not the nerves, for we can be vexed at being nervous and worried. Not the brain, for we often complain that our brain will not work and do our will. It is something at the back of nerves and brain—it is the self or soul conscious of its own existence. We think different thoughts, feel different feelings, suffer, enjoy, meditate, act, and yet it is always the same "I" or self that does these things. I am the same person that I was twenty years ago, though my thoughts and feelings have altered in many respects; and so it comes about that there is within us a sense of constant change and constant permanence. What is this permanence within us? It is our self or soul: it consists, not merely of intellect, but also of will, affections, and spiritual perceptions. Once men become conscious of a selfhood, and they also become conscious of a not-self, an external world. Both these conclusions are primary beliefs, prior to reasoning, known to us as soon as we begin to analyse our consciousness.

True, there have not been wanting those who have disputed both the unity of our selfhood and the reality of an external world, and in their studies carefully satisfied themselves that neither existed; but as soon as they stepped into active life, they were confronted with the difficulty that all their conduct had to be regulated on the assumption that both a self and an external world actually existed. Now, are not beliefs essential to our practical life—beliefs that we are obliged to act upon, even if we dispute them—justified as part of the very nature of our being? Once we can help men to see this, and they will no longer feel that we are talking in the air when we speak of still deeper realities.

Following out this line of thought, Mr. Burrows then appealed to the sense of beauty and to the moral consciousness as bearing witness to the deeper realities of our human life and as steps of approach to the profoundest spiritual truth.

Having now risen (he continued) from the primary truths of consciousness, of our existence as a personal unity, surrounded by an external world, step by step by a consciousness of beauty and a consciousness of right, we can take another step that brings us to the threshold of the temple. This step leads us to study the spiritual consciousness or the power within us of knowing spiritual realities. Is this reliable? Many to-day deny that it is, and turn away from it as crumbling and treacherous ground to venture upon. But when they have trusted their nature so far, why not venture on this next step? If the other steps were solid and could be trusted, wherein does this differ from them? Admitting that man has a sense of beauty and a sense of right that is generally trustworthy—so trustworthy that we do not dispute the reality—is it not just as much a fact of our nature that there are aspirations that yearn for communion with the Infinite Reality, above all, in all, and through all? Here, as in the consciousness of beauty and morality, there are differences of development, and different ideas as to what is spiritual; but if the differences in the realms of art and morality do not destroy their value, neither should they in the realm of our spiritual nature. Let us have confidence to trust the revelation within. Beauty and goodness have led us up to the white walls of the temple of the Spirit; let us go on to the inner shrine.

Religion is universal; where is the shore on which rises no altar, no attempt of some kind to symbolise or express some relation with the Unseen and Eternal? Where is the land on which men have built themselves homes, but in which no temple has been raised?

Shall we be told by some that universal consent is nothing but a mark of error? If so, we can reply in the words of Ernest Neville, "that such an objection rests upon a confusion of ideas. Humanity has no testimony to render upon scientific questions, the solution of which is reserved for patient study; but humanity bears witness to its own nature." It does so, for religion is an expression of the highest inner life, a sense of voluntary dependence on, and joyful submission to a Divine Power, and this sense of the spiritual reality has held its sway over mankind in spite of error, superstition, and scepticism. We may, of course, as individuals, only look at the surface of life, only loiter with the triflers in the market place, or become so eager in competition that we leave ourselves no leisure to think; or entangle ourselves with insoluble puzzles to which we can find no clue. But these phases of experience no more disprove the resources of humanity, than a gaudy poster of some melodrama disproves the power of man to appreciate the pictures of Rubens or Turner. Religion may be denied or degraded; but so may art, so may morality. It is for us to try and purify it, as the true artist seeks to ennoble and purify art. As this reforming process goes on in religion, we feel more its grandeur and spiritual sublimity, and our hearts cry out as we cross the threshold of the spiritual temple, for God—for the living God.

"It is in such a mood that the burden of the mystery, that the heavy and weary weight of all this unintelligible world, is lightened; that serene and blessed mood in which the affections gently lead us on—until, the breath of this corporeal frame, and even the motion of our human blood almost suspended, we are laid asleep in body and become a living soul; and with an eye made quiet by the power of harmony and the deep power of joy, we see into the very heart of things."

In uttering these subtle thoughts, Wordsworth felt that he was voicing some of the deepest truths of our nature. It was no mere fantasy, no mere dream, it was a deep and solemn reality for him. He felt, as we feel, that the temple of the spirit stands firmly based on the evidence of our own nature. Standing there we enter by the portal of trust in the unchanging goodness of God. Even the great mystery of evil cannot shake this portal; for evil is not the ruling power, it tends to destroy even itself. Nor is evil so prevalent as some would have us suppose.

They dwell only on disease, death, and crime, till the whole of life seems one scene of horror; but do they not overlook the glow of health, the joy of heart, the sweet affections of home, the delights of true society, the charm and beauty of Nature, and the ever-changing seasons, all of which are real, and far more prevalent in our existence than plague and famine and sudden death? True, we cannot explain all—we are but as children looking out into a universe too large for us to fully comprehend—but so shot through and through with rays of goodness and love, that we can comprehend enough to give us faith and trust that all the 'angles of our strife will be rounded into calm.'

Entering through this portal of the goodness of God, we see before us the altar of faith—of faith that we can hold communion with God. Could we not enter into relations with Him He would remain for us a mere dead abstraction. But our poor human sense of goodness, our loneliness, our weak love, seek the Infinite Goodness, the Great Companion, the Eternal Love; and as "we kneel at the great world's altar-stairs that slope through darkness up to God" we realise that we are in the presence of the Eternal Spirit, and above the altar beams in soft radiance the face of Christ from the great window of history. He stands revealing in his humanity all that is best in us, and helping us to see also, shining through his life and character, rays and gleams of the Divine glory. If he was so gentle, so forgiving, so full of grace and truth, we feel strengthened in our trust in God as our Father and our Friend.

It is to this apprehension of the reality of the higher life that we seek to lead our congregations. To help them to feel that there is nothing unnatural or unreasonable, or out of harmony with ordinary life, in finding God as the refuge of the soul. Our desire is to enable them to feel, as St. Francis de Sales says, "that as the birds have their nests to which they can retreat, and as the stag shelters himself in the thick forest, seeking shade and refreshment when the summer is hot, so our heart needs a resting place, even the altar of the Lord of Hosts." Amid our disappointments and sorrows, our sins and repentances, God is our "house of defence, our strong tower, and shelter from the storm, and our refuge from the heat."

To this faith consecrated by our beloved Master, lived out by millions, sought as a present help in time of trouble—to this faith we seek to lead those whom we are permitted to influence. In the great temple of the spirit we find a home, courage for living, comfort for dying, help and cheer for every time of need. A holy music breathes out on the worshippers; the silence is broken and the throbbing heart rejoices—

'And the long aisles flash out in light
And nave and transept, column white
And arches crossed, gleam clear to sight,

As if the roof were off, and all
Stood in the noon-sun. To the call
To other hearts as liberal,

The pedal strikes out in the air!
The instrument hath room to bear
Still fuller strains and perfecter.'

Aye, friends, as Emerson said, the "world is young yet," the revelation is only begun, the great Bible of humanity has only a few chapters, the temple is still incomplete. In hope and trust, then, let us work and wait, faithful during life's little day, sure that God will never leave us nor forsake us, but will at last lead all His children home "to the Temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

At the conclusion of the President's address the business meeting was held. The Rev. A. J. Marchant having been elected assistant secretary for the day, the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott read the roll of members, and a resolution of welcome to members of other churches present, and to the Revs. G. Lansdown and T. Shakespeare, settled at Billingshurst and Deal respectively, was cordially passed. The two new members having responded, the Rev. V. D. Davis, as one of the visitors, briefly acknowledged the welcome and was followed by the Rev. F. Allen, who conveyed the greetings of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern counties, and dwelt upon the great need of unity among all the churches for a common resistance to the real evils of the world.

The Secretary then read the letters from churches belonging to the Assembly and also the Committee's report.

The accounts, which were presented by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, as treasurer, showed a balance in hand, increased during the year from £43 to £65. The total receipts, including the balance brought over, were £221 8s. 7d., the income being chiefly derived from endowments. The contributions from churches and personal members were £5 2s. 8d. The grants to churches during the year amounted to £110. The accounts were adopted and the Committee and officers were re-elected, and the usual business, which extended over an adjournment for lunch, was concluded with thanks to the President and to the Rev. W. Harvey Smith and the Deacons of the Bethnal Green-road Church.

The meeting was not largely attended.

In the evening a Communion Service was held, conducted by the Rev. J. Wain.

Because Heaven is in us to bud and unfold,
We are younger for growing old.

"OUR CHAPEL."

I use the phrase which somehow has become fixed in my memory after about fifty years. Why we called it "our chapel" may require careful inquiry. There was a church in the parish, but the relation of the Sunday scholars to it did not appear to be so close as between us boys and girls and "our chapel." It was not only the building but the ministers and people who made "our chapel" a real House of the Lord.

The chapel was of a rather strange style of architecture, and utility had evidently determined its shape and internal arrangements. It had a porch, and over the porch a very plain cross: the idea of a decorative or ornamental cross was evidently not entertained. The cross was there, a sufficient sign that the worshippers were Christians. It misled a poor woman once, a real wayfarer. I see her yet, with a baby suspended behind her, fastened in a shawl. She came to the door and asked if it was a Catholic chapel; the cross, no doubt, was the cause of her turning from the high road. It was the first time I was perplexed with the problem—Catholic or Protestant? Of course it would have been useless to have invited the poor Irish tramp inside, as she would have found neither altar nor priest; and yet now I testify, in the true sense "our chapel" was a Catholic chapel.

The peculiar architecture of the building was only partially visible through the luxuriant shrubbery which filled up the ground between the chapel and the high road.

The inhabitants within half-a-mile were mostly poor people. Their children found their way to the Sunday-school; but they themselves expressed their regard for the chapel people, "who never interfered with anybody."

It was the Sunday-school which gave me an introduction to the institution I am trying to describe. There was a service as well as a Sunday-school. I remember how devout and earnest all those men and women seemed to be. Not all alike; their individual peculiarities were distinct and manifest.

Some of them came from distant places, some driving, others walking. They were not of the peasant class, though I recall one couple who came from a little hamlet about two miles away, who trudged along with a fixed determination that they were in the way of life. Carlyle would call them peasant saints.

For ten years I hardly missed a Sunday in attending the worship as well as the Sunday-school. There was a regular congregation of about fifty. I should betray myself if I were to name them as I could easily do. There were sons of one family and their parents; there were brothers of another, and wives and children. The girls were noticeable in the summer time by their large straw hats and flowing ribbons. The floor of "our chapel" had no matting, and the steps of every family were distinctly characteristic—squeaking boots, the heavy tread of the farmer, the quick step of the tradesman and shopkeeper. There was no bell, and no clock. Service began when the minister and the choirmaster had arranged the hymns from Aspland's collection.

One member of the congregation always appears to my mind as an advocate of ventilation. After fifty children had occupied the building, it no doubt required a change of air. So, before the service began, this member, who had left his lovely meadows and fields nearly three miles away, took the opportunity to open a part of the very high window by means of an iron rod. The bottom end of the rod was perforated to receive a pin on the side of the frame; but the village blacksmith had made the hole too large for the pin, and the apparatus often failed. A hasty remedy was found in a piece of paper to make the pin hold. Why the chapel committee did not call in the aid of their local carpenter I cannot guess. This performance was often repeated.

I have the most agreeable remembrance of the choirmaster. He was never so called, and I am satisfied never received a salary. When he entered the white-painted door, fitted with a spring to close the opening automatically, he held a piece of white paper in his hand about three inches square. He proceeded to a square pew immediately under the pulpit. The table in this pew was covered with green baize. As I was at a later period admitted to the choir seat in order that I might in some degree compensate for the want of female voices by playing the air of tunes upon an eight-keyed flute, I was initiated into the art of selecting tunes for hymns.

I well remember our psalmody on Easter Sunday. A son of a former minister always came to his native place at Easter and then took his seat in the choir. An appropriate hymn was:—

There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign.

It was sung to the tune of "Cambridge New"; the last line of each stanza is repeated. The bass is very prominent in the repeat, and I almost hear these voices coming down the "corridors of time" singing out their "eternal hope," long since realised; only a few of those old-timers still here, "this side of Jordan."

They were very loyal to Jesus; a favourite hymn was:—

I'm not ashamed to own my Lord
Or to defend his cause,
Maintain the glory of his Cross,
And honour all his laws.

This was sung to a tune named "Hythe," which, I think, only exists in MS. It has many repetitions, like one of Handel's choruses. When we got hold of a good sentiment we clung to it, and kept it in our minds like a sweet morsel in our mouths.

My account of "our chapel" is not taken from my standpoint of to-day. It is the impressions made upon a Sunday scholar. The people I saw and heard were not under any ecclesiastical control; they sang and prayed out of full hearts and earnest souls, "with none to molest or make them afraid"; they sought no proselytes and interfered with no man's right to worship God according to his own conscience.

The authority of the Bible they accepted, interpreted by reason and experience, and believed that all would come right under God's purpose at last.

There was a gallery in our chapel, and the gallery people were never seen sitting in the body of the building. Except for a cushioned seat or two, the gallery appeared designed for persons of a little humbler station. A row of pegs enabled the men to hang up their hats. The attitude for prayer was turning the face to the wall, standing.

My impression is the congregation dispersed very slowly after the Benediction. The little porch became crowded. I, however, and the other scholars were interested in the Sunday dinner which was, for some of us, being cooked in a neighbouring bakery, where an elderly member of the chapel was engaged in the cooking process, so that I have no idea of the communications that passed between the members on their way through the grounds to the road.

When we returned to Sunday-school we often found that our desks had been utilised for tables, and we saw the remains of a very plain lunch. In a large jug we noticed very temperate drink. A piece of toasted bread was suspended in water. The taste of the decoction was a very slight improvement upon that of pure water. Before the chapel-keeper could clear the tables we often tasted the liquor, and wondered. Owing to the distances a second service was seldom held.

The anniversary tea meeting was held on Sunday afternoon. It was then we heard the exposition of certain sentiments which were prepared beforehand and offered to prominent members. At such times visitors were present who were always listened to with rapt attention.

"Our chapel" was closed every Whit-Sunday, when it was understood the members and ministers travelled to a neighbouring county to assist in celebrating the anniversary of another chapel. The minister of this chapel occasionally visited us—a tall, venerable-looking man, whose manner and address were exceedingly impressive. I saw a photograph of him somewhere lately and recognised it at once. The addresses given at the anniversary meeting showed that several of the members were capable of expounding a passage of Scripture; but if a minister was not available, a very dry and uninteresting discourse was read out of an octavo volume. This was always read from the table pew. No layman ever ascended the pulpit. The gallery people, I imagine, would hardly see the reader.

It is probable there were two parties in the little congregation, but I saw no signs of it. I now know a radical change happened, and a disruption took place, but it did not reach the Sunday-school.

There were four ministers in my time. The first I only remember from hearing him deliver a discourse upon the death of a former scholar of the school, burned to death by fireworks on a Fifth of November celebration.

He was succeeded by a broad-shouldered florid-faced son of the Emerald Isle, with a voice that might have filled St. James's Hall. He must have devoted much attention to combating the mythical theory of the origin of Christianity, as I remember he often used to pause and remark, "No one doubted the historical reality of Socrates. Why doubt that of Jesus?" The writer may as well confess he was rather restless during service when deprived of a library book which sometimes, as the least of two evils, was allowed by the teacher who sat among his boys. The restless scholar was retained till the minister descended the pulpit and came to the culprit. There was a twinkle in his eye, and a suppressed smile on his good-humoured face all the time he was exhorting the unruly youngster to learn to sit still, which won the boy's heart for ever. He visited the Sunday-school and gave lectures. He told us about gravitation. A staghorn-handled penknife was allowed to drop from his hand to the table, followed by a stentorian question: What caused it to fall? We even heard through him of centripetal and centrifugal forces. The geography of Palestine and the topography of Jerusalem, with the exact locality of the Valley of Hinnom, Gehenna, which he explained was the only material hell mentioned in the Bible.

Our next minister was a Scotchman, pale, thin and tall, with the manner and style of a student. He gave lectures upon literary subjects and introduced to us the Scottish poet, Robert Nicol, whose hymn in Bateman's collection deserves to be better known:—

Arouse thee, Soul!
Be what thou art,
An emanation of the Deity,
A flutter of that heart
Which fills all nature, sea and earth and sky!

He also read to us the sermon preached before the Queen by the late Principal Caird "The Religion of Common Life."

Our next minister was from the West of England—a quiet, thoughtful man. He held, I suspect, very closely by the old paths. I remember he made the only personal appeal I ever received from a Liberal minister to profess myself a disciple of Christ. I was indebted to him for kindnesses which I only refer to in passing.

The old chapel still stands, but the pulpit and pews are gone. When I visit it all these are restored in my memory, and I see a worshipper who all these years has embodied my idea of a saint.

Robert Leighton describes, I believe, Hope-street Church, Liverpool, as "our chapel." He praises its beauty, "its marble pillars," "the azure roof," "the windows' pictured scenes," "its organ," "its preacher."

"Our chapel" was but a plain and homely house; yet it enshrined faith, hope, charity, and was a true House of God.

I visit the parish church where I was christened and confirmed: I cannot join in its worship, I cannot accept its priest's interpretation of the Gospel. My heart and soul find satisfaction in what I owe to "our chapel."

Sept. 11. An Old Scholar.

Men know but little of each other after all; but little know how many good and tender affections are suppressed and kept out of sight by diffidence, by delicacy, by fear of appearing awkward or ostentatious, and even by strong sensibility, which sometimes puts on a hard and rough exterior for their own check or protection; and the power that penetrates all these barriers must be an extraordinary one. There must belong to it charity and kindness, and forbearance, and sagacity, and fidelity to the trust which the opening heart reposes in it.—Anon.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Alltyplaca.—The annual committee meeting of the Sunday-schools of Cardiganshire was held on Monday last. A moderate number of ministers, students, and representatives from the schools was present. The Rev. John Davies was voted to the chair. The chief business was to make arrangements for the Sunday-school examinations next spring. It was determined that the syllabus of work for classes three and four should be the first six chapters of St. Luke, for class two the first five chapters of the Rev. D. Evans's catechism, and for class one a series of questions and answers to be prepared. Lessons have also been prepared on the prescribed period of St. Luke, and will be issued shortly. April 3 was provisionally fixed for the date, and examiners were appointed for the different centres. After some further suggestions had been made as to the conducting of the examination, and the drawing up of questions, the meeting concluded with tea, prepared by some members of the chapel.

Billingshurst.—Successful Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in this church on Sunday, Sept. 9. The church was most tastefully decorated, and appropriate sermons to good congregations were preached by the Rev. G. Lansdown. The church has been recently painted, and carpet seating, "a gift from a lady visitor in appreciation of the services," has been put upon all the pews. On Monday, Sept. 10, the church anniversary meetings were held. A large number of members and friends assembled for tea, which was partaken of in the school and in the church. A large number of friends came from Horsham and Guildford, and several visitors in the neighbourhood came. The Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, conducted the service, and deeply interested everyone in his sermons. After the service a public meeting was held, with the Rev. G. Lansdown in the chair. A hearty welcome was accorded by the meeting to the visitors, and this was responded to by the Rev. Lang Buckland, of Guildford, in a stirring address; also by Miss Emily Kensett, of Horsham, and by Mr. Bromham, of Petworth. A special vote of thanks to the Rev. J. J. Marten for his services, and to the ladies for their hospitality, brought a very successful anniversary to a close. Through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Carter and family, Mr. Lansdown has procured the use of a pretty little chapel at New Pound, about three-and-a-half or four miles from Billingshurst Station. The building has been recently painted and looks very bright and cheerful. The notice board, which bears the name Unitarian Church, announces that services will be held every Thursday evening and choir practice every Tuesday. In this church there is every prospect of good and successful work being carried on. There are large engineering works, owned by the Carters, an old Unitarian family, close by, and there is no church within a mile. On Thursday week, when the church was opened, there were thirty-two present, including half-a-dozen lads who have volunteered their services as choir boys. The members at Billingshurst have kindly granted the use of an American organ belonging to them. The people of the district have cordially welcomed Mr. Lansdown, and it is expected that when the movement becomes better known, and the harvest has been gathered in, good congregations will assemble.

Bolton: Unity Church.—A meeting was held last Saturday evening to welcome the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., who has succeeded the Rev. H. M. Livens as minister of Unity Church. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. J. Entwisle, and a cordial welcome was extended to Mr. and Mrs. Harris, on behalf of the church, by Mr. John Waring, one of its oldest members, and Mr. D. Whitehead. The Rev. Dendy Agate, as a friend of both Mr. and Mrs. Harris of many years standing, also spoke Messrs. S. Fairbrother and R. Chadwick offered a welcome on behalf of the school, the Revs. C. J. Street and E. S. Hicks on behalf of the ministers of the district, and the Rev. E. Allen on behalf of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The Rev. W. Harris, in reply, thanked all the speakers for their welcomes, and assured the members that Mrs. Harris and himself already felt at home amongst them. Mr. S. Bromley welcomed the members who had joined the church during the last twelve months, and Mr. W. W. Midgley replied. Several songs, quartettes, &c., were given during the evening, and after the hymn, "He liveth long who liveth well," the meeting concluded with the Benediction.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—On Saturday, Sept. 15, a social meeting of members and friends of the Waverley-road Church was held in the schoolroom for the purpose of wishing farewell to the Rev. H. Harrold Johnson, prior to his departure for America. During the evening he was the recipient of the following presents:—A beautifully illuminated address on vellum, bound in morroco, signed by the officers and committee, together with a polished oak stationery cabinet, on behalf of the congregation; a handsome dressing-case from the Ladies' Sewing Guild, and a silver paper knife from the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school. The Chairman and various speakers expressed their keen sense of deprivation, in that the movement would no longer have Mr. Johnson's inspiring influence to urge them on to higher and nobler duties. The church has been much indebted to Mr. Johnson for zealous and efficient services since his coming in September, 1897, when services were held in the Board School, Somerville-road, and afterwards in the iron room, previous to the opening of the new church in October, 1898. It was with much regret that the congregation found that Mr. Johnson was unable to reconsider his decision to leave for America.

Boston.—Last Sunday evening Miss Freeman Clarke, daughter of the late Rev. J. Freeman Clarke, of Boston, U.S.A., conducted the service in Spain-lane Chapel, and gave a very excellent sermon on "The Christian Church: For What should it Exist?" which was very attentively listened to by a large congregation. On Monday evening several members of the Unitarian circle assembled in the chapel, where Miss Clarke kindly gave several very interesting explanations of different passages in Scripture, which were much enjoyed by everyone present. Miss Clarke's kindness in coming to preach in Boston is much appreciated by the members of the Spain-lane Chapel.

Deal.—The Harvest Festival was held on Sunday last, when the chapel had been beautifully decorated by the ladies of the congregation and visitors. Special sermons were preached by the Rev. T. Shakspeare, minister, and this revived festival (the first for several years) was regarded as a success. The fruit, &c., was given part to the poor and part to the hospital.

Ringwood.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held here on Sunday, Sept. 16, when Mr. C. Lionel Briggs, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, preached. The decorations were bright and choice. In the evening the Harvest Service of Song, by Messrs. Bowie and Tosh, was given. The collection, for the benefit of the Royal South Hants Infirmary, Southampton, amounted to £1 17s. 10d.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, Sept. 9, the Rev. W. Harrison delivered a discourse on a third visit to the Ober Ammergau Passion Play. Mr. Harrison saw the play in 1880, 1890, and again on Aug. 26 of the present year. He gave a sketch of the history of the play, and showed how it had gone through a process of evolution, becoming gradually refined and simplified as years went on, till now there was nothing in it to offend the most fastidious taste. Some things he saw in it in 1880 had been eliminated, and the play had gained in dignity and beauty in consequence. It was now "a thing of beauty," and to those who saw it, "a joy for ever." The church was crowded by an attentive congregation, who listened with interest for nearly an hour, and many of them were visibly affected at Mr. Harrison's description of Jesus parting with his mother, the treatment of Jesus in the guard-room, and the crucifixion. The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday last, Mr. Harrison conducting the services, morning, afternoon, and evening. There was a profusion of fruits, flowers, and vegetables, and the church was full on each occasion.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday evening, Sept. 16, a memorial service was held, on the passing away of Mr. Ramsey, a member of the church. The Rev. W. H. Lambelle gave an eloquent sermon, and the choir rendered special music, Miss Rose, the choir leader, singing a solo "Consolation." "The Dead March" in Saul concluded the service, the congregation reverently standing. On the previous day a congregational excursion, in which the children of the Sunday-school also joined, was made to Eaglescliffe.

Wales.—The Rev. J. Hathren Davies gives notice in the current issue of Yr Ymofynydd, our Welsh magazine, that he will relinquish the post of editor at the end of the year. He will then have completed thirteen years of service. It is to be hoped that some one will be prepared to take up the post at the beginning of the new year, so that there may be no break. Yr Ymofynydd started on its mission September, 1847.

Warrington.—Following on the farewell meeting to the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Mrs. Drummond, reported last week, the teachers and officers of the Cairo-street Sunday-school held a meeting on Sunday week, and on the following Monday evening the members of the young men's and young women's classes, of which Mr. and Mrs. Drummond had been the teachers, also held a meeting, at which enlarged photographic groups of the members were presented, with many expressions of gratitude and affection. At the latter meeting, in the course of his reply, Mr. Drummond said that to be able to look at such a picture would always be an encouragement and happiness to him. What had he done that he should receive all these presents? He had tried, as many others had tried, and had succeeded better than he had done, to make the interests, pleasures, and sorrows of the school his own, and he felt that he had not altogether failed in identifying himself with the life of the school. And whoever might take his place he could offer no higher privilege and no greater gladness than to come into contact with the life of the young people in the school as he had tried to do. He had no doubt made many mistakes and had irritated people sometimes, and, looking back, he saw that he might have done many things differently; but his friends, in the goodness of their hearts, had taken his intention; and he could say with absolute certainty that it had always been his wish to think of what was best for the school. That must be the keynote of the life of the school—not what they individually liked best, but to be unselfish, remembering that they were only members of a great fellowship with common interests which they had to serve. There had been more corporate life, more sense of fellowship in the school during the past two years, and more earnestness than ever, and he had never during the whole course of his ministry been so happy about the school as he was at that moment. He left it with a regret and affection he could not adequately express to them, but also with the greatest hopes for the future. They had beautiful schools, but the great thing was that they had such a splendid band of young people who made the place their religious home, the place where they sought for their friendships, and where they sought some of the deepest affections of their lives, and where also they sought for wholesome and happy amusements and serious teaching. Here also it was that they learnt the delight of doing good to others. Let them go on in that spirit, continue their good work and make the school more and more a power for good not only for themselves but for others.

THERE is no way of escape for parents. They must needs be inspirers to their children, because about them hangs, as the atmosphere about a planet, the thought environment of the child from which he derives those enduring ideas which express themselves as a life-long appetency towards things sordid or things lovely, things earthly or divine.—C. Mason.

Post 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"We know few recent books which promise more, which are written with greater freshness of thought, and which show more speculative acuteness, than Mr. Mellone's volume."—Times.

"A work of real value and interest. The whole range of questions which confront the philosophical inquirer at the present time are formulated with clearness and precision, and the author faces the problems involved with a conscientious thoroughness which is exceptional."—Dr. G. F. Stout, Lecturer in Psychology in the University of Oxford, and Editor of Mind.

"The author has absorbed the literature of the past twenty years. . . . Perhaps the chief interest of the book lies in the fact that it is a mirror of recent English Philosophy."—The Philosophical Review.

"Characterised throughout by a breadth of thought, an elevation of moral tone, and a lucidity of expression, as well as an acquaintance with current philosophical thought, which will enable it to bear favourable comparison with any works of the kind which have been recently published."—Scotsman.

"A thinker and writer of distinguished metaphysical gifts. . . . Our business is to call attention to the suggestiveness and ability of the work, and to recommend it to the careful study of the philosophical student, for whom it is specially designed."—Manchester Guardian.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties is to be held at Horsham on Tuesday week, Oct. 9. It will be seen from the advertisement that the preacher this year is the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church. Particulars as to the time of trains, &c., will be advertised next week, but the Rev. F. Allen writes to remind members of the Assembly and other friends, who think of attending the meeting, that the price of tickets for luncheon and tea, which is now 2s. and 9d. respectively, will, after Oct. 2, be increased to 2s. 6d. and 1s. Such a meeting in the country not only affords an occasion for a pleasant gathering of friends united in a common cause, but also gives an opportunity to the members of the Assembly, which we trust will not be neglected, of adding encouragement and strength to a country congregation, which from the nature of its position cannot often enjoy such stimulus.

LITTLE Portland-street Chapel is to be re-opened on Saturday next, Oct. 6, after renovation, which has greatly improved the interior. The roof has been repaired and relayed, so as to admit much more light. The pews in the body of the chapel have been replaced by more commodious and comfortable seats, the interior has been re-decorated, and electric light has been introduced. The cost of these and other necessary repairs has amounted to £950, and there remains still about £100 to be raised. Particulars as to the re-opening services are advertised in another column. Little Portland-street Chapel, which is now the only representative of our liberal faith in Central London must always hold a special place in our regard as the scene of Dr. Martineau's fifteen years' ministry, and we could earnestly wish not only that the social and religious work of the Portland Sunday-school and Institute might prosper more abundantly than ever, but that the chapel itself might once more be filled by such a congregation as formerly worshipped there.

WE must add our congratulations to those of many friends to Dr. Blake Odgers, on the appointment which was reported last week in the following terms :—

The Queen has been pleased, on the recommendation of the Home Secretary, to appoint Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., lately Recorder of Winchester, to be Recorder of Plymouth, in the place of Mr. Henry Edward Duke, Q.C., resigned.

Dr. Odgers must have special satisfaction in going to Plymouth, as it is his birthplace, his father, the Rev. W. J. Odgers, having been minister there from 1832 until 1853.

THE Church Congress was opened at Newcastle on Tuesday, with a morning service in the Cathedral, at which the Archbishop of York was the preacher, and in the afternoon the Bishop of Newcastle delivered the presidential address. The last meeting of the Congress, held at Newcastle was in 1881, before the new bishopric had been established, and Dr. Lightfoot, as Bishop of Durham, presided. This fact, as well as the close of the century gave the President the occasion for some interesting reminiscences in tracing the progress of Church work. Speaking of the relation of the Kingdom of God to the ethics of the nation, Dr. Jacob said :—

The revival of the Church in the course of this century has had at least these two marked features: one, a recognition that religion cannot be severed from life, but must consecrate and permeate every department of life; and the other a recognition that religion is not simply a personal matter between man and God, but that our Lord came to found a society, a kingdom, upon earth, and that the Church, as the Divine Society, is bound socially to affect all other forms of society, so that all departments of social life should bear in some way the impress of the great society of which our Lord himself is the head. It has taken centuries to work these principles out, and they are still imperfectly understood. But men grasp them, and the best men try to give them expression. The despair of reconciling religion with life led to the monasticism of the early Middle Ages. The failure to realise the social character of the Church led to an enormous loss of power in meeting the natural selfishness of man. Even an enlightened individualism is powerless against the organised forces that are marshalled against it. Gradually men are learning the truth that not only must religion consecrate life, but the Church, as an organised body, must meet and mould the social forces amid which she is surrounded, and which will infallibly lower her own standard if they be not transfigured and transformed by the truth which she embodies, and the presence that she enshrines.

The address afterwards touched upon the chief topics to be discussed by the Congress, the attitude of the Church to the Bible, the Reformation, and the self-government of the Church, and concluded with an earnest confession of faith in the spiritual foundation and guidance of the Church.

MR. H. R. FOX BOURNE, Secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society, in view of the General Election has addressed a letter to the papers calling attention to the responsibility of the Government and Parliament for the just treatment of the native races in South Africa and in other countries under British rule. With regard to South Africa he writes :—

On Oct. 17 last the Prime Minister, in the House of Lords, promised that, as a result of the South African war now nearing its conclusion, "due precaution will be taken for the philanthropic and kindly and improving treatment of those countless indigenous races of whose destiny," as he said, "I fear we have been too neglectful." Two days later, in the House of Commons, the Colonial Secretary stated, as one reason for the war, that "the treatment of the natives of the Transvaal has been disgraceful; it has been brutal; it has been unworthy of a civilised Power." In so far as those allegations are true, the Government is now in a position to mend matters, but it can only do so by methods different from those already pursued by some British subjects and others in Rhodesia and at Kimberley, as well as, so far as the Boers allowed, in the Johannesburg district. If the evils complained of by Mr. Chamberlain are to be put an end to, if Lord Salisbury's promise is to be kept, much better treatment than they have thus far obtained must be accorded to South African natives under British no less than under Boer control. A great deal can be done towards securing the necessary reform if, in the several constituencies, electors who favour it will press the point on the candidates who ask for their votes.

South Africa, however, is only one of the quarters in which the native question arises. "In assuming control over the Eastern Sudan, as manager of Egyptian affairs, Great Britain is still in the initial stage of a huge enterprise already offering complications enough, not merely around Khartum, but also in Uganda and in our East African and Zanzibar Protectorates. As huge and threatening is the enterprise on the other side of the Black Continent, where Ashanti expeditions and Sierra Leone disturbances are but incidents in the policy of British expansion on which General Lugard and others are employed.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

In these Sudanese, Nigerian and adjacent operations the fate of at least ten times as many natives is involved as in the Transvaal settlement." A Committee of the House of Commons reported in 1837 that "the oppression of the natives of barbarous countries is a practice which has not even the poor excuse that it contributes to the interest of the State," but that "on the contrary, it is a short-sighted and disastrous policy; as far as it has prevailed, it has been a burden to the Empire: it has thrown impediments in the way of successful colonisation: it has engendered wars in which great expenses were necessarily incurred and no reputation could be won: and it has banished from our confines or exterminated the natives who might have been profitable workmen, good customers, and good neighbours." On this, Mr. Fox Bourne says:—

In the past half century there have been great changes in British colonial policy and some improvements in the treatment of native races; but the area of "exploitation" has enormously increased, and abuses are now more plentiful than ever. Drastic reforms are urgently needed, and, to ensure their being adequate and of the right sort, there is occasion for authoritative inquiry at least as searching as that which was made by the Select Committee of the House of Commons between 1835 and 1837. Such an inquiry, either by a Parliamentary Committee or by a Royal Commission, will be asked for as soon as possible after the new House of Commons gets to work.

THE first congress of the Ruskin Union was held on Saturday, Sept. 22, at Sheffield. The object of the Union is "to promote the study of the works of John Ruskin, recognising them, without indiscriminate approval, as the outcome of a genius at once profound, sympathetic, and generous, and nobly used for the benefit of mankind." The Union seeks to carry out this object by uniting together the existing Ruskin societies, by the publication of a journal, the promotion of reading circles, and the holding of meetings and lectures, by advising members as to courses of reading, and by the holding of an annual congress. The Union has already a membership of about 220. Lord Windsor gave an address as president, in the course of which he said that while he did not consider Ruskin infallible as a teacher either in art or economics, he had taught them the great lesson of sincerity and truth in daily life and work, in which art was an essential element to lead to higher moral life. On a subsequent suggestion of a sixpenny edition of "Unto this Last," Mr. George Allen said that the eighteenpenny edition was selling very well. "Until this Last" was now in its 34th thousand and was selling at the rate of 5,000 a year. In the evening a lecture on "The Social Economics of Ruskin" was given by Mr. J. A. Hobson.

GOOD for us, if we can, to set ourselves in imagination in the place of the heroes or saints of other days; not so good, if we try by a literal imitation to transplant them into our own days. The one loyal tribute is to act, not as they acted, but as we believe they would act under our altered circumstances. It is only as thus used that examples can yield up the whole of their vast influence.—Professor J. Mac Cunn.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JESUS AND THE PROPHETS.

SIR,—I am troubled to find that by an accident of memory I made a false reference in my article last week. I speak of Jesus in the Temple as quoting from Jeremiah—which he did—but not in the passage I cited. The original discourse was doubtless longer than the fragment preserved to us in Mark xi. 17; but here we have two quotations, the first from Isaiah lvi. 7, ". . . for my house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples," and the second from Jeremiah vii. 11, "Is this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes?" I purposely omitted the last reference in my cursory description, as it was not quite so significant as showing Jesus' conception that the religion of Israel was both spiritual and universal—the point I wished to emphasise. But if we compare the passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah, it is interesting how much more closely the whole occasion is paralleled by the passage in Jeremiah than that in Isaiah. The passage in Isaiah is a declaration of Yahweh, that gentiles who observe the law and make sacrifice shall be accepted together with Israelites. If Jesus meant the quotation in this sense there was nothing in it to offend the priests and scribes, for gentiles who observed the law and made sacrifice were already allowed a place among the chosen people.

It is more likely, if Jesus thought of the passage as more than an isolated phrase, he was thinking of the first verse of the chapter: "Thus saith Yahweh, Keep ye judgment, and do righteousness: for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed"; a passage which bears a strong resemblance to Jesus' early preaching, Mark i. 15.

But far more striking is the passage in Jeremiah as a likely precedent for Jesus' bold defiance of the priestly and governing classes of Jerusalem: "The word that came to Jeremiah from Yahweh, saying, Stand in the gate of Yahweh's house, and proclaim there this word. . . . Amend your ways and your doings . . . trust ye not in lying words, saying, 'The Temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are these' . . . 'Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely . . . and come and stand before me in this house, which is called by my name, and say, 'We are delivered'; that ye may do all these abominations? Is this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes?" Jeremiah vii. 1 ff.

BOOKS FOR S.S. TEACHERS.

SIR,—Will you kindly make known through THE INQUIRER to the applicants for our little stock of books suitable for Sunday-schools and teachers, that my sisters and I find ourselves quite unable to gratify them all; we have had about 110 applications, often forty or fifty for the same books. Being just now in the turmoil of removal, we must postpone distributing the rest of our little stock till that is over, and we will then do our best to send our books where they will be most useful. We only wish we had enough to send to all who ask for them; and if some applicants receive no reply, it will not be from any neglect or want of sympathy, but only because it is impossible to gratify them all.

MR. HARGROVE'S UNITARIANISM.

SIR,—It has been impossible to read and read again the Rev. Charles Hargrove's pleasant impressions of his visit to America, without feeling in some appreciable danger of being infected with his Unitarianismatism.

He might, indeed, scarcely escape his conclusions, when he passed over from the muddled consistencies and muddled inconsistencies of our present conditions here, to the warm welcome, the eager enthusiasm, the splendid activities, and the fervent eloquence of our brethren over sea; but there was no call on him to declare the fact of his Unitarian opinion or his ministrations under such a flag.

Nobody thought of testing him for such a declaration, or desired to commit him to avowal of any such segregation from other Christianity.

His affectionate appreciation of associations so united, so devoted, so efficient, was to be expected from one so sympathetic, so devoted, so efficient as he is, and he seems most correctly to distinguish between such service as all theirs essentially is—and its denotation by a dogmatic name of a dead, or at least dying, merely doctrinal controversy.

It is true that our fathers in the faith found in their emancipation from the unspiritual fictions of Alexandria (of all places in the world), and the dogmatic infallibilities of churches based upon such heathen, so-called, orthodoxies a veritable release into the brotherhood of Jesus; and in their realisation of simpler Truth learned, personally and directly, to trust one God and one Father, without any believing in forms of obsolete phraseologies of dead men.

To many faithful souls the temple of Unitarianism is assuredly the House of God, but that Image is one that must be cast out and broken down. No soul amongst us will be saved by his Unitarianism, nor even by his Christianity, if it means crying Lord, Lord. Our gate is strait, and our path narrow. How are we poor laymen to face it and keep to it, if our shepherds will go piping along pleasanter roads of popular appeals and associations and rival bands?

I cannot but entreat one whom I know and respect as I do Mr. Hargrove, to watch the Father pruning every branch that beareth fruit, and purging it that it may bring forth more fruit.

Is it not enough to say that Unitarianism does not mean what only it really does mean; but something else; which it is more convenient to say it means, and which in truth it does not mean at all.

Theologically I am a Unitarian, no doubt, but I would fain be something better religiously.

So far as the American condition subsists as Mr. Hargrove reports of it, it seems to me that that condition rests upon the great association for practical work, from which our friends know of the docrine whether it is of God. There is a sort of association for talking about things, which is by no means the same thing!

R. D. DARBISHIRE.

CHANNING AN APOSTLE OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

BY WILLIAM CHANNING GANNETT.*

I.

THERE is certainly something in the genius of Calvinism that makes for liberty, for religious as well as political liberty. Its central dogma is a literal apotheosis of despotism. Yet three times has Calvinism, flowing in Teuton blood, won splendid victories for democracy,—in Holland, in England, in New England; and in the field of religion there is Geneva, and here is Boston. If Channing and his thought had been a solitary apparition in New England history, even then the question would rise, Was he in any way the flowering of Puritanism? But he was plainly but one of a company, as more than a hundred "First Churches" of Eastern Massachusetts, the very homesteads and seats of New England Puritanism, were more than ready to follow his lead. As he became leader partly because two other men who might have shared leadership with him, Buckminster and Thacher, died young, it is plain that that which took the name "Unitarian" here in the early part of this century must have been in some way the flowering of Puritanism. Given Calvinism under Congregational conditions,—under other conditions the movement is the same, but much slower,—given such Calvinism grimly and winningly battling with the wilderness in the seventeenth century, given this Calvinism illumined by the logic, yet spiritualised somewhat by the ethical passion, of Edwards and his followers,—tempted, "Arminianised," by the example of political independence, rationalised and humanised somewhat by the intellectual culture radiating from Harvard,—given this during the eighteenth century, and the result was foredoomed,—"Unitarianism," not by revolt, but by normal development, early in the nineteenth. But if the connection be doubted, to-day's New Orthodoxy, a far wider illustration of a similar sequence of facts, authenticates it. For to-day's New Orthodoxy is a belated Unitarianism. Largely in doctrines, completely in spirit, in principles, in characteristic emphases and tendencies, it is "Unitarianism with the copyright run out," as someone has named it. Each new book that appears in its name has been a fresh surprise of familiarity and generous concession, until surprise has become expectation. But this New Orthodoxy expressly calls itself the "New Puritanism." It is right. It is Calvinism flowering again under influences of culture and freedom similar to, but vastly more potent than, those which opened the blossoms on that early bough three generations ago. The name of the blossom is nothing; and, if by misfortune that premature Mayflowering of ours got a name for the time which alienates it from the life of the tree, it had better be sooner or later abandoned and forgotten. But the blossom-fact, and the influences that produce it, are everything; and under nineteenth, still more under twentieth-century conditions of freedom and culture, Calvinism is God-doomed, predestinated and elected to become in spirit and principles, and largely in doctrines, that which through this century has been known as the "Unitarian heresy." Not now, but before the twenty-first century dawns, there will be no end of satisfaction and joy in that fore-ordination accomplished. But note, as we pass, that this very figure of the early-blossoming bough precludes two thoughts. The foolish assumption that the bough is the cause of the tree-glory coming, of which it so truly is herald; and that other delusion, if anyone holds it, that the premature "Unitarian" blossom was, or is, as full in its petals, as fair in its tint, as the "Orthodox" blossoms will be when the whole tree is covered with bloom, in which the bough shall be happily lost.

Strange as it seems, then, there is evident connection by way of normal development between Puritanism and Unitarianism. That connection can even be traced and accounted for. Calvinism's mighty assertion of the sovereignty of God, by levelling everything like inequality among the souls subject to Him, by pulverising lordship and caste in religion, prepared broad fields for the springing of spiritual liberty between man and man, whenever milder skies should be regnant and the sowers appear. In Calvinism, it followed, the Infinite Sovereign of the Universe dealt directly and personally with individuals. He creates me, regenerates me, elects me, damns me, in all probability; but He recognises and specialises me in it all. Calvinism thus becomes a mighty assertion, also, of the importance and worth of the individual soul; and again we can see where Channing and Unitarianism are forming in embryo. Under Calvinism, once more, whatever we have to think of the character of its God, yet the engrossment of mind is with the skies, is with very God. The Infinite is the Calvinist's vocation and avocation. Whatever stands for the Ideal and the Eternal, in contrast with the Temporal, is his household thought and his business. Now let ideals of humanity ripen in men —that same engrossment remaining—and the result would naturally be emphasis on the Moral Perfection, the Goodness of God, as sublime as the emphasis on His Sovereignty had formerly been. This is exactly what happened three generations ago in those old Puritan homes of Massachusetts, and what is now happening again on a larger scale out in the Orthodox world. And such recognition of moral perfection in God would inevitably modify the rest of theology. For instance, in ethics the Puritan sense of sin would easily become a yearning for sinlessness, for the imitation of God. This also happened, and is happening. So for a third and a fourth time we see the foreshadows of Channing, of Unitarianism, of the New Orthodoxy. I repeat, it is all one efflorescence. In these days we can largely explain what seems such anomaly—the whole efflorescence of liberal religion on the root and stem of New England Puritanism.

Calvin as well as Servetus, John Endicott as well as John Robinson and Roger Williams, Jonathan Edwards and Hopkins even more than Gay and Chauncy and Mayhew, were spiritual ancestors of Channing and Emerson. Thank God for the Puritanism—in our forefathers!

All this is not prelude: it is part of the piece. For the subject entrusted to me is Channing and his influence on the religious life of America; and his spiritual ancestry and collateral kinship have a great deal to do with any influence he has had or will have. It makes that influence natural, inevitable, and likely to widen.

Channing an Apostle of the Spiritual Life is the aspect in which I present him, not choosing this aspect as one out of several possible, but accepting it as the only aspect he has. He was not a many-sided man. The spiritual life was at once his centre and his circumference. He was almost as much cloistered within his "Imitation of God" as his kinsman, born just four centuries behind him, was in his "Imitation of Christ." By spiritual life—who can define it?—I mean life with the Ideal, in the Ideal, from the Ideal; life with a sense of the Infinite in the finite, of the Eternal in time, of God in the soul—the "Emmanuel" sense. Many have much of this sense, and we "know by the look in their eyes that their eyes are looking on God." Channing had it in a very rare degree, as his eyes and his life and the "look" in every word he has written testify. I wonder if most of you who are listening do not know Channing by tradition rather than by acquaintance. Two of the noblest spiritual autobiographies in our language are those of Channing and Emerson; in each case a "memoir," but so edited that the man reveals himself by diary, letter, and extract from sermon or address far more unconsciously than is possible in any formal autobiography. They are both of them books of the Inner Life: the drama is all of the soul. It is an exhilarating and exalting experience to give a slow month or three months to the nephew's memoir of Channing or to Cabot's of Emerson. May I speak of myself, for I am only too typical of a common neglect? One of my summers, well on in mid-life, was spent in discovering Channing. Son of his colleague, christened by Channing, brought up in the atmosphere of his ideas, no name more familiar, I thought I "knew" Channing, and had no need to read him; became Unitarian minister, and still never much read him, until his centenary birthday approached. Then, to prepare a Sunday-school manual about him, I read thoroughly. The days and the nights were spent by the side of a lake in the prairies, but I was on hill-tops all summer. I felt I had found a new friend-in-God, one to endure, reverend for ever. If typical in my self-neglect and ignorance, may I be typical, also, in the surprise and delight!

"An Apostle of the Spiritual Life." A certain day in a college year, and the hour and the place and the very tree under which the experience occurred, the very chapter of the book that kindled the experience, Channing remembered all his life as the day, hour, tree, book, of his "new birth," when a glowing vision of the majesty of rectitude and the beauty of holiness broke on his soul. And, if the Charles were his Jordan, its meadow willows the palms of his baptism and his vision of opening heavens, Richmond in the South was the scene of his wilderness struggle, lonely, ascetic, self-searching, intense. He came back from that struggle and stress invalided for life. Jesus half hinted, half hid, the story of his desert days in a kind of parable: Channing's final act of soul surrender was so closeted with God that his biographer reverently says he must leave it untold on the diary page.

From his own grateful tributes we learn who were the minor Isaiahs and Micahs to shape his growing ideals: Hutcheson, who opened to his mind the ranges of self-abandoning love; Ferguson, who awoke his enthusiasm for social progress; Price, who "saved me from Locke's philosophy," and gave in its place the doctrine of "ideas"; Butler, with his rounded view of human nature; Law, with his mystic piety and yearning for spiritual perfection; Edwards himself, the white light of his soul often outshining the lurid glare of his thought; and rugged, lofty Hopkins, at one time the family pastor in Newport. These were the spiritual guides of his preparation for life-work.

Once come to Federal-street, the young preacher soon began to reveal himself, and continuously. He has often described his conception of the minister's office: "There is one great office in life, that of the soul-quickener." "No man is fitted to preach or promote Christianity who is not fitted to die for it." "A fellow-worker with the reformers, martyrs, prophets, Christ, angels, God." "Your work is to preach the Perfect"; and, to do that, "Be what you preach." The "charge" at Dwight's ordination is a preacher's cabinet of golden words, which ministers would do well to read through once every year. As is not uncommon, this young soul-quickener in his very first written sermon touched the keynote of all his sermons, because the key-note of his life. It was this: "We glorify God when by imitation we display His character. The good man manifests the beauty of God." He preached the sermon in the Medford church; and after it wise Dr. Osgood, its minister, told his daughter, "That young man will one day be the greatest preacher in these States." In Boston, within six years, the little society had to build a large new meeting-house. What was the charm? No anecdotes, no quotations, no pictures in words, no illustrations even, made the sermons attractive. They were sermons in one colour—sermons from the soul, of the soul, to the soul; sermons of "the Perfect Life," "the Life of God in the soul of man." Such, at least, were the sermons written and published later; and probably the main difference between the earlier and later ones was that the early were distinctly more orthodox. In 1808 he could speak of "our guilty parents after their fall," "the Son of God leaving abodes of joy, and expiring a victim on the cross," "immortal beings advancing to the brink of an abyss from which they are never to rise." Doctrine like this secured welcome, perhaps; but it was far too familiar to account for the listening at Federal-street. That "key-note," pervading, tells better the secret, and the speaker himself still more. It was the man in the sermons that filled them with illustration and charm—the sweet, bright seriousness of the face, the wide, clear brow, the eyes already yearning, the vibrant, cleaving, shading voice—"that wonderful voice, thrilling one as if it issued from the inmost deep of the spirit," as Furness reports it. He had but one gesture, but his intonations were gestures. To this add the growing knowledge of Boston, at that time a town of thirty thousand inhabitants, that the young preacher was what he preached. He preached holiness, and he was holy. Men and women, even children, would tell in after-life of the one sermon, the one prayer, the hymns and the passage of Scripture read, even the pronunciation of single words, which they had heard from Channing's lips in the pulpit.

THE CHURCH OF THE SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY.*

"When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth."—John xvi. 13.

I.

One of the most striking characteristics of Christian theology is the subordinate place which has been, as a rule, assigned to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The Trinitarian formula, which has for many centuries represented the faith of the vast majority of the Christian Church, announces the relationship of three equal and separate manifestations of the Godhead, to each of which the devotion of Christians may with equal fitness turn. In the practical piety, however, of great numbers of believers the thought of the divine Fatherhood and the recognition of the work of the Spirit have been in large degree dominated by the peculiar power and persuasiveness of the doctrine of the Son. It is not surprising that the person of Jesus should have had this peculiar homage. Out of the vastness of the methods of the Father, out of the vagueness of the work of the Spirit, stands this human figure, with the affections, friendships, trials, and tears of human life, tempted as we are, yet without sin; and many a life that has seemed to itself a stranger among the great designs of the providence of God or the mysterious workings of the Holy Spirit has felt itself at home in the companionship of the self-sacrificing and suffering Jesus. On this natural desire of the human heart for the sympathy of God many theologians have seized, and have taught a Christo-centric faith, in which the search for God shall be satisfied in the person of Christ. Without entering into any discussion of the validity of the Trinitarian formula, it is obvious that this exclusive emphasis upon one of its factors is but a partial utilisation of its scope and significance. It is, in fact, a kind of Christological Unitarianism. The features of the Father are hidden behind the mighty processes of creation and evolution; the witness of the Spirit remains undetached as a distinct personality from the influence of the Father and of the Son; and there is left amid the shifting complexity of theological conceptions the single convincing revelation of the Word made flesh, full of its unmistakable grace and truth. Back, then, to Jesus the heart of simple piety turns; and the theologian meets this Christo-centric emotion with his doctrine of an immanent, eternal, present Christ. "My faith in God," said such a man, "and even my faith in the goodness of the world, are the product of my loyalty to Jesus Christ." And the same note of spiritual stability is struck by the great poet of Christian theology:—

The very God! think, Abib; dost thou think?
So, the all-great were the all-loving, too,—
So, through the thunder comes a human voice,
Saying, "O heart I made, a heart beats here!"

* The first part of a Sermon preached on occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, at Boston, May, 1900.

Yet in the teaching of Jesus himself nothing is more conspicuous than his emphasis on the mission of the Holy Spirit. Standing at the end of his own ministry, Jesus distinctly announces that his work is partial and preparatory, and that the truth to which he testifies is to be a progressive revelation. "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." "When the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." To his followers this thought of a progressive revelation seemed simply paralysing. They had believed that he would himself guide them into all truth, and they were bewildered at his declaration that there were many things necessarily undisclosed by him. "Lord, we know not whither thou goest," says Thomas; "Whither goest thou?" asks Peter; "Show us the Father," is the still more elementary demand of Philip; until at last the thought of the unfinished revelation sweeps over them with such a wave of discouragement that they do not even ask, "Whither goest thou?" because "sorrow has filled their hearts." In Jesus, on the other hand, there appears no such sense of prematureness in departure or incompleteness in work. The end of his ministry has come just where it should. "It is expedient for you," he says, "that I go away." He finds tranquillity and strength in the assurance that his own work is to be taken up into the greater unity of the purposes of God, and to receive its interpretation, not alone through that which it has given, but through that for which it has prepared the way. "Greater works than these shall ye do, because I go to my Father." "The Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me." Beyond his own teaching, beyond his own life, Jesus discerns the movement of history guided by the Spirit of the truth; and, having touched his friends with a susceptibility to that Spirit of truth, he trusts them with the most splendid confidence to the progressive revelation. How majestic in its self-effacement is his thought of the world! Onward and ever onward is to move the life of man, into disclosures of the life of God which even Jesus himself was not permitted to unfold. From the Father and the Son, as the creeds with profound truthfulness repeat, is to proceed the Spirit of the truth; and through that procession of the Holy Ghost the life of God is to reveal itself from age to age.

Nor bounds, nor clime, nor creed thou know'st:
Wide as our needs, thy favors fall.
The white wings of the Holy Ghost
Stoop, seen or unseen, o'er the heads of all.

How meagre and arid would seem to Jesus a scholastic discussion concerning the personality of the Holy Spirit, when he was praying that the personality of his friends might be made holy by that Spirit! It is the witness of the life of God in the soul of man. It is the immanent deity, the progressive revelation, the undeparting and undiminished inspiration, the Spirit of the truth. With a sublime and tranquil faith Jesus delivers his friends to the guidance of this Spirit, and departs from them with the sense that his mission is complete when he has committed them to the direction of the Spirit of the truth.

Such is the teaching of Jesus; and through the whole course of Christian history, while many souls have found their sufficient satisfaction in the doctrine of the Son, there have been many natures in all communions which have received with peculiar reverence this witness of the mission of the Spirit. Such souls create an apostolic succession of the Holy Ghost. They have felt the touch of God upon His world and upon themselves. They have rested in the strength of the Everlasting Arms. They have listened to the harmonies and pathos of human experience. They have committed themselves to the Spirit of the truth, and have been led by it wherever it will; and then, as they turn back to Jesus, they have seen that in this attitude of spiritual alertness and responsiveness his life also was sustained, and that the Spirit of the truth proceeds not from the Father only, but from the influence and teaching of the Son.

Who are these interpreters of the mission of the Spirit? They are the devout souls in every age who have found God and rested in him—the idealists with their philosophy, the transcendentalists with their vision, the poets, the seers, the mystics of the Universal Church. A strange and varied fellowship they make of many races, traditions, and creeds, held in the unity of the Spirit of the truth, witnesses of the life of God in the souls of men. They utter themselves in a unison of language which is neither ancient nor modern, but timeless, universal, one. Across the centuries speaks the Jew Philo: "God has breathed into man from heaven a portion of his own divinity." "The soul of man is an indivisible portion of that divine and blessed Spirit"; and with this word of Hebrew wisdom is heard the prologue of the Fourth Gospel, "The life was the light of men." A century passes, and Plotinus bears witness, "The wise man recognises the idea of the good within him: this he develops by the withdrawal into the holy place of his own soul." Other centuries pass, and Bernard of Clairvaux, preacher, administrator, and saint, gives testimony: "It is in the Spirit that union with God occurs." "The word is not one of sound, but of penetration; not talkative, but effective; not dinning the ears, but persuading the affections." Still other centuries pass, and the Dominican Tauler preaches: "When the mind is rightly directed, it tendeth toward this ground whose image is far beyond its power." "This revelation must take place in the Spirit; for God is a Spirit, and our created spirits must be united to and lost in the Uncreated." So through the ages is renewed this serene message. "Madam," says the holy Franciscan to Mme. Guyon, "you are disappointed and perplexed because you seek without what you have within. Accustom yourself to seek God in your heart, and you will find him"; and the pupil soon testifies, "The soul passing out of itself, by dying to itself necessarily passes into its divine object." "My own experience seemed to me a verification of this." German theology begins its modern period with the declaration of Schleiermacher, that the Christian consciousness is the test of Christian truth, and that the sense of dependence upon God supplants all need of proof of the being of God; and German criticism recalls the saying of Richard Rothe, that "next to the Bible as a help to the religious life stand the writings of the mystics." Even across the broad and shadowless region of English thought, with its philosophy of utility and its theology of an Establishment, there strike at times these softer shadows of the witness of the Spirit, like soft clouds that fleck a treeless field. "Great things," writes George Fox, "did the Lord lead me into, and wonderful paths were opened unto me." "As people come into subjection to the Spirit of God, they receive the word of wisdom that opens all things, and come to know the hidden unity in the Eternal Being." Finally, the same strain of this tranquil music of the soul is heard amid the noise of commercialism in the New World, and is greeted with a peculiar responsiveness. How many souls in how many religious communions have been supported by Emerson's confident words! "Within man is the soul of the holy, the wise silence, the universal beauty, the eternal one." How many have sung to themselves the confession of Jones Very!

In finding thee are all things round us found,
In losing thee are all things lost beside.

How many have greeted with gratitude the words of Phillips Brooks! "It is a blessed thing that in all times there have always been men to whom religion has not presented itself as a system of doctrine, but as an elemental life in which the soul of man came into very direct and close communion with the soul of God." "It is the mystics of every age who have done most to blend the love of truth and the love of man within the love of God, and so to keep alive or restore a healthy tolerance."

Thus, if we may give to the theological phrase a new significance, we may trace the long procession of the Holy Ghost, winding through the paths of Christian history, separated a little from the main body of believers, distrusted often for indifference to theological or ecclesiastical details, yet transmitting through the ages the apostolic succession of the spiritual life, testifying to the inner light, which is the life of God, undisturbed among transitions of theology or conflicts of sects, confident and forward-looking among the mysteries of life, because recalling the Master's promise that the Spirit of the truth will lead them into all truth. And never was this witness of the Spirit so broadly manifested as to-day. In all branches of the Christian Church a new confidence appears in the living God, the immanent Christ, the Christian consciousness, the significance of the soul. As long ago as the twelfth century an Italian mystic, whom Dante places in his Paradise with Saint Anselm and with Hugo of Saint Victor, conceived that the movement of history was to unfold itself into three great periods, the first revealing the character of the Father, the second teaching the gospel of the Son, the third imparting the mission of the Spirit, and that these periods were to succeed each other as the spring succeeds the winter, and the summer succeeds the spring, or as the dawn follows the night and the day follows the dawn. We need not enter into these vast speculations of universal history to find a place for the Spirit of the truth; but this, at least, we may perhaps believe, that as a new century summons the religious life to a new examination of its creed and conduct, it will be discerned that never before was that creed so simple, so self-evidencing, or so sincere. It may be that the church of the twentieth century is to be the church of the Spirit, and that the text of its preaching is to be the Master's word: "When the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth."

LITERATURE.

THE WORLD'S EPOCH-MAKERS.*

THE number of really good titles for a comprehensive series of the biographies of great men is not so abundant that we need seriously quarrel with that chosen by Messrs. T. and T. Clark for their new series, which is appearing under the general editorship of Mr. Oliphant Smeaton, but the volume on Cranmer, which was the first to be issued, rightly begins with an acknowledgment that he cannot in any sense be called an epoch-maker. In the announcement of the series it is explained that it is to comprise "biographical studies dealing with prominent epochs in theology, philosophy, and the history of intellectual development," and this takes the edge off the seemingly too ambitious claim of the general title. Thus while Buddha and Mahomet seem fitly ranked among the "world's epoch-makers" (of whom the greatest is perhaps inevitably omitted) and Augustine, Luther, and Calvin stand naturally among the first for their great influence in the Western world, even for Wesley so great a claim can hardly be made, although he undoubtedly made an epoch in the history of the English people, while Marcus Aurelius, though he gave the world a classic, made no epoch, and the same may be said of Savonarola, in spite of his magnificent protest against the corruptions of the Church and the world of his day. When we come to the Herschels in the realm of science, and to Newman in the realm of theology and the Church, it becomes still more apparent with what reservations the general title must be accepted.

When, however, we turn from the promise of the series as a whole to its fulfilment in the earliest volumes, we find at once abundant reason for satisfaction and for cordial congratulation of editor and publishers. The "Cranmer" and "Luther," especially, are admirable little books, and they have, what the "Wesley" has not, careful and somewhat elaborate chronological tables and an index.

Mr. Innes, writing on "Cranmer and the Reformation in England," has a thorough grasp of the subject. Neither the blind hero-worship of the ultra-Protestant nor the equally blind enmity of the Catholic, whether Roman or Anglican, distorts his picture of the man, and of the movements of the time. In the story of the Reformation in England, Cranmer stands out, not indeed as heroic, but as "a consistently prominent figure," who, "more than any other single individual, left his personal impress upon a national institution." He by no means stands to England as Luther to Germany, or Knox to Scotland; England had no such commanding leader in the Reformation, and if we were to look for the noblest and most truly heroic of her reformers we should find him probably in a much humbler man, William Tyndale, whom Mr. Innes just mentions, and to whose fearless and patient faithfulness and single-hearted devotion we owe so much of what is best in our English Bible. But Cranmer's influence was more apparent, and in Church politics he was called, quite against the bias of his nature, to play a very prominent part. He was largely instrumental in making the Church of England the compromise that it is, but his chief claim on the gratitude of his countrymen is in what he did for the reformed Prayer Book. Of this Mr. Innes writes:—"The noble language of the English Liturgy, as Cranmer shaped it, would be a sufficient monument for any man; to him in chief is due the marvellous charm of its cadences." And again: "For the noble language of the English rendering which has made the Prayer Book a masterpiece of literature, Cranmer himself is known to be mainly responsible; and for this, at least, he is entitled to ungrudging praise."

The first three chapters of Mr. Innes' book are a prologue, giving in a masterly way the larger historical setting of the English story. The unrest of Europe at the close of the fifteenth century is pictured, the influence of the New Learning, the dire need of moral reform; then follows an account of the Scholars' Movement in this country, the work of Colet, More and Erasmus, and the "intelligent moral amendment" at which they aimed, without any thought of breach with Rome. But this outlook of reformation "to be effected by sweetness and light" was shattered by the revolt of Luther in Germany and the very different revolt of King Henry in England. What Mr. Innes says of Luther's revolt may be quoted here as a good example of the quality of his book:—

For good or evil, on Dec. 10, 1520, when Luther burned the Pope's Bull condemning him, he kindled the torch of Revolution. When the Monk of Wittenberg took up the challenge of the Head of the Christian World, the appeal was no longer made to the wise, the learned, and the great ones of the earth, but to the heart of the people. The Reformation for Erasmus would have been an affair of adaptations, compromises, recognising that there was much to be said on both sides, much that was better left alone. For Luther, it was a warfare of truth against lies, with no unresolvable half-truths. With Erasmus, it was a question what men should be taught to believe; with Luther, it was what they should be moved to feel. Luther's theology was not the vital part of him; Lutheranism was not the vital product; Rome, Geneva, and Oxford have influenced the structure and interpretation of creeds and formularies not less than Wittenberg; but the passionate ardour for reality in things spiritual, the personal responsibility for upholding truth, the enthusiasm of conscience, which translated the Reformation from an external official revision into an inward regenerating force—these the modern world owes to Martin Luther more than to any other man. When the Anglican Church left Roman doctrine it borrowed more from Calvin or Zwingli than from Luther; the Huguenots of France, the Presbyterians of Scotland, the Puritans of England derived their theology from the same school; but it was Luther who sounded the call to arms, Luther who first grappled with the foe and was not overthrown, Luther who gave revolt the justification of success, Luther who proclaimed the fundamental rule, that he must hold to the truth as he conceived it, though all men should be against him.

With the fourth chapter on "A Tender Conscience" begins the more detailed account of the English Reformation, springing, in its outward progress, out of Henry VIII.'s marriage difficulties and personal desires. Mr. Innes shows very clearly how Henry was the actual ruler and how instantly even such a man as Thomas Cromwell was destroyed by a false step, bringing him into conflict with the King's wishes. Cranmer's early life, as a quiet Cambridge scholar and friend of the New Learning, is very briefly sketched up to the time when an opinion on the burning question of the hour, expressed in conversation with a friend, brought him under the King's notice.

No monarch has ever been endowed with a keener eye or a shrewder judgment in discovering the instruments most perfectly adapted to his requirements. The scholar was drawn from his cloister, plunged into the whirl of half-understood political intrigue, and forced to be a statesman when nature had intended him for a college don. Almost without warning he found laid on his shoulders the responsibility for steering the Church through the stormiest seas. From Henry's point of view, no better selection could have been made; but Cranmer himself must have felt many a time that there was a strong element of "cursed spite" in the case.

The narrative of what followed is told with great discernment into the character both of the King and of Cranmer, and in view of present-day controversies in the Church is strongly to be recommended to all who wish to understand what the Reformation really meant. It closes with the pitiful story of "the least of the martyrs," who perished in the fires of Mary's reign, after the temporary failure of his courage, and the last redeeming confession of his sin. "Thus died Thomas Cranmer, whose elegy sounds through the ages in the music of the English liturgy; highest of all the martyrs in station, accounted lowest of all in honour. For many that are first shall be last, and the last first." A final chapter of epilogue sketches the further progress of the Reformation under Elizabeth.

Two small slips we may note for correction in the next edition. On page 27 Mr. Innes speaks of the safe-conduct, in spite of which Huss was betrayed at Constance, as "papal" instead of "imperial." On page 95 he writes: "The favourite or the trusty counsellor of one day were the victims of the next."

Dr. Lindsay has given a refreshing quality to his study of "Luther and the German Reformation" by the illustrative matter he largely introduces drawn from contemporary records of the social life of the time. His account of Luther is vivid and picturesque and, so far as we have been able to judge, accurate and valuable. In the list of books consulted, however, while we find Peter Bayne's "Martin Luther" and the "Chronicles of the Schomberg-Cotta Family," it is somewhat surprising not to find Dr. Charles Beard's "Martin Luther" and Hibbert Lectures on the Reformation.

In his version of Luther's final words before the Diet of Worms, Dr. Lindsay uses an expression which has puzzled us. He makes Luther say, "I am bound by the Scriptures which I have quoted; my conscience is thirled to the Word of God." That, we suppose, is Scotch, for our English dictionary gives us no help. In Burns, thirled seems to mean thrilled; but in this place we can only conjecture what it means. Telling of the Peasants' War, Dr. Lindsay says: "They filled themselves drunk at nights with the wines they found in noble and ecclesiastical wine-cellars." That is the only other sentence we have felt at all inclined to amend in a book vigorously written and rich in interest.

Mr. Snell's "Wesley and Methodism" is also a very interesting book, though written in an unconventional manner, which is occasionally rather trying. It is plentifully illustrated from Wesley's Journal and other records of the time. The study of Wesley's conversion and of the hysterical phenomena connected with his preaching furnishes material for useful thought. Mr. Snell is by no means blind to Wesley's faults, but, he says, "Wesley was a glorious being."

His zeal was matchless; and he accomplished, by prodigies of mental and physical effort, a vast and necessary work. The physic may have been nasty—those fits, especially—but Methodism arrested national decay and infused new life into Christianity. In the political sphere, though Wesley's direct intervention was not happily conceived, it is in every way probable that the influence of that high Tory over the masses did much to prevent an English analogue to the French Revolution by absorbing into the ranks of Methodism those who would naturally have been its leaders. The emancipation of the slaves, and, after that, other emancipations, were the reflection and the fruit of that inward emancipation of which Wesley was the preacher. The Evangelical movement, and the Oxford movement, in the Church of England, were both founded on the principle that religion was something other, something higher, than an aspect of civil life. This principle, which in the eighteenth century had been fairly lost, Wesley and his companions were bold enough to reassert. For this all English-speaking men, irrespective of creed, have cause to be thankful.

Such is Mr. Snell's estimate of Wesley's influence; but when he seems to regard the emancipation of the slaves as due largely to the power of Methodist preaching, he surely has forgotten the part of the Society of Friends in that great movement. John Newton, even as an ardent evangelical, engaged without scruple in the slave-trade; while, on the other hand, there were members of the older Nonconformist bodies who were repelled by the "enthusiasm" of revivalist preachers, who yet were fearless champions of justice and freedom.

TO A CHILD.

You weep not with the older heart,
Although red leaves the pathway strew;
Our summers wearily depart,
But not for you.

You mourn not with the older mind,
Now autumn hours around us steal;
The greater glories left behind
You do not feel.

For round your feet God's blossoms grow,
Eternal flowers blessed by Him;
Oh! with us they abide, although
Our eyes are dim.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. J. G. SLATER.

Another faithful labourer is called away from the field. Only a fortnight before his death, on Sept. 23, Mr. Slater was preaching to his congregation at Pudsey, and he is surely to be accounted happy that he was permitted to be at work until the end, and then without painful lingering, to pass on to the higher life. A native of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. Slater was born December, 1839, and as a young man came under the influence of the Rev. James C. Street. Thus he was drawn to the work of the ministry and entered as a student of the Home Missionary Board in 1865. Three years later he undertook his first ministerial charge at Aberdeen. For seven years he was at Mossley, then at Middleton, from which in 1885 he removed to the Holbeck Church at Leeds. Since 1896 he had been at Pudsey. For some time Mr. Slater was active as secretary of the Manchester Missionary Conference.

It is a record such as is happily not uncommon in the community of our churches, a record of quiet faithfulness, which does not need to be set down in many words, but with thankfulness for the life now completed, and with sympathy for those on whom the inevitable sorrow must fall.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IDEALS.

It is as true to-day as it was hundreds of years ago that noble-minded men and women cannot rest contented with a merely animal life: they do not find full satisfaction in having food, shelter, and clothing: they need some ideal, some grand enthusiasm, some aim and object worthy of a whole-hearted devotion.

Most of the boys and girls who read the "Children's Column" have probably heard of the legends of Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. One of these called the Holy Grail (see Tennyson's Poems) tells of an ideal sought after by some of Arthur's knights; and of how, for most of them, the King thought it unattainable.

It was said that the Cup from which Jesus drank at the last sad Supper had been brought by Joseph of Arimathæa to Glastonbury, where for a time it stayed: if any man could touch or see it he "was heal'd at once by faith of all his ills." But then the times grew to such evil that the Holy Cup "was caught away to Heaven, and disappear'd." At length, however, to a maiden who gave herself up to "prayer and praise—to fast and alms" came once more the Holy Grail! "Down a long beam" it stole, "rose-red with beatings in it as if alive." She told to her brother Percivall her vision, and begged him to fast and pray, and to persuade his brother-knights to do so too, "that so perchance," said she, "the vision may be seen by thee and those, and all the world be heal'd." Many of Arthur's knights thereupon vowed that they would "ride a twelvemonth and a day" in quest of the Holy Cup, until they found and saw it, "as the nun had seen it." But Arthur, "the blameless King," when he heard of the vows which had been made, declared that for most of his knights these did but mean the following of "wandering fires"; for they were "men with strength and will to right the wrong'd": they had power to do great deeds, and yet were choosing rather to follow what for many would be but a fruitless quest.

Let us now see some of the other various ideals which have been pursued by men and women, and which have helped to purify and uplift not only themselves but also their fellow-men.

In the year 1758 there was born in Germany, to parents in humble circumstances, a boy—afterwards named Johann Heinrich von Dannecker. Through the favour of a wealthy patron the lad was fortunate enough to have the opportunity of a good education, including an excellent artistic training. Having proved his ability as a sculptor he was sent, for further study, to Paris, and thence to Rome, where he stayed five years, and executed some fine statues of classical deities, such as that of Ceres (the goddess of corn), and Bacchus (the god of wine). As years passed on, however, nobler thoughts and loftier conceptions of art—or, in other words, a higher artistic ideal—took possession of Dannecker: he had been thinking much of the Christian virtues as bodied forth in the life of Jesus, and it appeared to him that here was to be found a far worthier subject for artistic representation. The gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome were certainly conceived of as possessing marvellous physical beauty, and as fully able to delight and charm the eye; but in the character of Jesus—who pointed his brethren to God as their loving Father, who gathered little children about him, and blessed them; who spoke of the lilies and the birds, and taught men to love their enemies and who could yet thunder forth words of stern rebuke to hypocrites and deceivers of men—in the spiritual nature of this man were surely centred more godlike qualities than any classical deity could lay claim to. To worthily conceive, and fittingly represent the Christ, Dannecker found would require years of study and patient effort: these he cheerfully gave, and with a fine result. After having given to the world a grand conception of Christ in marble he was asked by Napoleon to produce a statue of Venus for the Louvre gallery: this, however, he refused to do. And why? Because having had, as it were, a vision of Jesus—having once felt what it was to embody in marble his highest ideal he could no more employ his art in what he regarded as a less worthy manner; "for," said he, "my art is henceforth a consecrated thing."

There may be many ideals other than those concerning art. Arthur Hugh Clough, the poet and scholar, who died only some twenty years ago, had, for instance, such a high ideal of Truth that—though to him and those he loved it meant loss—he, at the age of twenty-nine, gave up all thought of entering the Church of England, since he could not conscientiously sign the Thirty-nine Articles; he also resigned his Fellowship at Oriel College, Oxford. And so he has left a noble example to all who would follow Truth.

The ideals of the sculptor and of Clough are personal ones; in addition to these there may be ideals for society and the world at large. Some men have set before themselves, as worthy of a life's devotion, the desire to free their country from some great evil like slavery, or the love of strong drink; while others again have longed to remedy some political ill. Of the latter type was the noble Italian patriot, Joseph Mazzini, who rested not from his self-imposed task of rousing his countrymen to gain back their independence. Italy had been conquered by Austria, and Mazzini longed to see her once more free and governed by her own people. In order to carry out his cherished plans he was ready to endure much hardship, and even imprisonment and exile. His whole life was consecrated to the service of his country, and was "governed by the sacred idea of duty"; and this, for him, meant that he must be a lonely man, persecuted and a wanderer for the greater part of his life. Yet he remained faithful to his grand ideal of the unity of Italy, and of government by the people themselves. As the result of his labours his country at length threw off the foreign yolk; but she has never set herself to attain the whole of Mazzini's lofty hopes.

About the year 1833—five years after William Lloyd Garrison, of America, had conceived the ideal of freeing his land from the reproach of slave-owing—Lucy Crandall, a Quaker schoolmistress, began to see that it was altogether wrong to let the negro girls grow up without having any chance of education. She determined, therefore, to begin a school for young negresses; but, alas! the State of Connecticut, in which Miss Crandall lived, opposed the effort, and passed a law prohibiting coloured pupils from residing in such a school. Miss Crandall, who had already begun to carry out her plan, was then arrested, tried, and imprisoned. When she was again set free, as she still persisted in keeping up her school, the tradesmen refused to sell her food, her well was polluted, and her house set on fire. Yet did this heroic woman hold on her way, and, in five years, the new Act was repealed.

The great ideal of Jesus, as you know, was that of converting this "every-day" world of ours into the kingdom of God, or of Heaven: than this surely no ideal could be grander: it should be ours also. Therefore do we, like Jesus, pray "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as in Heaven." For a noble ideal it is often necessary to sacrifice much—it may be wealth or fame, time or money, health or even life itself; and a deep debt do we owe to those who have been equal to such surrender.

When you are old enough to know and love Alfred Tennyson's poetry, you must read his poem called "Merlin and the Gleam," in which is the line, "Up, and follow the Gleam." These words you can easily remember; and if you will think of each high ideal as a "gleam" sent to you by the good God, and determine ever to follow it, though it lead you to the loss of worldly advantages, and of the praise of your fellow-men, then surely you will have what will be worth more than all these—the blessing of the Most High shall be upon you. Alice A. Lucas.

The worst materialism is not the theory that goes by that name, but the living as if there were no meaning in life beyond the capricious pleasures of the moment; and the true belief in spiritual realities is found only in the one who affirms in every action the reality of the best things in human life.—The New Humanity.

THE ULTIMATE FOUNDATION.

WITH the end of summer comes the time when throughout the country faithful workers are setting themselves with steadfast purpose to concentrate their strength on fresh efforts in the service to which they are called. In many churches and in other unions for beneficent work, friends are drawing together again, with renewed consecration preparing to carry out well-matured plans, and with the happy sense of fellowship and mutual confidence.

At such a time one is specially thankful for words of strong faith and encouragement and of clear insight into the fundamental principles which must give direction to all fruitful effort, and the ideal which is the goal of our endeavours. We are glad, therefore, to be able this week to offer to the members of our churches the first part of Mr. GANNETT'S noble address on "Channing, an Apostle of the Spiritual Life," and also of Professor PEABODY'S sermon on "The Church of the Spirit." These are utterances not to be hastily glanced at, but to be read in quietness and pondered in the light of the duties to which our Free Churches are called. Work undertaken in the spirit with which they are instinct will lift our efforts out of all littleness and despondency, even in the humblest and most solitary place, and friends will be wise if they will take to heart the lessons here offered to us all.

The Bishop of NEWCASTLE, at the conclusion of his address as president of the Church Congress, directed his hearers to the same fundamental thought. The Church, he said, was born, when the Holy Spirit was given, and only by faith in that abiding presence could she have any true spiritual strength or any vital union. "We are bound to discuss principles and policies, organisation and methods, ethics and life, but we are conscious all the time that the real foundation of our work lies above, and that the temple will only rise with the true architecture and equipment as we copy 'the pattern in the Mount.'" It is true that we do not think of that Presence under the same form as the bishop, to whom "an Ascended Lord" is the quickening Spirit, but essentially we believe that it is the same truth we hold, and our churches, as all others, must live in the power of the one Eternal Spirit. This is the fundamental truth held with such clear conviction by the Society of Friends, from whom the whole Christian world has so much to learn. "In its light" (and here again we can adopt the bishop's words) "we can calmly face, and even welcome, the fullest criticism of the standard of our faith: we can survey the changes, epochs, and crises of our history; we can hold our ground as a spiritual organisation with a constitution that has been the growth of centuries, and that has yet nobler work to do for the nation and for the world." If only every Church would realise the full significance of such words as these, there would be less dogmatic bitterness, and far more humble dependence on the Truth, teaching inwardly. Then we should see the right relation between our doctrines and the growing life of a religious community, and our whole strength would be thrown into the work of the hour, in thankful dependence on the Ever-present Helper, who is the strength of all who trust in Him. Living in that Spirit, in perfect charity with our brethren of every race and creed, we should know, even while we see but as in a glass, darkly, how we are all being led, by different ways into the perfect light.

In his address on "Channing" Mr. GANNETT strongly advised ministers to read the charge delivered by that prophetic teacher at the ordination of the Rev. J. S. DWIGHT. As a reminder of what they will find there, and further incentive to the reading of the whole, we add here one or two passages from it :—

> Preach with zeal. But let it be a kindly zeal. Always speak in love. Let not earnestness be a cover for anger, or for a spirit of menace or dictation. Always speak as a brother. With the boldest, sternest, most scornful, most indignant reproofs of baseness and crime, let the spirit of humanity, of sorrowful concern be blended. In too much of the zeal of the pulpit there is a hardness, unfeelingness, inhumanity, more intolerable to a good mind than sleepy dulness or icy indifference.
> I have said, preach plainly and preach earnestly; I now say, preach with moral courage. Fear no man, high or low, rich or poor, taught or untaught. Honour all men; love all men; but fear none. Speak what you account great truths frankly, strongly, boldly. Do not spoil them of life to avoid offence. Do not seek to propitiate passion and prejudice by compromise and concession. Beware of the sophistry which reconciles the conscience to the suppression, or vague, lifeless utterance of unpopular truth. . . . You must also take heed lest you baptise your rash, crude notions, your hereditary or sectarian opinions, with the name of Christian doctrine. But having deliberately, conscientiously sought the truth, abide by your conviction at all hazards. . . . Put faith in truth as mightier than error, prejudice, or passion, and be ready to take a place among its martyrs.
> Glory in your office. You delight in poetry and the fine arts; but remember that the divinest art is that which studies and creates the beauty, not of the outward form, but of immortal virtue; which creates not statues and pictures, but holy and disinterested men; which awakens the God-like in the breast of our brother. No poem is so glorious as a Christian life; and he who incites a fellow-creature to this produces a work which will outlast all other works of the mind. . . . Regard your office as meant not to perpetuate what exists, but to introduce a higher condition of the Church and the world. Christ was eminently the Reformer, and reform is the spirit of the ministry.

UNITARIANISM IN JAPAN.

THE Rev. CLAY MCCAULEY, who early in the present year returned from his ten years' residence in Japan, as representative of the American Unitarian Association, gave an address on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of that Association at Boston, last May, which was in effect a detailed and eloquent record of the work of the Japan Mission. In the Christian Register of Aug. 30 and Sept. 6 this address is printed in full, and furnishes us with the following particulars.

The awakening of Japan to the manifold advantages of Western civilisation led to a strong conviction, in the minds of some of the more earnest and enlightened men of that wonderful country, that material and intellectual progress would be far from a real benefit, unless to these was added a true spiritual progress that should give to the people a vital religion for the inspiration and control of life, in place of their former abandoned faith. And, looking at the various forms of Christianity offered for their acceptance, it seemed to these men, in view of the essentially rational bent of the Japanese mind, that in Unitarian Christianity they would find what they wanted. Hence various approaches to the leaders of Unitarianism in America, until in the year 1887 the Rev. ARTHUR MAY KNAPP, on behalf of the American Unitarian Association, undertook a mission of inquiry to Japan. This was followed after his return, in the spring of 1889, by a more decisive step, for later in that year he returned to Tokio accompanied by the Rev. CLAY MCCAULEY, and three professors who were to occupy University posts in Tokio, while aiding the Unitarian Mission as they had opportunity, and also by Mr. Saichiro Kanda, a Japanese gentleman, who had completed a course of study in America, and was ready to help in the mission work. The party from America was soon joined at Tokio by our friend, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, who for a year and until his recall to this country freely devoted himself to the same service. In what spirit this mission was undertaken, the following passage from Mr. McCauley's address will show.

When the American Unitarian Association responded to the Japanese appeal to "Come over and help," the friends and founders of the mission, it is to be remembered, did not lay upon their representatives the duty of teaching an authoritative and fixed body of religious dogma—a "creed"—in the name of Unitarianism, or of carrying to and of reproducing among the Japanese a traditional system of ecclesiastical organisation and government. Far from it. When the mission was established, those who had it in charge were officially instructed to "express the sympathy of the Unitarians of America for progressive religious movements in Japan, and to give all necessary information to the leaders of religious thought and action in that country." In consequence of this declared aim the Association's representatives, from the beginning of their service, sought to discover, to encourage, and to co-operate with any religious association or group of persons, or with individuals, irrespective of form of religious sect or personal belief, that might wish to know the mature and advanced thought in Christendom about man's higher or spiritual problems or interests. It is true that at the present time there are, and that from a time early in the mission's history there have been, Japanese churches and associations known distinctively as "Unitarian." There is also much literature published and distributed, labelled and acknowledged as specifically "Unitarian." But it is the fact that no foreign Unitarian was ever present at the organisation of a Japanese Unitarian church or association. It is also the fact that our mission has no organic connection with any Japanese Unitarian institution; also, that it declines to place upon its publications any authoritative indorsement of their contents. I will repeat a few of the characteristic utterances of some of those to whom have been intrusted the Japan work. The Rev. A. M. Knapp, the mission's pioneer, declared in the beginning of his work, "The errand of Unitarianism to Japan is based upon the now familiar idea of the sympathy of religions. With the conviction that we are messengers of distinctive and valuable truths which have not been emphasised, and that, in return, there is much in your faith and life which to our harm we have not emphasised, receive us not as theological propagandists, but as messengers of the new gospel of human brotherhood in the religious life of man." The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, the earnest English volunteer to our work, describes the Unitarian aim in these words. We seek "to build broader foundations than creed or sect; to demonstrate reason in religion, science is theology, and all things in God. This is grander than any denominational triumph." The Rev. W. I. Lawrance, whose devoted and all too brief service in our mission is well remembered in Tokio, wrote that "our work in Japan marks a new departure in missions." We "bear the simple gospel of freedom, fellowship, and character. We not only acknowledge with frankness, but accept with gratitude, all that is true and uplifting in the faiths already there. We hold up to them the pure theism and the deep-rooted optimism of Christianity. Our method is based on the sympathy of religions." Also, that my own declarations in the establishment of the mission may appear as part of this record, I recall this passage from a published answer to an inquiry made to me by a Buddhist priest: "Unitarianism has not come to Japan to destroy, but to fulfil. Unitarianism is here to set men free, or rather to help the free minds of Japan to set all minds free; and to hasten the coming in the world, as far as may be, of the sublime empire of love and righteousness, which will at last make of humanity a true brotherhood under the care of the infinite and eternal God, our Father."

The ranks of the seven did not long remain unbroken. Mr. Hawkes came home early in 1891, and Mr. Knapp had already been obliged at the end of 1890 to leave the work of the Mission in Mr. McCauley's hands, while Mr. Lawrence, who went out as a fresh ally, was obliged by broken health to resign in 1894. The three professors also one after another were called away, so that at the end of his ten years of service Mr. McCauley stood alone, yet with no sense of failure or desertion, but with the happy conviction that the good seed was sown, and that the wisest course was now to leave the native workers to realise their own strength, and to work out, without foreign intervention, the destiny of their own religious life.

"From the present time," said Mr. McCauley, "a new period in the religious and spiritual history of Japan begins. Unitarianism is no longer a strange thing there, nor is it now directed under alien care. It is to-day a living, growing organism, known throughout the Empire, in large measure already maintained, advanced, and directed as part and product of Japanese thought and life."

The result of these patient labours is apparent in three directions—in the establishment of churches, the dissemination of liberal religious literature, and the promotion of education. There was at first considerable opposition, misunderstanding, and misrepresentation to be faced, both from orthodox missionaries and native Buddhists, but this before long was overcome, relations of greater cordiality were established, and the steady maintenance of Unitarian teaching has exerted a salutary influence over the presentment of "orthodox" Christianity and Buddhism alike. One striking result, attributed largely to the Mission's influence, was the holding in 1896 of the first Universal Religious Conference in Japan, in which Shinto, Buddhist, Confucian, and Christian delegates met in sympathetic union to discuss fundamental questions of religious life.

From the beginning of the Mission religious services were held, at first by the help of interpreters; but no really good place of meeting could be found until, in the spring of 1894, Unity Hall was built, and became the home of the "First Unitarian Church of Tokio," and also of an admirable library, and a native Unitarian Association. Postal Mission work is now vigorously carried on, and is extending the influence of Unitarian teaching widely through the country. The "Senshin Gakuin," or "School for Advanced Learning," established early in the history of the Mission, and for some time successfully carried on, is at present, greatly to Mr. McCauley's regret, in abeyance, owing to the lack of funds. But when that difficulty is overcome Unity Hall is ready with admirable accommodation for its further development.

While the original workers in the Mission have now all left Japan, the effectiveness of the work, Mr. McCauley thankfully records, is not impaired, native teachers have taken their places, and there are signs of a growing acceptance in influential quarters of the principles and the ideas of religious life, which it has been the purpose of the Mission to promote. The following are the concluding sentences of Mr. McCauley's address.

In bidding farewell a few weeks ago to the Unitarians of that far-away people, I said from the platform of Unity Hall: "Let religion, as faith and love toward God and man, be the one encompassing and all-pervading power guiding the words and deeds that shall have place under this roof. As my parting counsel, I can commend to you nothing of such high and lasting worth for everything that shall here bear the name of Unitarianism as the bond of union of the American Unitarians—that teaching of Jesus of Nazareth by which practical religion is summed up as love to God and love to man."

Confident, therefore, that sincere efforts will be made to fulfil this highest counsel, I have passed my charge over to the care of the Japanese. I part from my Japanese friends and from my long held work among them with more regret than I dare attempt to put into words. But it is best for the sake of this service of our faith and love that it should be transferred now to those to whom your mission carried it. It is time that the Japanese should feel in every way their own responsibility, and should have full opportunity to make perfect their impulse toward self-reliance. And it is my sincere prayer that the Japan Unitarian Association may become the minister of a faith and life that shall spread farther and farther, and more and more deeply, in the life of that wonderful people of the Far East, until the whole nation shall become conscious of a divine calling, and shall act worthy their birthright as men among brother-men, and under a clear consciousness of God, as God's children.

Duty is our ladder to the skies, and climbing not we fall.—A. Leighton.

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.—IV.

THE first Unitarian church I saw in America was that of Montreal, where Episcopalianism is the fashionable and Romanism the popular religion. As I stood looking at the building a lady and a little girl passed, and following the direction of my eyes glanced up at the Notice Board: "Mother, what are Unitarians?" said the child. The answer gave me much to think about: "They don't believe in the Holy Ghost." Ah me! I knew that we were generally defined as people who did not believe, and that often enough we gave occasion for this damnatory definition of our position; but I thought the one article of faith to which we did cling with as much enthusiasm as we are capable of was that God is Spirit, and that the Spirit of God dwells among us. The lady evidently knew nothing about us; but how did she come by this queer notion? There is no saying; only if she had known more of us, perhaps she would have justified herself by replying that the one thing we seemed to want was religion—that we were liberal, respectable, philanthrophic, rational, everything except spiritual, worshippers of and believers in God the Holy Spirit. We might make a good defence against this charge, but the fact that there was need of defence would be proof that it was not wholly untrue. If I am not mistaken there is too much of the mere business element about the American religion in general; a church is "run" for what it brings in, and the minister is chosen who will draw hearers and subscribers, with too scanty respect to his qualifications as a religious man. "Respectability" has been our reproach in England, but our Unitarian kinsfolk on the other side struck me as more eminently "respectable" than any congregations I had met here. The few churches with which I was privileged to make acquaintance seemed to me to consist entirely of well-to-do people, and the Sunday-schools were only junior congregations, the younger members of the same "gentile" families. Am I wrong in thinking that American Unitarianism is a class religion? If so, I shall be glad to be set right, and I give this opportunity to my friends there for enlightening us on the subject.

Yet even if it be so I could, I think, make a good defence on their behalf. I discovered no sign of unwillingness to admit the poor, children or adults; I heard no remark which could be interpreted as a paraphrase of "Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier (or better off) than thou." Such a spirit is the negation of the fundamental faith, confessed by us all in the first two words of the prayer which all Christians use. That there is such a spirit among our American brethren I do not believe. But if it be the case that there it is the more cultured, the better educated, the qualified to succeed and therefore the more successful, who naturally tend to become members of a Unitarian community—why, who shall reproach either the individuals or the body? And if asked why it should be so there so much more than here, I should answer that it is for the reason given in my last article—namely, that there the way is broader, and those who are fittest for higher position attain to it. The working man who becomes a master is a Unitarian for the very same reason that from man he has risen to be a master: he is thoughtful, independent, enterprising in matters of belief as he is in matters of business.

But when the worst is admitted in this or other respects, it remains to say for American Unitarianism that every garment has its seamy side, and the finer the dress the greater the contrast between its appearance before the public and what it looks like under inspection in the hands of the dressmaker. It is the same of every human institution, secular or religious: however flourishing it may appear to outsiders, it will certainly have its own difficulties and drawbacks unsuspected by the casual observer. We are much given to admiring the fair show of other churches than our own; their zeal, their numbers, their heartiness, their progress, seem to reproach our poor estate; and some would find all the fault in ourselves; our methods, perhaps our creed, they think, are to blame for our comparative failure. But while we do well to note all things wherein our neighbours excel us, while we ungrudgingly give our admiration to those who succeed where we fail, and try to learn what lesson we can of their example, at the same time it is well to remember that these churches too have their share of all the troubles which beset us. I have had myself an unusually large experience of religious bodies. I have never known one which had not its embarrassments, its scandals, its divisions of opinion, its signs of manifold weakness. But it is seldom that the garment is turned inside out except in the privacy of the committee-room, and the world rightly enough takes it for what it appears to be. It looks handsome, expensive, dignified, warm, useful, comfortable; no doubt it is what it looks, let us hope so at least; what good purpose were served by inquiring how much it cost, how it was made, how long it has been worn, and so forth? So we judge men and churches from the outside, and may well be content to do so, as long as we are not called upon to pass sentence upon them in God's place—a task for which few or none of us are qualified.

And in regard to our own churches in America I have no doubt there is much to be said not to their credit as religious societies, but I had neither opportunity nor desire to discover what might be amiss. I had but a sight of some few of them in passing, and I saw the grand parade of representatives at Boston when all were in full dress. I was not sent as an inspector to report on the condition of the churches, but as a representative to bear the friendly greetings of English Unitarians. If, therefore, my general impressions should seem, to those who know better, of too favourable a character, I can only say in defence that I saw the handsome side of things, and describe them, not with any pretence to knowledge, but simply as they appeared to me.

I proceed, then, to note a few characteristics of the congregations of our faith in America, especially such as struck me by contrast with ourselves.

First, there seemed to me much more of common life. The single congregation was not so isolated as ours are apt to be, but each subscribed to the general fund and took part in the life of the whole body. The number of varying Hymn and Service Books is nothing like so great as with us, and of 454 churches, over 200 use the "Hymn and Tune Book for the Church and Home, with Services for Congregational Worship," published by the Association. In my judgment the advantage of using in so many churches the same form, the same book, and the same prayers, far outweighs the drawbacks of a certain loss of liberty, a loss inevitable where many individuals unite, whether for worship or for business, or where many churches or societies unite.

Secondly, the women take a more active part in the business of the congregation, with immense gain thereto. They are not relegated to the Sunday-school and tea meetings. Their efficiency and enthusiasm, evidenced in so many other spheres of activity, is fully recognised in the church—perhaps I ought to say is beginning to be recognised in some churches, the wish dictates the exaggeration. We are much given to restrained boasting of our intellectuality as a religious body, and get full credit for it among outsiders. But it is true for us as for other religious bodies, that without the devotion and services of the women we were lost. I should say that this is still more the case in America, and they recognise their obligation by giving to women their due place on council and platform. In return they nobly sustain the Church's life and work, and at Boston during business hours, when few or none of the men could get to the meetings, they were made spirited and inspiriting by these dear Unitarian women.

I had noted other points, but I become conscious that the more I enter into details the less are my observations worth. First impressions are generally worth recalling and perhaps worth publishing: second impressions had best be suppressed to give place to maturer experience. Of course I am prejudiced, so intensely prejudiced, that I have not even the desire to form an impartial judgment; but I certainly did not see any congregation in the States that I would, taking all things into consideration, change with my own in Leeds. But what is the worth of such testimony? I begin my twenty-fifth year here next week, I have grown grey here, I have watched the little children grow up and become fathers and mothers, I have christened their babes and buried their dead. Of course, there is no congregation in the world to be compared with that of Mill Hill Chapel. Yet suppose I were twenty years younger, and were offered a pulpit in America, suppose I had in mind my own happiness and my prospects of usefulness, I think I would —well, no, what matters it what I think I would have done in a case which did not occur. I do not regret that I was not tempted when temptation might have been too strong for me.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

ONE of Jesus' great teachings was that no man need ever be anxious. What is the fruitful source of anxiety and worriment? It is the egoist's fear and suspicion; his business is his own separate interest, against which he conceives others to plot and contend. In Jesus' case his life was not his own: he lived under orders: he did his Father's business: the victorious forces of the universe went with him. He had only to obey orders from above. There was nothing therefore to be anxious and worried about.—Charles F. Dole.

THE LEGEND OF FAUST:

The man who sold himself to the Devil.

Is it wicked to desire knowledge? or was the Devil right for once—right in saying that knowledge will make human creatures godlike, gifting them with the power of looking on both sides of things, so that they can compare good with evil, can enjoy pleasure all the more by contrast with pain, can subdue the lower animals and rule the elements by the power which knowledge brings?

Throughout the Dark Ages, in Europe, curiosity to know was checked by the priests, the fearless study of the Bible was forbidden, the investigation of the laws of Nature was punished as a dreadfully wicked thing. According to their view, the Bible contained all necessary knowledge, and the Church stood in the place of God to explain what the Bible meant. There had been war in heaven, and the rebel angels had fallen. Then God created this world and the human race. Satan—the Adversary—led astray the first pair through their curiosity for knowledge, and he and his army of evil spirits were still at the elbow of every one, to tempt them into rebellion against God. Eventually the devils, and those who yielded to them, would be shut up in the infernal regions, to suffer endless torments. A scheme of redemption, however, had been provided; and the chief concern of mortals should be to consider how they were to escape hell.

Meantime the Devil was busy with mischief. He caused plagues and famines. He brought on eclipses and comets. He and his angels afflicted people with illness and with madness. There was no misfortune, accident or pain, which they were not the cause of. Sometimes the Devil appeared in the form of a black man; sometimes as a beautiful woman. There was scarcely a saint who had not seen an evil spirit. And some men, who were not saints, actually made compacts with evil spirits, and took lessons from them. It was these sorcerers or wizards who caused hail and thunderstorms. They even sometimes entered into marriage relation with sylphs and other female spirits. More awful still, there were numbers of women who committed the corresponding sin. This was considered to be a fact so amply attested that it would be impudent to deny it. These witches, by their compact with devils, obtained power to work miracles; they caused tempests and damaged property; and they were continually transported through the air to a Sabbath meeting where they paid homage to the Evil One. These things were believed, even by the upper classes; and seeing that Scripture spoke about the witch of Endor, and Moses said, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live!" it was thought impious to deny them. So there was sometimes wild panic, and women were burnt alive by scores, and the horror extended through centuries.

This state of things may be said to have begun when Christianity obtained its full victory over Paganism, and became corrupted itself; and the change was already complete in the sixth century. Dense darkness rested on Europe for six hundred years until the Revival of Learning began, and it took five hundred years more before those deeds of darkness ceased altogether to be perpetrated.

The dawn, however, was breaking into day about four hundred years ago, or a little earlier, when the movement was in progress which is called the Renaissance, the re-birth or re-awakening. We all know something of the religious Reformation under Luther and his friends, and we rejoice in it as having overthrown Papal authority and established the right of private judgment. But this was only part of a wider movement. The human mind was rousing itself from the lethargy of centuries, and asserting its right to free inquiry. When the Turks invaded Europe and captured Constantinople many Greek scholars were driven into exile, carrying into Italy and other lands the seeds of an intellectual renovation, in the philosophy of Plato, and all the other Greek thought and knowledge and speculation. There was the Greek love of Nature, their delight in beauty and strength, their admiration of the human form, their sense of the dignity of man, their discussions about the origin of the world, their ideas about the gods—things which had been banished by the Church of the Pope and Cardinals.

Roman classics were being studied, too, as well as Greek. And both in Rome and in Greece, statues of men and gods were being brought to light and sent westward. They excited people to admiration and new thought. It began to be seen that Greeks and Romans were greater than the Fathers of the Church, greater than the schoolmen and the monks. The classics were brilliant and weighty, whereas mediæval thought was obscure and feeble. The study of the poets, philosophers and orators of antiquity made it impossible any longer to pretend that mankind lay under a curse, or that God's handiwork in Nature had been marred and ruined by an evil spirit. It began to be seen that witchcraft must be a delusion. Scholars began to write history, on a broader foundation: European history and human history, instead of the annals of convents and the lives of saints. In short, the spirit of ancient Greece had risen from the tomb—the spirit which the earlier Christianity had suppressed and banished—and as a result the fabric of superstition was crumbling and tottering to its fall. The liberal mind was recovering its liberty, was regaining a sense of dignity, and remoulding its faith.

Doctors of Divinity were ceasing to be valued. Chairs of Literature were founded instead; and as there were not yet any printed books, the Professor became the centre of a band of earnest disciples. Soon afterwards there came printing, to fix the possession of what had been gained. Columbus discovered America and began to open up all the world, as a globe, and let in a flood of new ideas that way. Copernicus dethroned the old astronomy, and showed that the earth is one of the planets. Other men, studying the rocks and fossils which they saw exposed in cliffs and quarries, suspected that the earth was older than 6,000 years, and doubted the infallibility of Moses. I am giving a bare outline and faint indication of what took place; but altogether it was like a new birth of civilisation.

But all this active pursuit of secular knowledge greatly scandalised the priests and theologians. It was reviving Pagan philosophy. It was bringing back Greek art which had been banished as an abominable thing (for the Greek statues were undraped, and they were statues of so-called gods that could only be demons). It was teaching people to glorify the human body, when they ought to depreciate and loathe it. It was prying into knowledge that was forbidden. It was rebellion against ecclesiastical tradition. It was breeding doubt and disbelief. It was letting in the light. It was opening people's eyes. It was no doubt the work of the Devil, who had told Adam and Eve that the fruit of the tree of knowledge would open their eyes. It must be suppressed if possible, by the dungeon, the thumbscrew and the rack; by every form of torture; and by burning at the stake, which would only send to the Devil a little sooner those who had made a compact with him already.

In the Middle-Ages if any man investigated Chemistry or Natural Philosophy or Medicine, and studied to such good purpose as to be able to cure diseases or to dissolve metals or manufacture a gas, he was supposed to be assisted by the Devil. The priests declared it, and the people believed it. The Devil was a master of such arts. Roger Bacon, the monk who invented gunpowder, was accused of having dealings with the Devil, and punished with fourteen years imprisonment. Cornelius Agrippa too, whose studies led him to believe that magic rested either on imposture or on a knowledge of the laws of Nature, and not on the assistance of devils, was accused of magic himself, imprisoned for a year, and ceaselessly calumniated till his death. That such a compact with the Devil could be made, was considered to be established on the clearest authority. Scripture spoke of it; and the Fathers of the Church denounced magic. In the fourteenth century the bas-reliefs on cathedrals frequently represented men kneeling down before the Devil and devoting themselves to him. So surely it must be true!

To us it seems very absurd that the study of chemistry, or geology or astronomy, should be regarded as wicked—that natural knowledge should be the Devil's department—as though the world had been created by the Devil and not by God. And yet a little curiosity about eclipses and comets was so natural, a little knowledge of herbs and drugs so useful, the invention of gunpowder and the wonderful things that could be done by chemistry promised to give men such power—that if it had been true that such knowledge could only be obtained by putting oneself under the tuition of devils, there were men who would have dared to do it. There was one very singular man who rather professed to have done so, and made capital out of the reputation. His name was Paracelsus. He was an alchemist who made some discoveries; and it is said that true chemistry began with him. He insisted that its importance did not consist in making gold, but in the preparation of medicines; and he raised it to high rank by making a knowledge of it indispensable to all medical men. He performed some remarkable cures himself, and attained to great celebrity. Yet he was a fanatic and impostor. He declared that he was inspired, and that he was able to cure all diseases, including those deemed incurable. He said he had discovered an elixir which would prolong life to any extent; the tincture which Adam and the patriarchs used, whose life ran up to near 1,000 years. He wandered from province to province, as scholars used to do, predicting the future by the stars and the lines on the hand, and exhibiting all the chemical processes which he had learned. Well, this man was a strong assertor of the existence of sylphs, gnomes and other spirits of Nature—beings possessing more than human excellence, and to rise to intercourse with whom was the highest aim of the philosopher. "The air," said he, "is not so full of flies in summer as it is at all times of invisible devils." Beelzebub, the Chief of the Demons, was subject to the power of magic; and Paracelsus used often to say, "If God does not aid me the Devil will." One of this man's followers gave out that he was the possessor of a devil, which he carried about with him in a bottle. The pretended devil, however, was nothing else but a scorpion preserved in a phial of oil.

With these glimpses into the beliefs and impostures of those times; the investigations in chemistry, the recovery of Greek learning; the way in which the priests condemned all inquiry as unsettling, heretical and devilish; and the way in which the masses of the people (though feeling some curiosity, and half sympathising with inquirers) yet from force of education, or rather from ignorance and tradition, supposed the priests to be right, and the philosophers to be really in league with devils—having these glimpses, we are in some measure prepared to understand the "Legend of Faust," who is declared to have sold himself to the Devil for twenty-four years, at the end of which time he was carried off.

It appears that there was really a man named Johann Faust, born towards the end of the fifteenth century, who studied medicine and magic, and claimed to be a sorcerer. It was stated that he had summoned the Devil at night in a forest near Wittenberg. The Evil Spirit afterwards visited him three times in his dwelling; and they had disputes. Eventually a compact was made, and Faust pierced his hand with the point of a knife to obtain blood to sign the compact with. The Evil Spirit gave his name as Mephistopheles. The terms of the compact were that Mephistopheles was to serve Faust, and obtain for him whatever he might want during a period of twenty-four years, and then Faust was to pass body and soul into the power of Mephistopheles. So during his further earthly life Faust is not sold to the Devil to be controlled and forced into wickedness, but is to have his own way, and gratify his own desires, with a clever demon to aid him, paying the price afterwards.

One thing that he does is to employ Mephistopheles, as we shall see, to help him to gratify his curiosity to obtain knowledge, especially forbidden knowledge. Mephistopheles took the form of a monk—who would suspect a holy man of being a devil?—and brought food and wine for Faust out of the cellars of bishops, and rich garments for his master to wear; so that Faust and his confidential man, Chr. Wagner, lived in luxury. This perhaps was part of his desire. Faust wanted to marry decently; but in this Mephistopheles would not help him, because marriage is pleasing to God. But these things are by the way. The chief thing is that Faust shows a great curiosity to learn and to know. He wishes to see different parts of the world. He puts questions about the seasons, about the planets, about the creation of the world itself. Here surely we see the student of 300 or 400 years ago, ambitious to investigate, with a curiosity fanned and directed by the voyages and travels which were opening up America and Asia, and bringing before the European mind the customs and the thought of other countries; a curiosity about the planets, and perhaps their sinful inhabitants, if Copernicus is right in saying that the planets are worlds, and that the earth is but one of a family; a curiosity about the creation of this world, whether it took place in six days or not, and so recently as 6,000 years ago; and man made of the dust, and woman from his rib; or whether there was more truth in old Greek speculations, of Epicurus and others.

Mephistopheles and Faust travel through the air; nothing easier when so many witches and wizards had done it before. They see many countries; they even get a view of the Garden of Eden. No sincere doubter could fail to be curious about Paradise, seeing that if the garden could be found, and the four rivers all starting from the middle of it, this would be some corroboration of the Scripture story. Nobody had been able to find the Garden of Eden hitherto. But even this is not enough for the inquiring mind of Faust. He asks Mephistopheles about hell and devils; and he is not satisfied until he is taken to see the infernal regions in a chariot drawn by dragons.

Faust had not been allowed to marry; but in the twenty-third year of the compact Mephistopheles brings to him from the Shades of the Dead the Grecian beauty, Helen, whose charms led Paris to carry her away, thus giving cause for the Trojan war. Faust becomes infatuated with her beauty, and lives with her, and their son is named Justus Faustus. This is probably an allegorical narrative, intended to set forth that the curiosity of those times, the renewed study of Greek history and myths, and the recovery of many statues of queens and goddesses—masterpieces of the sculptor's chisel—had put the student in love with Greek beauty.

Many stories are told of the wonderful tricks and illusions performed by Faust as a sorcerer; e.g., he made flowers to bloom at Christmas, and he drew wine out of a table; but when it is declared that he took to himself the wings of an eagle and would explore all the secrets of heaven and earth, this again is probably a figurative statement conveying the fact that nothing was beyond the range of his inquiry, the inquiring spirit of that age. Faust had freed himself from the trammels which so long enslaved the human mind and chained it to the ground; he meant to make himself acquainted with all that could be learned from stars and suns, from mankind in all countries, and from every science whether forbidden or not.

The original form of the Faust legend is a book published in 1587, with the following lengthy title:—"History of Dr. Joh. Faust, the notorious sorcerer and black-artist: How he bound himself to the Devil for a certain time: What singular adventures befell him therein, what he did and carried on until finally he received his well-deserved pay. Mostly from his own posthumous writings: for all presumptious, rash and godless men, as a terrible example, abominable instance and well-meant warning, collected and put in print. James IIII., 'Submit yourselves therefore to God; resist the Devil, and he will flee from you.'" One writer says that the Devil strangled Faust, and that his dead body lay constantly on its face on the bier, although it had been five times turned upwards. According to another account he was carried off at midnight in the midst of a fearful storm, his body being shattered to fragments, and leaving only a splutter of blood and fragments. But these are idle stories, perhaps invented by the priests. Faust was not carried off by the Devil, but the theory of the Church required such an end for him.

Faust represented the craving after knowledge: that knowledge which the priests withheld. Students and investigators were really beginning to attain to it, and the new knowledge necessarily came into conflict with the doctrines of the Church. The study of the laws of Nature tended to upset the notion that diseases were caused by witches, and hailstorms by wizards, and all disasters by devils. The new knowledge about the old heathen Greeks—Socrates and others who were wiser than the monks, and perhaps better men too—gave breadth and charity to men's thoughts. Such men as Paracelsus and Faust taught that it was necessary to cultivate a contempt for the quarrels of creeds, and to spurn the orthodox tenets concerning the Fall of Man. The priests said (and probably believed) that all this revival of learning was evil. It amounted to taking the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. It was the Devil opening men's eyes to knowledge of good and evil. Such men as Faust must be in league with the Devil; and to the Devil they must go. So the story of the fearful ending of Faust was spread abroad. Books related it, to point a moral against sinful curiosity; and plays put it upon the stage to warn the people. Yet it is believed that the people often sympathised with Faust, admired his courage and rejoiced in his power.

Probably our feeling would not be very different. We bid godspeed to all investigators. We rejoice in the discoveries of science. We say, let knowledge grow from more to more: let all the things once known to the civilisations of Greece, and Egypt, and Babylonia be recovered and published. We, at least, have no superstitious idea that while the Bible is God's word the universe is divided between God and the Devil. The world is open to our gaze; and the Creator who has given us faculties will not be displeased if we use them. If there be anything that He wishes to keep from us, the hiding will be effectual: we shall find that cabinet locked. Or it will be a riddle which we cannot guess. But what we can unravel we may.

GEO. ST. CLAIR.

A MAN will be already in no mean paradise, if at the hour of sunset a good hope can fall upon him like harmonies of music, that the earth shall still be fair, and the happiness of every feeling creature still receive a constant augmentation, and each good cause yet find worthy defenders, when the memory of his own poor name and personality has long been blotted out of the brief recollection of men for ever.—John Morley.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Badfield.—Harvest Services were conducted by the Rev. A. Amey, minister, on Sunday last. Mr. Sangster, organist of the Old Meeting, Framlingham, assisted at afternoon service.

Brighton.—On Wednesday evening a welcome meeting was held in the hall adjoining the Free Christian Church, New-road, in connection with the settlement of the Rev. H. M. Livens as minister in succession to the Rev. Alfred Hood. There was an excellent attendance, the hall being filled. Amongst those present were the Revs. F. Allen, E. M. Daplyn, and W. G. Tarrant, from London, and Mr. G. J. Holyoake. After a hymn, the secretary, Mr. Johnson, read extracts from numerous letters of apology for absence and of good wishes from the writers, who included the Revs. A. Hood, C. C. Coe, Dr. Brooke Herford, J. J. Marten, J. Page Hopps, and W. Copeland Bowie; Mr. Herbert Rix and Mr. F. Taylor, of Bolton. Several letters of kindly welcome had also been received from ministers and clergy in the town. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who had to leave the meeting early, gave the first of a series of short addresses. Speaking especially on behalf of the Provincial Assembly, he welcomed Mr. Livens to that district, the importance of which as a centre of busy life increased yearly. Mr. Livens would feel himself charged with the duty of representing the forward movement in religion, politics, and social reform, in a community where such workers were all too few. That meeting would assure him of the sympathy of friends far and near in his labours, and he would feel the sacred truth that all who had done battle for the right were on his side, though human eye might not see this great "cloud of witnesses." The Chairman (Mr. F. T. Wilson) explained that as their new minister had begun his ministry in the middle of summer, they had thought it best to defer their united welcome till autumn, and he was glad that so many friends had gathered on that occasion. They had already enjoyed Mr. Livens' services and sermons for a period sufficient to reassure them—in addition to all the high commendations given in the letters they had heard—that in their new minister they had a man of singular religious fervour and poetic feeling; one, too, who was endowed with a sympathetic nature such as would win for him in Brighton the same kind of friendships as he had evidently made wherever he had been. The congregation owed it to their minister to cheer him up by their presence on every possible occasion. It was absurd to expect him to be an effective preacher if they left him an empty church to preach in; and the Chairman, in extending the welcome of the congregation, said he hoped this would be shown by their continued fidelity to him in all his good work. Mr. J. G. Holyoake, being called upon, gave some interesting reminiscences, and spoke of his indebtedness to Unitarians. Remembering the dismal views of God that had blighted his own early life, he felt that Unitarians by their teaching were doing a noble work. There was no church in Brighton that would not be the better for it. He spoke of the work of their late minister, Mr. Alfred Hood, and cordially joined in the welcome of that evening. The Rev. H. M. Livens then responded, with warm acknowledgment of the kind things that had been said and endorsed by the meeting, and in an earnest speech dwelt upon the character of the ministry he was undertaking, which could not be that of a priest, but a friend among them. After an interval further speeches were made by the Revs. F. Allen and Edgar Daplyn, and after a comprehensive vote of thanks, the meeting closed with the singing of the doxology.

Capelybryn.—The committee meeting of the Cardiganshire Musical Festival was held here on Sunday afternoon. In the absence of Captain Davies, the Chairman of the Union, Mr. J. R. Thomas, Pontshaen, was voted to the chair. There was a representative gathering of delegates from the various chapels present. It was determined to hold the next festival at Aberystwith on the second Monday in June, 1901, the Rev. W. James, B.A., Y.A., Llandyssul, to be president for the day. Hymns and tunes were chosen and other arrangements made, but the work of looking out for a suitable hall and for the organist was left to the committee. Mr. Eiddil Jones, Cefncoed, was appointed leader, and the officials of the Union were reappointed.—The annual Thanksgiving Service for the Harvest was held on Tuesday evening, Sept. 25, when two sermons, appropriate to the occasion, were delivered—one by Mr. Simon Jones, H.M.C., Manchester, and the other by one of the members of the chapel. There was a fairly large congregation, but, owing to various reasons, it was not up to the average of the last few years. The collection, which was towards the B. and F.U.A., was good in proportion to the number present. Thanksgiving Services were also held by the sister church at Alltyplaca on the same day, both in the morning and the evening.

Ciliau Aeron, Cardiganshire.—On Sunday, Sept. 9, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., Bradford, administered the Communion Service at this chapel, when nine new members joined the church. On Sunday, 16th inst., Mr. Jones preached in the morning at Rhydygwin, and in the afternoon and evening at Ciliau. As usual, when Mr. Jones preaches in this neighbourhood, large numbers of people came to hear him, and his sermons gave great satisfaction. On the following Wednesday evening, a special service was held—Mr. Jones and the pastor, the Rev. Lewis Williams, taking part—to receive more new members into the fellowship of the church. Twenty joined. During his stay Mr. Jones visited many of the descendants of the old families who used to be associated with the congregation, and it is hoped that there may in consequence be a revival of their interest.

Crewe.—The silver wedding of the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern was celebrated on Tuesday week, Sept. 18, at Crewe. At the school there was a congregational tea and soirée, at which most of the members of the congregation were present, as well as the Rev. Lawrence Scott (of Denton) and the Rev. J. Kertain Smith (of Belper), who performed the wedding ceremony for Mr. and Mrs. Redfern twenty-five years ago in the Dukinfield Old Chapel. The congregation presented to Mr. and Mrs. Redfern a handsome silver-plated lamp, and in doing it, Mr. Thomas Harding spoke of the valuable services which Mr. Redfern had rendered the congregation, and of the love and respect in which he is held. The Rev. Lawrence Scott spoke of Mr. Redfern's valuable services as a layman in connection with the congregation at Denton, before he entered on his ministry at Great Hucklow and Bradwell. The Rev. J. Kertain Smith referred to his long and intimate acquaintance with Mr. Redfern, first as a valuable worker in connection with the congregation at Mottram, then at Denton, at the time when the East Cheshire Christian Union first made their effort to establish the congregation at Denton, and to Mr. Redfern's services at Great Hucklow. He said Mr. Redfern was held in high esteem in the neighbourhood, and that he was elected Chairman of the Bradwell School Board; and no less were his services appreciated by the Committee of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association. The after part of the evening at Crewe was spent in listening to various pieces of music, that were well rendered by members of the congregation.

Dukinfield.—The celebration of the Sunday-school centenary began last Saturday. Early in the afternoon the scholars and teachers gathered at the school, and after each had received an aluminium medal of neat design, they formed in procession, headed by their banners and two bands of music, and paraded the principal streets of the borough. In the procession were the Rev. H. S. Tayler, minister of the Old Chapel, the school directors, the following ex-directors: Mr. J. Jackson, Ald. J. Kerfoot, J.P., J. Bancroft, Mr. E. B. Broadrick, Mr. M. Wilde, and other gentlemen. Returning to the school over Chapel Hill, they assembled round a flagstaff which had been erected in front of the chapel, and sang the hymn, "All people that on earth do dwell." The scholars and officials, to the number of nearly 700, were regaled with a free tea, followed by an entertainment, at which speeches were delivered by the Revs. H. S. Tayler and H. W. Hawkes, grandson of the founder of the Sunday-school. In the course of an exhibition of lantern views, pictures were given illustrative of the history of the school. The front of the school was elaborately decorated, and the streets through which the procession passed were bright with flags and streamers put out by the inhabitants. The medal has on one side a faithful representation of the school of the present time, with the words "Dukinfield Sunday School. Founded 1800." On the other side is the inscription, "Centenary Celebration, 1900," surrounded by a laurel wreath and the words, "Dukinfield Old Chapel Sunday School." Special services were held in the chapel on Sunday, the ministers being the Revs. H. S. Tayler, M.A., H. W. Hawkes, and H. E. Dowson, B.A. Next Saturday the celebrations are to be continued as advertised.

Edinburgh: St. Mark's Chapel.—On Sunday morning, Sept. 23, Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar conducted the service after the form followed by the Brahmo Somaj, and preached an eloquent sermon on "Universal Religion"; and on the Wednesday following a meeting was held in the chapel hall, when Mr. Mozoomdar gave an address on "Social and Religious Reform in India." Among the audience were several ministers of other churches, and a number of Indian University students. Mr. Mozoomdar, in reply to questions from the audience, expressed the opinion that the present taxation of India pressed heavily upon the poorer classes. With regard to the famine, he, while recognising what the Government had done to alleviate the suffering, thought that stores should be established at various places to provide food against the recurrence of these visitations, of which he, in his own life-time, could remember some twelve or fourteen. He thought that there had been a tendency recently to withdraw such measures of self-government as had been granted, and if he had a fault to find with the English system of government it was that it was too machine-like, and with all its perfection it lacked soul. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Mozoomdar, on the motion of Dr. Morrison, President of the Presbyterian College in Calcutta.

Garston.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts, formerly of Chester, begins his work as missionary of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, by conducting the service in the Garston Co-operative Hall, to-morrow (Sunday). The public meeting to welcome him was to have been held on Monday, Oct. 1, but, owing to the General Election, has been postponed to Thursday, Oct. 25.

Gloucester.—The members of the choir of Barton-street Chapel were most hospitably entertained, on Friday week, by Mrs. Margaret Price, at her residence, Pen Moel, which is beautifully situated on the banks of the Wye.

Ilkeston.—The Rev. E. A. Maley preached his farewell sermons on Sunday, prior to leaving Ilkeston, having accepted the Nantwich pulpit in succession to the Rev. J. Morley Mills, now of Bootle.

Liscard.—Last Sunday a meeting was held after evening service, at the Memorial Church, to bid farewell to Mr. F. S. Johnson, who has been from the first a loyal and enthusiastic worker in the church, and latterly has been a member of the committee and superintendent of the Sunday-school. On his leaving Liscard to undertake a business engagement in Hamburg, the congregation took the opportunity of presenting him with an illuminated address, bound in marbled calf, and expressing warm personal regard and appreciation of his services to the church. Mr. Johnson acknowledged the presentation with much feeling, and the meeting over which Mr. W. Woffenden presided was marked not only by cordial feeling, but by hopefulness for the future of the church.

London: Bermondsey.—The Harvest Thanksgiving services will be held on Sunday next, Sept. 30, at 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., when it is hoped that all friends of the Bermondsey Church will make an effort to be present. These services will conclude the temporary engagement of the Rev. D. Amos, who has conducted the church work during the past four months.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday next, at the morning service, Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar will give an address on "Where is Thy God?"

London: Ryll-street Domestic Mission.—On Wednesday evening a meeting was held in the hall of the Mission to welcome Mr. and Mrs. William Wilson, of Glasgow, Mr. Wilson having undertaken the charge of the Mission in succession to the Rev. J. Pollard. The chair was taken by Mr. P. M. Martineau, Chairman of the Domestic Mission Society, and there was a large attendance both of friends of the Mission and members of the congregation. A very hearty spirit pervaded the meeting, and the warmth of the applause which greeted every reference to Mr. Pollard showed in what grateful affection he is held by the friends whom he has served so devotedly since the foundation of the Mission twenty years ago. After the singing of the hymn, "Come, Kingdom of our God," letters of regret for absence and of welcome to Mr. Wilson were read by Dr. G. D. Hicks, the secretary, from Dr. Brooke Herford and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and the Chairman then offered a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, at the same time looking back at the past and speaking with much feeling of what the Mission had owed to Mr. Pollard. The Rev. J. Page Hopps then spoke, welcoming Mr. Wilson into the ministry. He congratulated the people of the Mission on having a Scotchman to follow a Lancashire man as their minister. He had known and loved Mr. Wilson's father in Glasgow, and he promised them that they would find in a Scotchman not only strength and determination, but the poetry which made the Scotch a lyric people, and a fund of deep, strong sympathy. They were to consecrate Mr. Wilson that night, not by any laying on of hands, but by the laying on of the love of their hearts; they must all feel that they had part in that consecration, the children as well as the elders. It was to a ministry in the spirit of Christ, who "went about doing good," that Mr. Wilson was to be devoted. With all his heart he welcomed Mr. Wilson to the work. The Rev. F. K. Freeston, on behalf of the London ministers, and Mr. Conway, on behalf of the workers of the Mission, joined in the welcome, and Mr. Wilson responded, gratefully acknowledging the kindness with which he had been received, and speaking with hopefulness of the work he was to undertake. Hitherto he had given his leisure to such beneficent work, and he was thankful to be able now to devote his life to it.

Newbury.—Harvest Festival Services were held in the Newbury Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday, Sept. 23, when the place was made beautiful, as befitted the occasion, by a lavish display of flowers and fruit. In the afternoon a Service of Song, with readings from the Book of Ruth, was given by the Sunday scholars to a gathering of their parents and friends. The preacher, morning and evening, was the minister, the Rev. E. Turland, whose subjects were—"In everything give thanks" and "The Joy of Harvest."

Padiham.—A Harvest Festival was celebrated on Sunday, Sept. 16, at Knight Hill Chapel. Flowers, fruit, and vegetables made the chapel very pretty, and several anthems were well sung by the choir during the day. In the morning the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed preached from the text, "Let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not," Gal. vi. 9. In the afternoon the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, of Burnley, preached a beautiful sermon from the text, "The church in thy house," Phile. 2. The preacher pointed out the necessity for having an altar at home, without which it would be no true home; and, indeed, without homes with altars in them there could be no true churches. In the evening the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed preached upon the Sun as the source of all the life known to man upon earth. The different harvest and other hymns were very heartily joined in by the large congregations.

Rhondda Vallies.—The open-air meetings, which were discontinued for a fortnight during the height of the holiday season, were resumed on Sept. 4, on the Strand-square at Ferndale, in the Rhondda Fach, where meetings were also held on the 11th and 18th inst. On each occasion the speakers—the Revs. Dr. Griffiths and D. Rees—addressed the crowd from the raised platform surrounding the central lamppost. On 7th and 14th inst. meetings were held at Treorchy, on the cross roads at the lower end of the main thoroughfare. At both places large crowds came together, and, on the whole, gave most attentive hearing. There has been a brisk demand for English Unitarian literature, which is distributed gratis, and the sale of Liberal pamphlets in the vernacular has been most satisfactory.

Rushall, Wilts.—On Sunday last, the 194th anniversary of the General Baptist Chapel was commemorated, when special services were conducted by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, Essex, Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly, who preached the anniversary sermon in the afternoon, and a Harvest Thanksgiving sermon in the evening. The congregations were larger than for several years past. On Monday a public meeting was held in chapel and schoolroom; a large number sat down to tea, friends from a distance being present. After tea a public meeting was held, Mr. W. Walker, J.P., of Trowbridge, in the chair, in who was to have presided. After an opening hymn and the unavoidable absence of Mr. F. Stratton, C.C., prayer, addresses were given by the Chairman and the following:—Revs. J. Wain (of Trowbridge), R. Moody (of Bottlesford), J. Keates (minister of Rushall), and J. A. Brinkworth. During these addresses a number of hymns were sung, and a collection was taken with which to purchase a further supply of hymn books. Mr. Brinkworth moved a resolution of condolence to the widow and family of the late assistant minister, Mr. John Elliott, of Trowbridge, who is greatly missed at Rushall; also to the Rev. R. Moody and family, of Bottlesford, in the sudden and great loss of their son, recently struck by lightning. The resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Keates, was passed in reverent silence, and Mr. Moody having responded, the meeting was closed by singing the Evening Hymn and Prayer.

Tamworth.—On Sunday last Harvest Services were held, which, in point of attendance and collections, were greatly in excess of late years. The choir gave anthems, "O Lord our Governor" (Vaughan), "Fear not O Lord" (Simper); "I will feed my Flock" (Simper), and the "Gloria," from Mozart. The services were conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. Howard, who preached appropriate sermons on "Not Bread Alone" and "The Bread of Life," showing how knowledge, character, sympathy, and fellowship enter into the building up our best life.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—A letter from Mr. Ion Pritchard will be found in another column, announcing the closing of this Fund on Oct. 10, and giving some account of the good use which has been made of it.

To commemorate the Bi-centenary of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., at the request of the congregation, has prepared a history of the chapel, which is now published in a substantial volume, with a number of good illustrations. A further notice of the book we must reserve until next week, but we take this opportunity of calling the attention of our readers to a valuable addition to the published records of our churches, and of reminding them at the same time of the Bi-centenary celebrations to be held at Sheffield on Thursday week, Oct. 18, and preceded on the Wednesday by the autumn meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE Rev. F. Allen, hon. sec. of the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties, writes to say that the L. B. and S. C. Railway Co. refuse to make any reduction in the fares to the members and friends of the Assembly for the journey to Horsham next Tuesday. The times of the trains will be found in the advertisement of the meeting. A cheap train runs at 8 A.M.

THE Baptist Union has met at Leicester during the week, and was welcomed by the Mayor (Ald. T. Windley), himself a Baptist, who so cordially welcomed the members of our National Conference in the spring. The hospitality even of Leicester was heavily taxed to find accommodation for fully 1,400 delegates (so the Christian World reports), and the members of our churches had once more the pleasure of reciprocating those kindnesses which in Leicester are happily so habitual between members of different religious communities. The opportunity of the great gathering was taken to lay foundation-stones of the new Robert Hall Memorial Church in the Narborough-road. The Rev. W. Cuff delivered his presidential address on Wednesday, dealing with three great religious movements of the century—the Scotch Secession of 1843, the Evangelical Free Church Federation, and the Twentieth Century Fund and the National Simultaneous Mission, which is to inaugurate the century. The Rev. Dr. A. Maclaren, at an earlier meeting, acknowledging a welcome from a deputation of the Free Church Council, said the day of forming new denominations was over. The centrifugal tendency had worked itself out, and the reverse movement had set in. They were all drawing nearer to one another. He did not want to break down denominational walls; they were not ripe for that, even if it were a good thing, which was problematical. But why should there be broken glass bottles on the top of the walls, and why must the walls be so high that no one was able to look over them? On Wednesday evening Dr. Clifford, in an impassioned speech, moved a resolution affirming the need for noble character in politicians, condemning war and militarism, and welcoming the principle of the Hague Conference, and referring to other urgent reforms. The resolution was seconded by the President, and enthusiastically carried.

AT the Church Congress last week the Bishop of Ripon gave an eloquent address on the progress of the Church during the century, taking also a wider view of the progress of Christianity in general. During the latter half of the century the Church of England has made especially rapid progress, if we may judge from the number of colonial and missionary bishoprics established. In the first fifty years twenty-three new bishoprics were founded, in the second fifty sixty-nine. Attempting to measure by figures the strength of Christianity, Dr. Carpenter estimated its adherents in 1800 as perhaps two hundred millions, and to-day at close upon five hundred millions; and the Christian nations now wield sovereign influence over eight hundred out of the fourteen hundred millions of the world's population. But what, we may sadly ask, is the worth of such figures, in the light of things that have been done by the dominant "Christian" nations, e.g., in the settlement of South Africa, and in that ghastly massacre of the Chinese on their borders—not fighting men, but even women and little children—by Russian forces, of which we so recently heard, and found it almost impossible to believe?

TAKING a survey of the progress of religious life in this country, the bishop thankfully recognised that after the time of trial to Christian thought in the last fifty years, with its conflict between science and faith, in which "harsh words were spoken, strange misunderstandings were somewhat needlessly fostered, the timidity of some who had knowledge, and the arrogance of some who had not, tended to embitter strife," knowledge has grown from more to more, and "reverence now dwells in the world of thought." And meanwhile there has been a great advance of home missionary activities, breaking through old conventional ways. Bishops have preached in omnibus yards and on railway trucks, theatre services have been held, "the cathedrals began to forget their dignified indifference," the Salvation Army and the Church Army have arisen, and innumerable societies for religious, educational, protective and rescue work, while during the last thirty years there has been a great enlargement of the scope of the Christian aim.

The religious impulse no longer confines itself to what was once called religious work; pious people do not now frown upon philanthropic work as being of secondary value and only humanitarian. Almost irresistibly the organisations which were started for a definitely spiritual object have been drawn into social channels. The Salvation Army has developed the social work in which it has achieved so marked a success; the Church Army has established its labour homes and its labour bureau. The homes for waifs and strays, industrial homes, and orphanages have sprung up all over the country. Settlements, as they are now called, were unknown twenty years ago; and in the direction in which Arnold Toynbee led the way there are now thirty-five of these settlements in the United Kingdom, and thirty-eight, I believe, in the United States. In these, men who cannot see their way to undertake the sacred ministry of the Church have found an outlet for the passion of service which has become a feature of our times.

WHILE much has been accomplished, the bishop yet concluded with an earnest appeal against too much self-gratulation or slackening of energy. While emancipation from slavery has been a great achievement of the century, in the British Empire and in America, and "the slaveries which wait upon civilisation have been greatly mitigated," much remains yet to be done—as, e.g., to make an end of the disgraceful overcrowding in great cities, and to advance the cause of temperance and purity. From one tendency of modern thought Dr. Carpenter drew special encouragement.

More and more the thought of Christ is uppermost in the minds of men. There are men who eschew the Churches, but who reverence the name of Christ and who try to frame their lives according to His teaching. There are men who differ from one another in theological matters, but who seem drawn irresistibly into friendliness and co-operation by their common love to Christ. The sermons and treatises which find the warmest welcome and the largest circulation are those which speak of the meaning of the personal life and teaching of Christ. Partisanship dies before the magic of His name. Let a few men join together and band themselves without any elaborate restrictions to endeavour to realise Christ's teaching in their lives, and lo! the little company in a short eleven years has grown into millions. Let a man propound in a slight narrative the question, "What would Jesus do?" and his book is sold by millions. Do not these things point the way of wisdom, of hope, and of courage? Churches, like souls, are saved by faith. Churches and nations, like individuals, work righteousness and achieve wonders by faith. If, therefore, we would face the future, and achieve that which God calls us to do, let us face it in the spirit and in the faith of Christ. Let us preach Christ in fuller, larger and more courageous fashion. Let us live Christ in simpler, more honest, and more trustful guise. Let us look for Christ outside the range of our own little plot, and strive to see Him as He moves in the great world around us.

The Evangelical Free Churches under the guidance of their vigorous Council are preparing to signalise the advent of the new century by a simultaneous Mission throughout the country. Referring to the Mission in last week's Christian World "J.B." welcomes the effort as likely to be an impressive demonstration of the essential unity of the English Protestant bodies, and adds that it may signalise the emergence of a new note in present-day preaching, a note of renewed confidence after the questionings which have so much occupied this generation, which will lead men to take up afresh "the almost forgotten rôle of soul-winners." What the Church needs now is, in his view, to recognise the existence of a vast, vague, floating sense of religion in the people of this country, which it must capture, actualise and develop. But the preacher's message of persuasion will be in a new spirit. "A dweller himself in the Divine Fatherhood which New Testament religion discloses, he will simply proclaim what he finds there, and invite others to settle in it." And his ultimate appeal will be not to the reason but to the will.

Let it be observed that this dealing with the will must not in our day repeat the barbarism of the past by taking the form of a bullying compulsion. The appeal to abject fear which has been the note of some forms of revivalism is, it is time now to recognise, a wholly immoral procedure, the ethical effects of which are as bad upon the weaklings who are coerced by it as upon the stronger whom it has stirred to indignant revolt. What the age wants is not crushed wills, but strengthened ones. There is nothing our generation needs so much as the reinforcement of its will-power, and it is the business of the spiritual persuader to provide it. In bringing our growing youth and often, indeed, our later manhood to the point where, in the conscious exercise of their own highest freedom, they reply with the soul's "I will" to the invitation to a higher life, he is enriching his age and his country with one of the most indispensable elements of its manhood.

The Sunday Society (of London) for upholding and extending the opening of Museums, Galleries, &c., on Sundays, held its third International Conference in Paris at the Palais des Sociétés Savantes, on Wednesday week, when Mr. Hodgson Pratt presided, and there was a good attendance. After an Address by the President, the following resolution was passed unanimously on the motion of Mr. Mark H. Judge:—

That this International Conference, convened by the Sunday Society of London, rejoices in the success which has attended the opening of the National Museums, &c. on Sundays in England, as it must conclusively prove to all thinking people that the provision of facilities on Sundays for the cultivation and enjoyment of Literature, Science and Art, including Music, is beneficial in all countries, and that this rational use of Sunday no more endangers the preservation of a weekly day of rest than the closing of Museums on Mondays in Paris is a danger to the industry of the people.

Among those who spoke were M. Dr. Henri Monod, Director of Hygiene for the Interior; M. Yves Guyot, late Minister of Public Works; M. Emile Macquart, Mr. Frederick Long, Mr. T. R. Marr, of Edinburgh, Mme. Vincent, Présidente de "l'Egalité," and Mme. Chapman. A second resolution, asking for statistics, was also passed.

At the autumnal conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Manchester last week the Essex Hall Temperance Association was represented by its treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S. Our local friends took part in the gatherings, and temperance sermons and addresses were arranged at Platt Chapel (Rusholme), Upper Brook-street, Lord-street (Oldham), Strangeways, and Queen's-road (Urmston). On the Saturday evening a conference of temperance workers in the Unitarian churches and schools of the district was held in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square. The Rev. W. Harrison, of Stalybridge, presided in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and a paper was read by Miss M. Ada Sale, of Northampton, on "Our Bands of Hope: Can they be made Greater Influences for Good?" The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. Sydney H. Street, B.A., F. A. Edwards and others.

THE SUDDEN DEATH.

O happy blessed way
To reach the Eternal Day,
Before dark age's night
Had touched you with its blight.
While still at work,
With unabated power
To go from Life to Light
In one short hour!

Some good people think that because self-sacrifice is a noble thing, every thing in which self is sacrificed must be good and right. But our views of sacrifice, like all others, are often dim and confused. Sometimes self is sacrificed most where it may appear to be giving up least, and sacrificed least when it seems to be giving up most.—Mrs. A. Hare.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.

Sir,—The news reaching us from India now tells of more hopeful prospects opening up, and although the bad times have not ended, yet the time seems to have come when it will be well to close the Fund opened in March last by the appeal of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, an appeal which has been generously responded to.

I therefore propose to close the Fund on Oct. 10 next, and to forward the balance of monies entrusted to me on the 12th.

I have in all received £2,422 3s. 0d., representing 531 individual donations, 56 Church or Chapel collections, 25 Sunday-school collections, and 22 private collections, and the whole of this, with the exception of £1 18s. 0d. for postage, has been forwarded to India. There have been no expenses whatever for printing or advertising, The Inquirer and Christian Life having generously, not only made known the existence and purpose of the Famine Fund without charge, but have gratuitously enabled me to acknowledge the donations received.

I have inserted from time to time short reports from Mr. A. M. Bose, President of the Brahmo Somaj, telling how the monies were being expended, and a full account will be published on completion of the work, at the end of October, according to the latest intimation from Calcutta.

Relief has been distributed over a very wide district—indeed, along various channels, and in many different ways. The modes of assistance have been as follows:—Distribution of small sums periodically by home visitors, also of food, drinking water, clothing, medicine and doctor's attendance. In some places free kitchens have been started, supplying rice and pulse, costs of burial provided, and many orphans have been taken charge of.

To do all this many workers have been required, and all of us here, though we may practically know little of the fearful distress and suffering, must acknowledge and appreciate the unselfishness and perseverance of the members of the Brahmo Somaj, who have undertaken and carried through the relief work.

The efficiency of the work done, and the assistance afforded by the Famine Fund have been acknowledged by Government officials, and, further, it has been recognised as a means of, to some extent, drawing a little closer in thought and sympathies those who have contributed help, those who have been engaged in its distribution, and the famine-stricken people themselves.

The amount last acknowledged was—

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

I.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Soon after St. Michael's Day, 1850, a storm arose in the moral world, so furious as to demand some great explanation. It increased from day to day and spread from place to place, without remission, almost without lull for the space of nearly two years. Every party in the body politic was subjected to its influence—from the Queen on the throne down to the little ones in the day-school. The ten thousands of the constituency, the sum total of Protestant sects, the aggregate of religious societies and associations, the great body of established clergy in town and country, the bar, and even the medical profession, even literary and scientific circles, every class, every interest, every fireside gave tokens of this ubiquitous storm. What was it all about? Against what was it directed? What wonder had happened adequate to the burden of so vast an effect?

Such (with a few merely verbal changes to adapt it to the purpose of this article) is the account given by John Henry Newman of the Roman Catholic revival of the middle of this century*; and he answers the question he has asked thus:—"The English Church was, and the English Church was not, and the English Church is once again. This is the portent worthy of a cry. It is the coming of a second spring; it is a restoration in the moral world, such as that which yearly takes place in the physical."

The old men among us will remember that "No Popery" agitation to which those eloquent words allude. I was one of the little boys at the day-school of whom the preacher speaks, and I can bear witness that I was not protected by my tender age from the effects of the storm of vituperation and alarm which stirred all England against the Roman invasion, when the hierarchy was re-established under Cardinal Wiseman.† Memory still faintly recalls walls chalked with the words which Punch's famous cartoon made ridiculous, and I can dimly hear again stirring denunciations from the pulpit of "The Scarlet Woman." But all this excitement and indignation was an encouragement to fervent Catholics. It was at least a recognition of their existence and their power. The fact that they were recognised as formidable proved that they were no longer contemptible. The long dark winter through which they had lain still, and scarce maintained their faith alive under the gloomy skies of social and political outlawry, had come to an end. They stepped out into the sunshine and lo! it was spring. What mattered the keen East wind, though it did cut to the bone; are not March winds harbinger unmistakeable of summer coming?

The Catholic Revival is indeed one of the great events of this great century. To write the story of it would require more knowledge than I am in the way of obtaining, and the history would occupy a volume if worthily told. For the purpose of this article I must needs be content to give some brief hints as to what sort of winter it was which had preceded, and what kind of disappointing summer followed this "second spring," this "anxious time of hope and fear; of joy and suffering, of bright promise and budding hope" which had come, unlooked for, undreamt of, to the Roman community in this land.

By the beginning of the century the wintriest days of the old faith had past. The gratitude with which the Relief Act of 1778 was received as "an extraordinary favour," and the praise given to the ministry for "great humanity" in passing it, measure for us the depth of humiliation to which adherents of what had been the religion of all Englishmen had by that time sunk. The Act relieved them, indeed, from certain most grievous penalties, but "even then Roman Catholic priests and schoolmasters" (so it was urged by the Solicitor-General in defence of the Bill) "would not be left at liberty to exercise their functions; but would still under the restriction of former laws be liable to a year's imprisonment, and to the punishment of a heavy fine." The penalty under the Act of William III., which this repealed, was imprisonment for life!

In 1791 there followed further relief of "Papists, or persons professing the Popish religion" from certain penalties and disabilities, and it was provided that on taking a prescribed oath of loyalty, it should be lawful for them to be present at or perform "religious observances of the Popish religion," the place and the person officiating therein having been duly certified at Quarter Sessions. The place must not have a steeple or bell, the person must not wear any distinctive dress outside of it, nor under heavy penalty might he officiate at a funeral in any churchyard. Religious orders remained under strict prohibition, as also any foundation or endowment for the purpose of Roman Catholic education.

It was in the year following on this timid and grudging relief from gross injustice that Protestant England was led to offer generous hospitality and fearless welcome to foreigners exiled from their country for their adherence to this same Popish faith. In 1792 a decree passed the French Legislative Assembly for the exile of all priests who would not take the revolutionary oath, and after the atrocious massacres of September began the flight to England, which resulted in some 8,000 priests taking up their home on this island for several years. Members of religious orders followed from both France and Belgium, and were all alike received with open arms; the rights of property and liberty assailed in their persons, for the time, obscuring to the English people the wrongs of their belief. A national subscription was raised for their support, and the House of Commons, on the proposal of William Pitt, granted an annuity of £20 a year to each one of the exile priests. It was not till the first year of this century that they were free to return to their native land, many had made themselves a new home and chose to stay here; but their residence among us, whether for a few years or for life, had had the effect of familiarising the English people with the customs and manners, if not with the doctrines, of Roman Catholics. Hitherto they had feared them as would-be persecutors, descendants of the bigots who had kindled the fires of Smithfield, they had now made their acquaintance as men persecuted for religion and loyalty, who suffered in a cause for which England was pouring out its treasure and its blood.

And yet it was little the poor French clergy could effect towards ameliorating the position of their co-religionists in England. An address to Parliament in defence of them against certain accusations of extensive proselytism, speaks of them as "mostly half-starved and half-naked poor people, in spite of the generosity of Government, on account of the smallness of their allowance and the dearth of provisions, ill-qualified for making converts." Indeed, there was little of sympathy or respect in the feeling commonly entertained towards them, they were objects of pity not unmixed with contempt, and the pity felt for them was not needed and would not have been appreciated by English Catholics. These had fallen so low during generations of persecution that they accepted the penalties and privations, which were consequent upon their profession of an unpopular faith, almost without protest. If, however, any hopes of better treatment were entertained in consequence of the courteous reception of the French refugees, they were blighted in the very first year of the new century, for in March, 1801, Pitt resigned office because the King would not allow him to bring forward a Catholic Relief Bill, and when he returned to power five years later it was on the distinct understanding that the question should not be re-opened. This same year, 1801, was born of pious Evangelical parents the little boy who was to be the most illustrious champion of the Roman Church our country has produced. But there was no Simeon in the early years of the century who might recognise in the nursery Newman and two younger boys destined to become celebrated as English cardinals, and predict how they were to gain for themselves and their Church a respect to which Catholics had long been unaccustomed. Meanwhile their condition was poor and despised. In the sermon from which I have already quoted the preacher appeals to the assembled prelates, whether they cannot bear witness from within as he does from without, "to the fact of the utter contempt into which Catholicism had fallen by the time that we were born." There was no Church in the country but only "a few adherents of the Old Religion, moving silently and sorrowfully about, as memorials of what had been—a mere handful of individuals, here a set of poor Irishmen, there an elderly person grave and solitary and said to be of noble family." Like the first Christians, they had been forced to shun the light, and were to be "found in corners and alleys and cellars and the housetops, or in the recesses of the country, cut off from the world around them. So feeble had they become, so utterly contemptible in the eyes of the high Protestants, the lords of the land they lived in."

Of such a family Mrs. Humphry Ward has given us a graphic and truthful description in what is to my mind the best of all her good books, "There was no priest in the house then," says Helbeck telling Laura about his mother, "and very few services in the chapel. Through all her young days nothing could be poorer or raggeder than English Catholicism. On Sundays my father used to read prayers in the chapel, which was half a lumber room. I often think no Dissent could have been barer. . . . The men were full of character and often full of ability. But there was no outlet—and a wretched education." All posts of honour and usefulness in which they might have been serviceable to their country or their county were closed against them. "So they lived to themselves and by themselves; they didn't choose to live with their Protestant neighbours—who had made them outlaws and inferiors! And of course they sank in manners and refinement."

† The Papal Edict of 1850, by which Great Britain was divided up into territorial bishoprics, under Cardinal Wiseman as Archbishop of Westminster, led to the passing of the Ecclesiastical Tithes Assumption Act of 1851, which declared the Edict null and void, and imposed penalties on anyone acting upon it. No prosecution, however, followed, and in 1871 the Act was repealed.

From Father Amherst's "History of Catholic Emancipation,"* I learn — as well as much else here made use of—that "there were few chapels out of London in which High Mass was ever celebrated; in the Midland District there was not one. There was in all this district only one cope; it belonged to Bishop Milner, but he hardly ever wore it. Catholics hardly ever spoke of mass, but used the word prayers instead." I have myself seen the pastoral staff of this same Milner, a man whose indomitable energy, in spite of discouragement and disappointment on all sides, even from the Pope himself, did much to win the eventual relief of 1829; it is of wood, such as any joiner might fashion, and is provided with a cover of silver cloth to be drawn on like a skin for grand occasions, and to be carefully laid by after use. I have seen, too, the old Moorgate-street Chapel, the Pro-Cathedral of Cardinal Wiseman. It was fitted with high pews without central aisle, just like any Dissenting place of worship, save for its altar and a few pictures round the walls. Assuredly it was not, as is sometimes asserted, the love of music and ceremonial which brought about the revival of Romanism, for it was little of either was to be had in the "mass house," as it was popularly called in the earlier years of this century.

Nor were prospects immediately bettered by the Emancipation Act.† Indeed I have been told that old families who up to then had professed the old faith as bound in honour to it, while it was persecuted, abandoned it openly when they could no longer be accused of doing so through unworthy motives. But the influence of the Act could not but make itself felt in time both on Catholics and Protestants. The former took courage and ventured on a more open display and defence of their religion; they had their champions now in Parliament and could compel a respect never conceded to them before. The latter could not but learn something, however imperfectly, of the religion of men with whom they were for the first time brought into daily association, as their equals in all civic rights and occupying positions of trust under the Crown. And, while this gradual assimilation into citizenship of those who had long been barely tolerated was in process, came the great increase of the Catholic population in consequence of the potato famine in Ireland; thence came hundreds of thousands seeking work and bread, filling the lanes and courts of our great manufacturing towns, and bringing with them the faith of their country. Simultaneously another movement was going on at Oxford, wholly unconnected with such vulgar considerations as that of a starving peasantry, yet destined to unite with it, and with its clear stream at once swell and purify the turbid and turbulent waters of the Irish immigration. "Providence," writes an English clergyman of liberal tendencies, "has brought these things together, and has made Oxford contribute abundantly to the spiritual needs of the poorest Roman Catholics, on the very eve of losing its own distinctively religious character." *

So had come about the wonderful change in the position of English Catholics which Newman hailed in glowing words. "Has the whole course of history a like to show? I recollect no paralled to it. What, those few scattered worshippers, the Roman Catholics, to form a Church! Shall the past be rolled back? Shall the grave open? Shall the Saxons live again to God?" No wonder high and daring hopes filled the hearts of men who had seen so much accomplished in so short a time. So few years had passed since the preacher had himself denounced the Church of which he had become so distinguished an ornament! so short a time ago there was no sign to encourage any but the most far-seeing! Why should the process be arrested now or not rather go on the faster till, as spring changes so rapidly in May-time to summer, England should be won back to her ancient allegiance and reconciled with the Holy See? There were many besides those, whose wish was father of the thought, to whom the conversion of England seemed a not improbable outcome of tendencies then manifestly at work; very many Protestants who were as alarmed at the prospect as Catholics were enthusiastic.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since that famous sermon was preached. I think no one was wise enough to foresee the actual movements which have taken place in the religious world. It is the cause which Newman and Manning deserted, the cause whose weakness they exposed by what still seem to us outsiders irrefutable arguments, the cause which they seemed for awhile to have discredited and almost ruined by the reproach they brought upon it of being only "the half-way house" on the way to Rome, it is this which has become the most successful religious movement of the century. Puseyism, Tractarianism, Ritualism, the movement which owes to Newman its first impetus, prevails now in the Church which tried to suppress it, and over the Dissent which ridiculed and anathematised it. The comparative, and probably only temporary, failure of the extremer forms of it, such as would have been mercilessly condemned by its earlier founders, is apt to blind us to the immense success which it has already achieved. The Evangelical party is almost extinct, the Broad Church has allied itself in great measure with its once most strenuous opponents, the clergy have become sacerdotalists almost to a man, and services which would have caused a riot less than fifty years ago take place without notice in thousands of popular churches. This is, I believe, one reason why the promise of "the second spring" of the Roman Church in England has had but a poor fulfilment. Its summer has come, but it is a cold, rainy season, there is little sunshine, and the blossoms which showed so fair do not ripen into fruit. There is great progress doubtless, and statistics make a favourable show. A list of more or less notable converts of the last half century reaches to over a thousand. The late Lord Chief Justice of England and six of Her Majesty's judges belong to the Church whose members were at the beginning of the century excluded from the Bar. There were in the last Parliament seventy-three Catholic members who, had they lived before 1829, could not have been so much as voters in England. Eighteen are members of the Privy Council. In Greater London there are over one hundred churches, in some of which services are celebrated with a magnificence which could not be surpassed. For four Vicars who formally governed England in the name of the Holy See there are now sixteen bishops, each with his cathedral and his chapter. Priests number over 2,300. Religious orders of men and women, which continued to be prohibited even under the Relief Act of 1791, are to be found of every kind, ancient and modern, and in every diocese. It would be easy to collect from the "Catholic Year Book" further statistics of schools, colleges, confraternities, and agencies of all kinds for maintaining and propagating the faith. Statements of this kind may be grateful to the enthusiastic Catholic and sound formidable to Protestant ears, yet I cannot think that the elation of the one is better justified than is the apprehension of the other. The progress made in the last half-century, while considerable in itself, must be disappointing to those who looked for the return of England to its old faith. Individuals, some of them personages of distinction by rank or intellect, have joined the Church; but there has been no accession of multitudes, nor has the enthusiasm of the revival been maintained. "With every desire to make allowances, I must deliberately say that the action of the young Catholic men of England at the present day is mere idleness and sloth as compared with the energetic action of their fathers"—so writes a Jesuit father who has lived through two generations and witnessed the work of each; and he quotes the opinion of "a layman in every way qualified to judge, that the Catholic youth of this day is as worldly as his Protestant neighbour, and disinclined to give up any of his time beyond his own personal enjoyment." We Unitarians often lament the want of enthusiasm among us, and explain it at times by our lack of a definite creed and our making light of differences of belief. Yet here the same phenomenon presents itself under circumstances of the most opposite character; it is among those who believe in hell, and believe in their Church as the only ark of salvation in a perishing world, that this indifference is confessed and lamented. The fact is enthusiasm is neither excited by intellectual assent to a creed, nor hindered for want of creed. It depends upon wholly other conditions which it is not the place of this article to investigate. But that there is no marked enthusiam among English Catholics of to-day is evident enough, and that without it they will never make much progress among English people they would themselves assert. Whether with the utmost zeal and devotion the conversion of England were a task within the limits of sober hope, or serious apprehension, it is not under present circumstances of any use to discuss.

CHANNING AN APOSTLE OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

BY WILLIAM CHANNING GANNETT.*

II.

"An Apostle of the Spiritual Life." And what was his message? Shall we let him tell it himself? "The character of God as an Infinite Fulness and Fountain of Perfection, who has no other end in creation than to communicate His own life to His children—is not this the truth of truths?" And again, "One sublime idea has taken strong hold of my mind—the greatness of the soul, its divinity, its union with God by spiritual likeness." These two ideas were the two foci around which swept the whole curve of his reverence, so of his utterance. The humanity of God, the divinity of man, we might call them. These two ideas, in substance but one, the Supremacy of Character in God and in man—these, this, forever repeated, forever applied, made his sermons a lofty monotone; but it was the music of spheres. The supremacy of character in God: "Not because His will is irresistible, but because His will is the perfection of virtue, we pay Him allegiance." The supremacy of character in Jesus: "The ground of love to Christ is his spotless purity, his moral perfection, his unrivalled goodness—the resplendent image of the rectitude of God." The supremacy of character in man: "The grand heresy is to substitute anything—whether creed or form or church—for character, for goodness, which is essentially, everlastingly, and by its own nature lovely, glorious, divine." Therefore, "in ourselves are the elements of the Divinity." "All minds are of one family"—a frequent refrain. "Nothing in Jesus to which men might not ascend." "The soul an image of the infinity of God." Read his two sermons called "Likeness to God" and "Imitableness of Christ's Character," and you will read the very heart of the man and of Unitarianism. In this kinship of the soul with God he finds the root of religion, the root of the faith in immortality, the foundation of brotherhood among men, and the assurance of a kingdom of heaven yet to come upon earth. On this same kinship, also, on reverence for Reason and Conscience as divine in their nature, he bases the right and the duty of Reason in Religion. Channing believed in the miraculous Revelation; but Reason must not only interpret the Revelation, but must judge it. Here are bold words for his time, and he often said the like: "The truth is, and it ought not to be disguised, that our ultimate reliance is and must be on our own reason. I am surer that my rational nature is from God than that any book is an expression of His will." Nay, more: "Is it presumptuous to judge of our Creator? He himself has made this our duty in giving us a moral faculty, and has consequently waived His own claims on our veneration and obedience any farther than He discovers himself to us in characters of benevolence, equity, and righteousness. . . . We would owe no allegiance to such a Maker as Calvinism teaches. The wrong would lie on the side of the Creator."

This is a hint of his message—the barest hint. Is it "mere ethics"? That was not the name for it in his own day. Then it was, most of it, blasphemy and the abomination of desolation of error. Thirty years ago, perhaps, it had become "mere ethics." To-day I think it would be recognised as "spiritual life" by multitudes in a generation that has asked itself, "If the aspiration to God and the imitation of God is 'mere ethics,' what is the 'spiritual life'?" And if, instead of disjecta membra like these, we go to the books themselves, and see, as it were, the bowed head and the kindling face and the glow in the eyes and the hush in the tone, as the speaker speaks on of the Father, of Jesus, of the Soul, of Christianity, then, I am sure, the common religious judgment to-day would be, "Whatever the errors of thought, this is an illumined spirit, and one of the friends of God." Indeed, in many quarters to-day such sentences as I have quoted—the characteristic emphases of Channing—seem but resonant commonplaces. But how have they become so? Not least through Channing himself. His only rival in making such faiths commonplace in America is Emerson. If the stories told are true, both have been credited by leaders not of their own kind with making the pulpits of America "monotonous."

But in his own days these faiths and their reiteration, and his emphasis on them and his rapture in them, made Channing of necessity a religious reformer. The popular Trinitarianism of that day was almost tritheism; yet that was a little matter compared with the immoral, inhuman character of God which the reigning Calvinism taught. Even this would not have led Channing to break silence, had not the Calvinism in Massachusetts become suddenly aggressive, and forced the fight on the quiet liberals. Then, in simple loyalty to Reason and Conscience as God's own light in our souls, Channing, sensitive, shrinking, cautious as he was, felt as one summoned. He could but obey, and stood forth to defend the soul's liberty against the spirit of denunciation and sect and the presumption of creed. Four times during the fifteen years of controversy his words rang over the field, calm, clear, strong; and men understood what "Unitarianism" meant. The story is not to be told here; and, wherever told, there is much to be said in extenuation for both sides. But, as for Channing himself, his methods as a leader in the defence were perfect. By nature he was neither controversialist nor organiser. He indulged in no personalities: his affirmation to his negation was as a thousand to one, but the negation was clear when it came. He would have nothing to do with a new sect formation. Nothing that he wrote of a controversial nature remains unpublished, says his biographer and the published papers are hardly a dozen in number. Through all the stormy time he apparently did not carry to his own pulpit one single sermon about the controversy. What a calm of soul, what nobility of judgment, what true proportioning of values, that implies! And what could be better test of the spiritual quality in a man?

Is it strange—or, rather, not strange, but natural—that this man I describe, "with scarce body enough to anchor his soul to the earth," should find power in himself at the end of his life to make for himself a third career, bearing the same attestation of spiritual force? From his young days onward Channing was preacher: in mid-life he was religious reformer, in the last fifteen years of his life he was also social reformer. It is not strange, at all events, this being so, that these last years were the gay-hearted, happiest years of his life. As he grew old, he grew young, visibly young. His friends noticed the change, as he did himself. "The longer I live, the more I enjoy, and the more I have to do. I never hoped so strongly and so patiently." Probably nothing does so freshen a soul and exhilarate it as facing evil to better it. All his endeavour, all his assurance in this direction, sprang, again, from his "one sublime idea"—the nobility of the human soul. All that he said for self-culture, for the elevation of those who labour with their hands, for temperance, for peace, for the abolition of slavery, was but this central idea in practical application. "What, strike a man!" was his argument against flogging in the navy. "The essential evil of intemperance is the voluntary extinction of reason." "The ground of a man's culture lies in his nature, not in his calling. Man is a greater name than president or king." "You Abolitionists take your stand on the unutterable worth of every human being, and on his inalienable rights as a rational, moral, and immortal child of God." Channing had much to do with forming Boston's reputation for generous charities, and the uplifting of the poor he suggested as the Unitarian's special mission. The spirit of philanthropy was not characteristic of Puritanism, and part of his success was to change the climate of New England in this respect.

Necessarily, he was an optimist, one of the world's great optimists. How could he be otherwise, when all his hope was based on his two convictions—the goodness of God and the unutterable worth of the human soul? The establishment of the kingdom of heaven on earth is a foreordination to such a man, even as it was to the expectation of Jesus. And, like Jesus, Channing loved to predict its coming. He fully expected a "new Reformation," a "new Christianity," that would revolutionise society and create relations among men not dreamed of in his day; and his very last public words, the close of his Lenox address on "Emancipation in the West Indies," was a jubilant pæan of welcome to the "new feeling of brotherhood," of which he discerned the signs in his times.

Such a man was our Channing, Ours? Nay, he belongs not to us Unitarians: he belongs to the Church Universal, and only to us as we belong to it. That was the only church that he himself cared to belong to. He bore our name, and, as long as the name brought stripes, was more than willing to bear it; but he died outstretching his hand to the heretic Parker, and turning away in his heart from the Unitarianism that he saw organising itself around him.

"I am little of a Unitarian," was the increasing note of his discontent, as he felt the stagnancy growing. "Unitarianism," he said, "must undergo important developments. Though an advance on previous systems, and bearing some better fruits, it does not work deeply, does not strike living springs in the soul. It began as a protest against the rejection of reason, against mental slavery. It pledged itself to progress as its life and its end; but it has gradually grown stationary, and now we have a Unitarian Orthodoxy." All the more prophet for us, all the more our very own prophet, for that word of thine, Channing! May we be the sons of thy prophecy, more even than sons of thy own far attainment! In these days, when the word in the air, when the word in our hearts, is "organise," let us remember that Channing's word to us still would be "spiritualise." Be it ours, if wisdom be given us, to reconcile the two words; but, whenever the tests come—as they do come to religious associations as well as to individuals—and we must choose between the two words, let us remember that Channing's choice and his counsel would ever be "spiritualise."

Is our prophet's influence passing? In a way it has passed already, in another way it has but begun; for there is influence that is

> The sweet presence of a good diffused,
> And in diffusion ever more intense.

That there are transient elements in Channing's thought, in his theology, goes without saying. The simple fact that he lived and thought before the star of "Evolution" had mounted the sky, before the deeps of the spirit contained in the idea of "Immanence" had been stirred, as of late, and before historic criticism had fairly set in, accounts for all that. The wonder is that his own thought carried so much implication of Evolution and Immanence. I need not dwell on the transient elements in him, need not point out that he was no widely read scholar, hardly a critic, no trained logician or philosopher. Martineau suggests that the very slightness of his culture in these directions delivered him over the more to his own direction, his own originality. He was an apostle of the spiritual life and its culture. Not "Channing Unitarianism," but the Channing spirit, the Channing attitude, the Channing ideals, are what the world wants and will cherish, no more outgrowing these than it outgrows the central secret of Jesus. To us, the Unitarian body, he was, he is, our Father-in-God. To us, diciples of Emerson, Transcendentalists of America, he was the prophet of morn. To our brothers, the New Orthodox family, they of the many names and the rising communion, he is, if a heretic still, a heretic for whom the stones have turned into roses, and fear into reverence and gratitude and blessing. To them and to all who belong to the fellowship of the Spirit the world over he is to-day held among the elect and the canonised saints.

His youngest summer of all was the last, that of the pæan at Lenox. That was the one summer he spent by the hills instead of the sea. There on the hills, with face lit by the sunset, he died. His last words, caught in the ear of a friend, were, "I have received many messages from the Spirit." Amen, great soul, humble soul, we still listen! May it be ours to nobly interpret!

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

Sir,—Having in view the indiscriminate conventionalisms which are just as common amongst ourselves as they are in other denominations, it seems clear that if personal authority could settle any such question at all, the combined names of Mr. Hargrove and Mr. Clayden would go far towards settling even the seemingly endless question of "the Unitarian name" both for our churches and our ministers. Happily, or unhappily, however, no such authority can avail among us either on this or any other subject, in the long run, at any rate; and if there were any danger of any such settlement in one direction, all we should need to do would be to set one personal authority against another, and thus restore matters to the status quo ante, as, for instance, we might do in the present case by opposing the personal authority of Mr. Darbishire to that of Mr. Hargrove and Mr. Clayden.

Meanwhile the somewhat sudden conversion, or rather decision, of Mr. Hargrove and the more gradual turnover of Mr. Clayden are both alike profoundly interesting from more points of view than one has either time or wish to dwell upon. Looking at the geographical, ecclesiastical, physiological, and psychological suggestions and implications of Mr. Hargrove's letters on this old controversy, I cannot help saying that the whole case might well be summed up thus far by a single confession, found near the end of Horace Bushnell's fine book on "Vicarious Sacrifice," "Lord we have wandered far and found little." I mean, in this connection, "found little" absolutely, of course, not relatively; for, considering what, on his own showing, Mr. Hargrove's past attitude towards "beastly" dissent in general and towards his own doubly-dissenting fellowship in particular has been, and what it now is, the discoveries which seem small to some of us, are, to him, the successful adventures of another Columbus. Still, they do not, even so, so much as touch the subject of the vital principle that underlies the real question in hand, and, apart from changes in principle, these mere changes in the personal or geographical phenomena can settle nothing whatever that is essential.

The case of Mr. Clayden differs from that of Mr. Hargrove in mere circumstances, but in mere circumstances only. It is none the less specially curious to read of Mr. Clayden's past troubles with the alternative name "Free Christian" and its belongings, and to study the influence of such troubles in leading him, in his riper years, back to "the Unitarian name." Surely, to say the least of it, it was a prime instance of escaping "out of the frying-pan into the fire," when Mr. Clayden, with his well-known great and versatile gifts, thus gave up one name because he failed to explain it to anxious inquirers, in favour of another whose meaning is yet to be sought after, and that, too, after, at least, a century and a quarter of the patient toils and heroic adventures of no end of explorers. One can only add that, while tastes still differ, methods of procedure are still all but endless.

For the rest there will remain a considerable number of readers of The Inquirer not at all convinced in the direction in which two of our most distinguished men have, at length, and at last, thus been led to travel. With all due deference to the two gentlemen to whom I have thus ventured to refer, I must, personally, own that those of us who, like Mr. Darbishire, have hitherto conscientiously and steadily persisted in discarding all sectarian and sectional names, in obedience to a great principle with which no such name can ever be reconciled, may well go on our way rejoicing in the determination not to become ourselves "traitors" to a great cause, though without the shadow of a desire to judge any of our brethren who may continue to differ from us.

HELPERS WANTED.

Sir,—Arrangements have been made for recommencing the services at the Public Hall, Kirkdale, Sydenham, on Sunday evening, 14th inst. It is earnestly hoped that friends living in the neighbourhood will, by their presence and practical sympathy, help to make the services a permanent success. If those who can sing will aid us in the musical part of the worship, they will render invaluable assistance. We want to make the services bright and inspiring. In the past we hired a piano for accompaniment, but we should prefer a small harmonium. If any church or friend could lend one, or better still make us a present of one, it would be most acceptable.

All communications should be sent to me as early as possible.

POSTAL MISSION RELIGIOUS CONFERENCES.

Sir,—May I be allowed to remind friends of the Postal Mission that our monthly Conference takes place next Sunday afternoon at five o'clock, at College Chapel, Stepney-green. The subject, "The Religion of Unitarians not a mere Negation," will be introduced by Mr. Morton Barnes, B.A. Cantab., a recent convert to Unitarianism, who has undergone some persecution on account of his open avowal of Unitarian principles. We hope that there will be a good gathering at this Conference.

At a time when there is a persistent effort to stifle the expression of liberal thought both in religion and politics, we ought to hold out a friendly hand, and encourage those who have the courage to express their convictions, and to live them out. More particularly we Unitarians whose traditional motto is "civil and religious liberty, all the world over."

Those of us engaged on Postal Mission work repeatedly come across instances of petty persecutions suffered by those who avow Unitarian principles. Only a few weeks ago two young Methodists wrote us word that they were turned out of their home on account of their conversion to Unitarianism, and they are now battling their way alone in one of the provincial towns. Nurses, teachers, and others who qualify for special posts know how detrimental it is to success in their career to be a Unitarian. The Unitarian who is silent, or who will give money and support to orthodox and Conservative causes, gets along pretty well, but the outspoken and consistent Unitarian is boycotted, and persecuted.

Let us all do what we can, both by word and deed, to bring about a different state of things. Let us be ever ready to give a warm and hearty welcome to those who join our unpopular cause, and let us be unceasing in sowing the seeds of Christian gentleness and charity which must in the end conquer hatred and bitterness and sectarian narrowness.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Christ the Revealer," by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom.

If Faith is the result not of logical argument, but of spiritual experiences, how is it to be produced in those who simply avow that they have no such experiences? By no process of reasoning can you put other men in possession of your feelings. If the manifestation of God that moved us will not move them, we have no other means at our command. If a man is insensible to the religious power of the external universe, of the mountains or of the midnight sky—if these awaken in him no spiritual emotions, Logic will not help him. We can but present again and again the influence that quickened the sense of God in ourselves, striving to remove whatever might intercept its action. We can argue no man into a spiritual experience, into a consciousness of God—we can only strive to bring him into real contact with the objects—Nature and holy men of the order of the Prophets—which in our own case were powerful to produce it. And hence the importance of keeping our souls in much intercourse with those whom He has endowed with the fuller measures of His Spirit. The invisible Realities of God, the spiritual affections of our Nature, the thirst for goodness, for holiness, for the perfect peace of love and self-forgetfulness, lie often long hidden and obscured in the depths of the conscience, and it may be that only the intense Life of some earnest and powerful spirit can reach below the surface, get beneath the deadness of our habits, and touch us to the quick. The force and reality with which spiritual affections are expressed in the life of another is often the awakening power that reveals us to ourselves: and he is the greatest Revealer of God who makes us conscious that we have in ourselves some germs of the attributes of our Heavenly Father. He who by the spiritual attraction he exerts can throw us into frames of pure desire, of patience, of prayer, of inward contentment, of deep confidingness—he it is who has unveiled the Image in which we were made, and drawn us nigh to the Father's presence.

It is the grace that is in another, that first stirs our sense of moral beauty; the holiness that is in another that awakens our reverence; the dignity, and sweetness, and might of gentleness in another that chastens the natural passions, makes us feel the power that lies in forbearance, and transfigures our whole type of spiritual greatness. Every one knows what power there is even in a tone of voice, in an eye, in a flitting expression of countenance, to search us through, to find our secrets hidden even from ourselves and call them up for judgment, to strip off disguises, to expose, rebuke, cover with shame and confusion, or to let in the most healing light of sympathy, to awaken new purposes, a new consciousness of the strength that God has put into us, and of the encouragement He has vouchsafed us.

And if there is need of its vivid manifestation in another to give distinctness and action to each one of the several lineaments of God in us, much more must it need the harmonised presence of them all in some one perfected human being to enable us to understand their living union, their symmetrical co-existence and proportion, the full beauty of their mutual adjustment and reconciliation. This is the power and function of Christ. This, indeed, is the great Atonement. This is the harmony of the Divine Character itself which men never could conceive until in Christ they saw the Image of it in Human Nature.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Letter from God.

All of you who are old enough to have them sent you are very fond indeed of receiving letters. When father and mother are away on a holiday, or some older brother or sister has gone abroad, few things are more delightful than reading the news they send us through the post. As we look at the writing we seem to hear the well-known voice speaking to us, just as though the owner were close by our side. So long as we can receive letters from our friends we never feel really separated from them, no matter how many miles of land or sea may be between us. Although distance is the chief cause of letters passing to and fro, it is not the only cause. Sometimes grown-up people get letters from people living in the next street, or even only one door away. When a matter of great importance has to be dealt with, people often feel it is best to write down all they have to say rather than trust to conversation. Again, when we have to speak to anyone who is deaf, often it happens that the very best way of saying what we want is by writing it.

Now look at the line at the top of this column—"A Letter from God." Yes, we may say that God writes letters, and writes them to us. You must not think that it is because God is far away that He has to write to us. That is a mistake that ever so many people (grown-up as well as little) are always making; God is never far away. He is always close to us, nearer than our friends, nearer, in fact, than anything we know; the air we breathe and the very limbs of our bodies are further away from us than God, as one of the best poets has said—

Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

Nor is it because He cannot speak to us directly that God writes letters, for, as I expect you all know, God does speak to us directly in what we call "conscience," that voice we hear in our own hearts which always bids us choose the good. In other ways God speaks directly to people, and some hear Him even more plainly than we hear each other. But besides this direct speaking there are the letters God has written, always close about us, filled with the most beautiful and important things, for us quietly to read and learn.

The flower blossoming in your garden is one of these letters from God; not a very long one, but a very beautiful and important one. Men have been trying to read the letter written in each flower, and they have not read it all yet. You can read a little if you look at the flower and think about it, that is to say if you "consider" it. You can see it says that God is living, that God is wishing you to know He loves beauty, and also that He wants you to feel that He takes care of everything He has made, and is quite sure to take care of you.

The stars also are letters written by God, very long ones, that we can read and read and read and yet never reach the last word; one of the important things written in them is the fact that days and years and centuries which seem to us such a long time are of very little account with God.

The sky is one large sheet full of God's writing; as we look at the clouds and think about them we become more and more able to understand what it is they are meant to say to us. The same with the rainbow, and the darkness of night. Many more things, in fact, all things in the universe, if properly understood, turn out to be letters from God.

And now I want you to think of the most interesting and valuable letter of all; it is the longest, and is at the same time both the easiest and the most difficult to read of all that He sends—yourself. You are a letter from God. Sent first to your parents and close relatives, to tell them how God has thought about them and cared for them, and how He wants them to learn to be patient and forgiving, gentle and loving. Then you are sent as a letter to all the rest of the world, to all who know you or see you or ever hear about you, to tell the same message and perhaps something else. As you grow up, the letter God has written in you should be plain for all to read, so that people who know you will see that God says they are to be kind, pure, happy, and loving.

Once one of the great steamers carrying letters from a foreign country to this was sunk in mid-ocean, and all the letters got so soaked with water that the ink all ran and the pages became smeared so that not a word could be read. That is just what happens (in another way) when one of you becomes angry or unkind, has wicked thoughts or cherishes bad-temper; the letter God has written is then unreadable, men and women who try to find out what God is saying in you, cannot make out words at all, because you are spoiling the writing. If we all were good, then the messages God sends would stand out so clearly and be so easily read that no one could be in doubt, or wonder whether God was caring for us; it is just because so many human letters ("living epistles," who was it used that phrase?) are spoiled that the world is not heaven.

Be ready, then, to read the sacred writing everywhere; and above all things, take care that you rub none of it out.

STRENGTH FOR THE DISCOURAGED.

The annual meeting of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, held at Derby on Tuesday, furnished evidence, such as we are familiar with in many parts of the country, of the uphill fight which the smaller and more isolated congregations of our fellowship have to face. Knowing the conditions under which such congregations often have to do their work and uphold a brave and patient testimony, one cannot wonder that at times they show signs of discouragement and suffer from the chill of isolation and neglect, if not from the world's active dislike or contempt.

To counteract by every possible means such depressing influences is one of the chief objects of the various provincial Associations, which seek to unite the churches of each district in closer fellowship and to give of the strength and generous sympathy of the strong for the support and encouragement of the less vigorous members. And since the needs and the means of the various provinces differ, there is the British and Foreign Unitarian Association which, failing any representative and executive Assembly of the whole body of our Free Churches, takes charge of contributions from all parts of the country, and from a central fund endeavours, so far as means permit, to supply whatever further help is needed in the way of material support, while ever ready at the same time with personal help and sympathy.

But while the plea for more loyal and abundant support of such associations, to make their work more thoroughly effectual, always needs to be pressed, there is something more to be said in this matter of our isolated and scantily furnished churches; and the chief purpose of the present article is to ask how those who are called to such posts of duty may best maintain their witness in a spirit of confidence and joy, even if the material condition of their society should come to the worst pass, that they may have that daring faith which laughs at defeat, and though repeatedly cast down, can never be destroyed. What, in fact, in such churches as ours must be the secret of strength and peace, of indomitable courage and perseverance in well-doing?
